amounted in the average, he believed, to £10 a day. Even if the income tax were lowered, a great deal of the money left in the pockets of the people would find its way into the Exchequer, in the shape of Excise duties, and so on. Another mine of wealth was the Miscellaneous Estimates, which had only sprung up within the last twenty years, and which did no good to the country. Moreover, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who had already had a wind-fall from Spain, might have another from China, if there were no war with that country. The great point, however, was not to keep up our armaments. There could be no doubt that we were arming against France; and, therefore, if France could be induced to think more of peace and industry, and less of war and glory, it would be of the greatest advantage to England. The French people disliked the sea, and did not much like the army, as was proved by the fact that a substitute for the conscription cost £80, whereas, in any market town in England one could be had for 1*s.*; and if the people, therefore, once get it into their heads that industrial occupation was more profitable than soldiering, the conscription would cease to be popular, and would soon be at an end, and along with it would end large armies in France, and the necessity for large armies and large fleets in England. He hoped the House and the Conservative party would not oppose the Treaty, because, if what was now offered by France was not accepted, this country might never get another offer from the same quarter. He hoped also that other nations—America, Germany, Russia, and the nations on the shores of the Mediterranean—would follow the example of France; and he trusted to see the day when every man in this country would have in his home the products and comforts of every soil for his enjoyment, and when the idea of Adam Smith and Mr. Pitt would be realized.

MR. HORSFALL said, he had never felt greater difficulty in his life than in deciding how he should vote with regard to the Motion before the House. He confessed he would have preferred that the Motion should never have been brought forward, and that they should have gone into Committee upon the Budget at once, and discussed each feature of it upon its own merits. An hon. Gentleman who spoke early in the debate on the other side of the House, had taunted the hon. Gentleman who brought forward this

[Second Night.

Motion, because he said that he had adopted free-trade principles in deference to public opinion. He (Mr. Horsfall) thought that was an unfortunate observation, because at this moment those who were attempting to establish free trade in France knew that the Emperor was bowing to public opinion. It had become the policy of this country. It was therefore evidently the policy of this country to encourage free trade not only in France, but in every nation on the Continent. He would make but a single observation with reference to coal. He thought the hon. Member for Leeds (Mr. Baines) rather misrepresented what fell from the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Hubbard). He did not take exception to the export altogether of coal, but merely stated that we ought not to prohibit ourselves from imposing a duty on it. He was quite aware that there were those who thought we ought to take power to prevent the export of coal in times of war. He (Mr. Horsfall) did not concur in that. He was not afraid of the mischiefs which some people thought would flow from an unlimited export of coal, for it was well known that coal could be procured in Belgium, Prussia, and in France itself; and although that coal was not so suitable as British coal for steaming purposes, although it might be procured at an additional cost, yet it would be used at any cost and under any difficulty, and would be found most effective for all practical purposes in case of war. He chiefly found fault with the Treaty on the ground that no reference whatever was made to the shipping of this country. He regretted that the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. W. S. Lindsay) had withdrawn his Motion upon that subject. Hon. Members, he was sure, had no conception of the extent of the foreign trade with France. For instance, in the year 1856-57 there were 415,000 bales of cotton exported from the United States to France; in 1857-58, 388,333 bales; in 1858-59, 440,000 bales; and in the year 1859-60, so far as it had gone, it was over 500,000 bales, revenue might suppose, a considerable increase of shipping. In consequence of the fact found from the New York that recent exports in excess over last year, and a considerable increase in the present, as there were on the 1st of the present month loading in 154 vessels against 13 last year. If this trade were carried on in French vessels, he could understand the indisposition of France to negotiate; but what was the fact? In an official document issued by the French Government during the last few days, the admission was to be found that nine-tenths of the shipping engaged in the trade between the United States and France, was American shipping. Why, then, should France hesitate to give the shipping of this country an equality with the shipping of the United States? Our vessels were now debarred by the differential duty. He was aware that there was great difference of opinion as to the operation of the 3rd Article of the Treaty, but the Treaty itself maintained the differential duties now in force, which made a difference in the article of cotton imported into France, for example, between American and English vessels of not less than a half-penny per lb., being as much as the whole freight. It was impossible for English vessels to compete with American under such circumstances. He should have liked to see in the correspondence which had been published relative to the Treaty some evidence that the representatives of Her Majesty's Government at Paris had made an effort to accomplish something for the shipping interest. He felt bound, however, to say, and it would be satisfactory to the shipping interest to know, that the noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) had been good enough to tell a deputation who had waited upon him that negotiations were going on with the French Government with a view to give relief to British shipping, which the noble Lord hoped would be attended with success. To show how these differential duties pressed upon the English shipowner, he would read a letter from an English captain who was at Mauritius with his ship. The writer said:—

"I am sorry to say I have no chance of any employment here. Freight is low, and only three or four ships loading for London. The James Livesey is one of them, and taking cargo at 17s. 6d. and 12s. 6d. The bulk of the sugar is shipping to France, and French vessels command as freight £3 10s. I have not decided yet where to go, but I suppose it must be back to Calcutta again."

Now, the Mauritius was an English colony, and this was an instance of the disadvantage under which English shipping at present laboured. He wished now to say a few words upon the proposed spirit duties. In the correspondence between the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs and our Plenipotentiaries at Paris the noble Lord said that "the lowest point to which for any British purpose Her Majesty's Government could propose to reduce the duty on brandy is 10s. per gallon." The noble Lord, however, gave them authority, if they saw that any adequate advantage could thereby be gained, to reduce the duty, to 8s. 2d. As they had agreed to the lower rate of duty, he presumed there must have been some adequate advantage offered. He wished, however, that it had been pointed out in the correspondence, for the difference between 8s. 2d. and 10s. would have made a material item in the revenue. The reduction of the duty on brandy from 15s. to 8s. 2d. involved a loss of £256,000. Now, an increase of duty on colonial spirits at 1s. 10d. would give £314,195; an increase of 2s. per gallon on British would give £2,321,261, and on brandy at 1s. 10d., assuming no increase of consumption, there would be a gain of £101,576. The equalization of the duties at 10s. would altogether give an increase to the revenue of £2,737,032. If, therefore, the noble Lord's suggestion of 10s. per gallon on French brandy had been carried out, and the duty upon colonial and home-made spirits had maintained the same proportion, the Government might have made a deduction of 2d. in the pound in the proposed income tax. He had always been, both publicly and privately, favourable to the repeal of the paper duty, but he should have been disposed to look for a surplus revenue before he proposed that abolition. He should be sorry if the paper duty were not soon taken off, but if its abolition had been deferred for a short time there would have been another £1,000,000 at the disposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who might then have proposed an income tax of 7d. instead of 10d. Such a proposition would, he believed, have received the assent of the country. The Chancellor of the Exchequer expected to gain £300,000 a year by his registration fee of 1d. per package on all goods exported and imported. Now, he had had access to documents and information which led him to a conclusion—and he believed it would be found correct—that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had greatly underestimated the revenue which this 1d. tax would produce. In the year 1858, a very depressed year for commerce, this small tax, instead of £300,000, would have produced £829,976.

He had no doubt that in the present year, if trade were prosperous, this tax would realize above £1,000,000. He did not think this a fair tax, and he was assured that it would press most unequally and unjustly. One of his constituents wrote to tell him that a 1d. tax upon the cargo of one of his vessels would cost him £133. A soap boiler assured him that it would amount to a tax of £600 a year upon his trade. A gunpowder manufacturer stated that the tax would cost him £1,500 a year, while parties dealing in silk and other articles of great value would not pay, perhaps, more than £50. The tax was therefore unjust in principle. Here again, however, it gave him great pleasure to say that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had received all the representations which he and others had made to him with the greatest courtesy and candour, and he had assured the parties interested that he desired to distribute the incidence of taxation in the most equitable manner. He trusted that when the clause came under discussion in Committee, hon. Members would be prepared to give a fair consideration to this tax. With regard to the Motion before the House, he regretted that he could not support it, notwithstanding the statements he had just made. If the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Du Cane) had confined his Resolution to the words—"That this House is not prepared to disappoint the just expectation of the country by largely increasing the income tax," he should have felt it his duty to vote for it; but he could not vote for a Resolution which would neutralize the proposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to sweep from the operation of the tariff so large a list of articles. Notwithstanding the predictions they had heard to-night, he felt convinced that the removal of these duties would give an impetus to trade, and conduce materially to the prosperity of the country.

MR. BYNG said, that there was always this difficulty in discussing any abstract resolution, that in general the most objectionable parts of any great scheme, whether financial or otherwise, were selected for attack, while its counterbalancing advantages did not appear so conspicuous; those, therefore, who, like himself, intended to support the proposals of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, would feel obliged on the present occasion to defend the retention and augmentation of the income tax, against which the Motion of the

hon. Member for North Essex was especially directed. Much of that difficulty had been removed by the manly and candid manner in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had put forward the views on which his policy was founded, and also by the declaration of the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down, that he could not support a Resolution the effect of which would be to defeat those proposals. He was anxious not to be diverted by this Resolution from the great points at issue, but to take the Budget and the Treaty as forming portions of one general scheme; and looking at the Chancellor of the Exchequer's proposals from that point of view, notwithstanding that he entertained objections to some of its details, he was prepared to support it. There were many of the points so ably touched upon by the hon. Member for Buckingham, which would no doubt require modification, but he would not be led away by any consideration of the details from a fair consideration of what he regarded as not only one of the most comprehensive, but also one of the most honestly-intentioned Budgets that ever a Chancellor of the Exchequer had had the good fortune to submit to Parliament and to the country. There were in this Budget four points worthy of attention. There was first the great advantage not only to this country but to France which would ensue from the entire removal of prohibitive duties. There was secondly a great simplification of the tariff, the articles included in which were reduced in number from 419 to 47 or 48—which was a wide step towards the improvement of our commercial legislation; and he believed that the advantages which France would derive from this measure would be extended to other nations, and that France was setting an example of free trade which would be followed by every country in Europe. There was, thirdly, the reduction of the wine duties, and though it could not be stated distinctly that in a certain number in relief would be enjoyed at the case of the Treaty of 1763 as an example. In 1787

French wines into this country amounted to 75,969 gallons, and five years after the Treaty, they had increased to 723,820 gallons. By the past, they should not be calculated upon a very

He likewise approved of the duty on paper; but at the same time he would admit that he thought that remission might have been postponed. But when he recollected the peculiar circumstances of the time—that a Resolution passed unanimously by this House had condemned that duty as unjust and impolitic—the increasing difficulty of defining what constituted paper and the infinite labour and vexation in levying the tax, he could not help thinking that though the Chancellor of the Exchequer might have postponed the remission of the impost, he had taken a wise and bold step, and one which the country at large would appreciate. Now, the remission of the duties which he had just mentioned, as well as of several others, being the advantage which the public would derive from the scheme of the Government; the next point to be considered was what price we should have to pay for the boon which we received. We were, in the first place, called upon to submit, not only to the continuance, but to an increase of the income tax; but in dealing with that question he could not help saying that there did not appear to him to be so much weight as some hon. Members might suppose in that portion of the Resolution of the hon. Member for Essex in which the proposal with respect to the income tax was said to be opposed to the just expectations of the country. He was of that opinion, because he could not fail to perceive that since the Chancellor of the Exchequer spoke, in 1853, of a hope that the tax would by this time be extinct, circumstances more potent than even the Chancellor of the Exchequer had rendered the fulfilment of that hope impossible. It must also be borne in mind that in a speech which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bucks delivered when he was Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1858, he declared that to assert that a compact had been entered into which was independent of all circumstances, would be wild and impossible; and that the House, having sanctioned a certain policy, they could not repeal the expenditure which that policy entailed, unless they repealed the policy itself. It was, indeed, quite evident, as the right hon. Gentleman went on to maintain, that the abolition or reduction of the income tax must in a great measure depend on the policy we pursued abroad, as regarded our relations with foreign powers—at home, with respect to our naval and military establishments. And so it was that the Government had been obliged, in deference to the almost unanimous voice of the country, to increase our armaments; not from any fear of foreign Powers—he believed the reason lay deeper. Successive Governments had been obliged to decrease the Estimates, and he believed that the country was not aware of the sums of money that were spent, or of the manner in which they had been spent. But in consequence of these reductions it followed that an absolute and imperative necessity had arisen of placing our armaments on a proper footing. But though the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not been able to redeem his promise, it should not be said that there was no hope held out to them; for though he believed that the extinction of the income tax was impossible, still he did hope, and would be prepared to maintain, that in future years it should be readjusted on an equitable foundation. The income tax had this advantage, that it had a fatal simplicity by which it might be increased at any time, and it would be a very desirable mode of supplying the revenue of the country if some scheme could be devised by which precarious incomes should not pay the same as real incomes. That was a great difficulty. It was a difficulty worthy of such a Chancellor of the Exchequer. It was a difficulty from which many might shrink. But the present Chancellor was a man of whom it might be said—

“Nil actum reputans dum quid superesset agendum.”

If the right hon. Gentleman continued to hold office for one more Session, and should have the opportunity of proposing another Budget, he (Mr. Byng) believed that this question would not escape from his consideration, and that the masterly genius which he displayed on all occasions would doubtless enable him to grapple with and overcome even those great difficulties which the question by its nature presented. With respect to the statement that the differential duties on shipping were not to be altered, because this was a treaty of trade and commerce and not of navigation, he did not know whether that might be satisfactory to those who were more conversant with the subject than he was; but as to the alarm and apprehension shown by some lest we should not be able to prevent the French from using our coals in their ships of war under the 11th Article of the Treaty, he thought that was completely disposed of by what had been said by the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs a few evenings ago, and by the opinion of the Lord Chancellor which the noble Lord quoted, to the effect that in the case of a war with France the provision with regard to coal would cease to operate. In respect to the question of reciprocity, they ought to remember that the French Emperor had enormous difficulties to contend with. His people were not impressed like ours with the advantages of a free-trade policy, though he (Mr. Byng) believed he had tried to carry out that policy, the advantages of which he had seen in this country, to the utmost of his power, and that he was thoroughly impressed with the conviction that it would contribute not only to the political, but to the material prosperity of his country. Believing that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, by his financial proposals, interwoven and mixed up as they were with a commercial treaty with a great neighbouring Power, was doing much to carry out and consolidate those great principles of free trade which the Ministerial side of the House had always advocated, and which Gentlemen opposite now admitted to be favourable to the interests of the country; believing that with respect to our foreign relations the great scheme before them was calculated to promote “peace on earth and good will to men;” and believing also, that it would do more to advance the prosperity of this country, the welfare and dignity of France, and the peace and happiness of the civilized world than the greatest schemes of territorial aggrandisement by force of arms could accomplish, he would most cordially give his support to those proposals, reserving to himself the right to criticise, perhaps to oppose, some of the minor propositions when the proper time for doing so arrived.

MR. BEACH said, he believed that the financial measures which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had brought before them in a speech of surpassing eloquence were founded on a basis more specious than solid, and that it would be found more difficult to work them out than had yet been anticipated. The main ground of the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman was the Commercial Treaty with France. He was willing to admit, with reference to the Treaty, that the highest credit was due to the French Emperor for the spirit he had displayed. It must be a subject of congratulation to civilized Europe that he had recognized the principle that commerce was better than conquest—that it was better to have peaceful intercourse with his neighbours than to fulminate Berlin and Milan decrees, and pursue the policy of the first Empire, which was directed towards the destruction of the commerce of England. He had thereby given the best guarantees for the continuance of peace, and would earn for himself more durable laurels than those of the battle-field. There could be no doubt that the Articles of the Treaty would confer the most signal benefits on France; but if it was asked what we were to have in return, and when the matter was looked at from an English point of view, the case would be found to be very different. We were to have wines at a lower price; but was that a sufficient inducement to us to remit a large amount of taxation, and to enter into a compact of this nature? In his opinion, it was not. The best French wines would not be introduced to this country, but only their sour wines, neither congenial to the English palate nor consistent with the English climate. Among the articles to be introduced from France, he failed to discover one that would be of real substantial benefit to the humbler classes of the community. They were all articles of luxury. With regard to the article of coal, he thought it of the utmost importance that there should be a clear definition of the point whether it was a contraband of war or not. The most eminent jurists had disagreed upon the subject, and he thought the time had come when these differences of opinion should be brought to some definite conclusion. In the case of France going to war with some other nation, much embarrassment might arise from one nation taking a different view of the subject from another. With respect to the remission of duties now pro-not venture to say that could not be beneficial if ever time to make them; remission should take place real, and not a theoretical with. They were en- any remissions were pro- t the native producers of old receive some relief. malt and hops were en- sideration, especially mbered that the duties affected a drink which and pleasant one to the the population of this eign hop-growers had an he home producers had not. The former had the privilege of sending their hops to this country at any time that suited them, and, after paying the duty, bringing them to market; whereas our own hop-growers were compelled to pay the duty at a fixed period, which was now to be of briefer duration than before. To the abolition of the paper duty he had no objection; but there were other Exise duties which pressed more heavily on industry. He held that their first duty was to remove the fetters that cramped the industry of the national producer; and he ventured to submit that when all these efforts were made to promote, encourage, and foster the industry of those abroad, British producers were really entitled to the favourable consideration of the Legislature. Our Estimates for several years had been growing larger and larger, and it was hopeless for any Member to rise and express any opinion as to their reduction; if he did, he was simply considered as impeding the useful progress of public business. He ventured, however, to hope that before next year Ministers would give a calm and candid consideration to the subject, and, by a searching inquiry into those articles upon which taxation could be advantageously reduced, and into those items of expenditure which might fairly be abolished, be enabled to submit lower Estimates than they unfortunately had to provide for this year. The revenue of the country was, fortunately, of an expansive character, but the expenditure had expanded far more. It had been said in this debate that, during the last ten years, the annual expenditure of the country had increased from the average of £52,000,000 to £70,000,000. This was an alarming fact for them to consider. It was, indeed, the opinion of the nation that a large armament must be kept up, not as against any other country, but simply for our own defence. If the system prevailed in other countries of accumulating vast and increasing armaments, it was neither fit nor proper that England should neglect hers; but he did hope that before next year a considerable reduction would be made, and that, as a consequence, there would be a permanent and beneficial diminution in the taxation. Meanwhile, however, he could not help expressing his opinion that it was not expedient, with an increased deficiency, to make the large reductions proposed in the present Budget; and, therefore, although there might be some points in it which he approved, he must give his sanction to the Amendment of the hon. Member for North Essex, considering that, if those articles of taxation were not flung away, there would be no necessity of returning to an increased rate or objectionable mode of taxation.

SIR FRANCIS BARING said, that as he had for many years been accustomed to take a part in the financial discussions of the House, he felt bound on the present occasion to state frankly his opinions. In doing so he did not suppose that the views he was about to express would find much support on that (the Ministerial) side of the House; but, entertaining opinions which he would have expressed had the propositions now brought forward emanated from the Gentlemen on the other side, he felt it hardly fair or courageous to shrink from avowing them, however unpopular they might be. In the first place he wished to say that he considered this to be a Budget question. He had voted against the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli) to make it a question merely of treaty—they had to discuss the Chancellor of the Exchequer's propositions as a financial whole, the Treaty forming but a part, though a considerable part, of it. With regard to the Treaty, in the first place, he must admit he had never considered himself one of those advanced free-traders who objected on principle to any commercial treaty; he did not see why those who agreed to commercial treaties acted contrary to the principles of free trade. Our later policy had made commercial treaties extremely difficult; but there were two modes of attaining the same end—one, that we should not wait till foreign countries adopted a liberal policy, or punish ourselves while they were waiting and hesitating; but half a loaf being better than no bread, we at least should have free trade on our side, and a liberal tariff, though France refused. That was one course; but the object of it was, that we hoped by our example to induce foreign countries ultimately to come into our policy, so that there might be free trade and a liberal tariff on both sides. There was another course perfectly consistent with an anxiety to obtain free trade—to say, "It is quite true we may be punishing ourselves, but we shall sooner get our ultimate object, which is free trade on both sides, if we hang off for a certain time and negotiate." That was the course which we had been adopting in many cases before the late financial changes. But he felt considerable difficulty in seeing how they could take half one course and half the other. He wished to exemplify the case. He had no objection that they should make a bargain with France, and obtain certain privileges in return for reducing duties on articles of French production or manufacture—the wine duties for instance. But while adopting one course with regard to France, why exclude the possibility of taking the same course with regard to Spain? If they went to Spain and said, "We are prepared to reduce the duties on French wines, and are going to do so by treaty, because France gives us certain privileges; if you do not do the same you will suffer," there never was a moment when it was more probable we should succeed than now in Spain. But unfortunately, while making a Commercial Treaty with France at the very same moment the Government sacrificed every possibility of making a Commercial Treaty with Spain. But it seemed almost impossible that gentlemen who had gone so far as the Government had done in the anti-reciprocity principle should turn round and try to get free trade by Commercial Treaties. What advantages did we obtain from this Commercial Treaty? He did not consider this question in a spirit hostile to free trade. He had not adopted free trade opinions because they were now popular; he entertained them before they were so. But he found it extremely difficult to consider the question of bargain and sale between nations; and as to whether the advantages obtained by France or ourselves were greater, hon. Gentlemen would entertain different opinions. Undoubtedly, his impression was that France had the best of the bargain. Let the House weigh what we had obtained. In that speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, of which, after what had been said, it would be almost impertinent in him to express admiration, the subject of wine formed a most important element; but in the letter which his noble Friend (Lord John Russell) had written, no doubt in communication with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, it was frankly stated that the reductions proposed to be made were not in those articles which the Government thought so important as to call for immediate consideration. That admission was made. If, then, we effected these reductions, what were the objects we had in view? First, to enable the people to obtain cheap what they formerly had to pay dearly for; again, to produce a considerable increase of our own trade; and, last of all—no small advantage in the eyes of the Chancellor of the Exchequer—the reduction was of a nature and in an article that the revenue would soon recover—that we should not lose money by the reductions made. Now, as to the first point, the Chancellor of the Exchequer was extremely eloquent on the blessing of wine to the poorer classes; but there seemed to be no due appreciation on the part of the people of the advantages which he held out. The greatest number of petitions—and they were very numerous—were from persons who prayed the House not to make the sale of this blessing too frequent; not to open it to general competition. Who ever heard of the country being prepared to petition that the sale of tea and sugar should not be made too frequent? One hon. Gentleman, indeed, who made a very amusing speech, spoke of the blessing of “black-strap;” but he could not find that there was a very general appreciation of “black-strap” in the community. On the contrary, the measure shadowed out by the Chancellor of the Exchequer for making the sale of wine general had produced a greater number of adverse petitions than they would find in favour of the whole Budget. Next, did they believe that it would cause a very large increase of our trade? The right hon. Gentleman looked forward to getting rid of the consumption of what he had called “that wretched stuff, Cape wine.” No doubt it would be a great advantage to secure a better article; but it should be remembered that Cape wine was paid for in articles of our own manufacture; and if it were got rid of, it would be replaced by so much French or Spanish wine. That might be quite consistent with the principles of free trade, and he did not quarrel with it; but do not let it be said that it would increase our manufactures. All they would do would be that, instead of sending their goods to the Cape, they would send them to France or Spain. But they were told that there was to be a large extension in the consumption of wine. It was very remarkable that in the course of his life he had heard that prophecy twice made, and as often falsified. The sanguine Lord Ripon made a considerable reduction in the wine duty. Unfortunately, however, his revenue did not recover in the way he had expected. The Government of Lord Althorp, of which he was himself a humble member, also made a large reduction on French wine. No great advantage was derived from that measure either. He held in his hand a Parliamentary Return, stating the amount of duty imposed on tea, coffee, sugar, wine, spirits, and malt, in 1820 and in 1860, together with the revenue raised from them at both those periods, and also showing the consumption of those articles per head of our population. From that paper he found that although the duty on sugar had been largely reduced, the revenue had more than righted itself. Instead of producing £3,900,000, as in 1820, it produced £5,936,000 in 1860; showing that the article of sugar answered the financial helm. If they reduced the duty upon it, they might be pretty sure, from experience, that in a certain time the Exchequer would be more than repaid for its sacrifice. With tea, again, the case was the same. After a considerable reduction of duty there was a very large augmentation of revenue. Coffee presented a still stronger illustration. An even greater remission of duty was made on that article, and the revenue had very considerably improved under the lower scale. Then came the question of foreign spirits, the duty on which it was now proposed to reduce. Well, the duty on foreign spirits had been greatly reduced, but the reduction had not been followed by the same results. There had been a fall in the revenue derived from French spirits, and a much larger fall in that derived from colonial spirits; and, on the whole, they did not find that they had been repaid in forty years for their reduction of duty. It was remarkable how stationary, both the consumption of wine and the revenue obtained from it, had been. There was a small increase in the revenue from French wine, the duty on which had been largely reduced—namely, from 13s. 9d. to 5s. 9d.; on Madeira, Rhenish, and other wines, there had been a fall in the revenue; on Cape wine a little increase. But, taking the whole of the wine duties together, although between 1820 and 1860 the duties had been twice reduced, principally on the foreign article, we had not yet recovered our loss of revenue. There had also been a reduction in the malt duty, though not a very large one, in proportion to the reductions made in other articles; and still there was a great increase in the amount of money it brought to the Exchequer. It was clear, then, that in selecting articles on which to make reductions of duty, they ought to look for those which would repay them fastest. This was not merely a money question. They should consult the tastes and the wishes of the people; and if they found that when they reduced the duties on certain articles without replacing their revenue, and when they reduced the duties on others, they obtained both an increased consumption and an increased revenue, it showed that the people in the one case did not care for the reduction, and that in the other they were very anxious for it. If, therefore, a Chancellor of the Exchequer desired either to serve the revenue, or to increase the comforts of the people, he could not hesitate about the duties which he ought to choose for remission. But it was said there were political reasons why we should accept French wine. In the first place, if such great blessings were to be derived from a Commercial Treaty with France, he felt inclined to ask, "Why don't you enter into Commercial Treaties with other countries." If they were to make friends with France at the expense of a million of their revenue—for it came to that—why couldn't they spend a small sum in making other friends on the Continent, where they had not too many? Let the Government, then, take a lesson from their own book, and apply their principles of friendship to the negotiation of Commercial Treaties with other States beside France. He quite admitted that this was not a mere fiscal question. And here he would take leave to express an opinion which, as coming from a private and independent Member of the House, had no weight or value whatever, except that which any hon. Gentleman might please to attach to it. He could view this question neither as a member of the present Government, nor as one who looked forward to the formation of a Government from the other side of the House. If, then, he was to consider this Treaty, not with reference to its financial but to its political bearings, he was bound to say that, looked at in that point of view, it did recommend itself to his approval. He had never joined in those attacks on the head of the French Government which had been too rife in this country, and he thought that that ruler had been somewhat hardly dealt with in the animadversions to which he was subjected at the time of the memorable Conspiracy to Murder Bill. He had never believed in the schemes for the invasion of this country which had been imputed to that Sovereign. Still, he could not help asking, "Why are we armed? On what grounds are we to make great sacrifices in preparations and fortifications?" They might, perhaps, derive a certain amount of advantage from the course pursued. But let them look at the other side of the ledger. Why were they to have so heavy an income tax? Because of their great Estimates. And why were their Estimates so great? Every foreign Government had a perfect right to pursue the policy which it believed to be the policy of its own country; at the same time, he did not feel much gratitude for having a sop of wine in place of a little "black strap," when he had to pay an aggravated income tax. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had acknowledged that the reason why we could not get rid of the income tax was, not because the revenue had not increased, but because of the enormous growth of the Estimates. No man more cordially desired than he did to see our relations with France wear the most friendly aspect; but at the present moment he was not tempted to be anxious for any intimate alliance with France, as far as her political conduct in Italy was concerned. His noble Friend (Lord John Russell) he hoped was satisfied with regard to the views of the French Government. The policy of England, however, was that Italy should be free, powerful, and independent; that Italy should be able to defend herself from the interference of foreign States. That was not only the policy of England, but it was also the interest of Europe; but as far as he could read its intentions he did not gather that that was the policy of the French Government. France seemed to think that if there should be formed in Italy such a central State as would be powerful she would be bound to look out for something which might be an equivalent and a protection to herself. That, he repeated, was not the policy of England. He should be sorry to see anything done by a commercial treaty or otherwise which should hold us out in the face of Europe as parties to transactions which he feared were likely to be carried out for the acquisition of territory in Italy. He now came to the proposed alterations in our tariff. The present Chancellor of the Exchequer had always entertained the opinion that it was of great advantage to get rid of the small articles which figured in our tariff, while his colleague who formerly filled the same office (Sir George Lewis) expressed a directly contrary opinion. He would leave them to settle their differences between themselves. It might be desirable to have as many strings to their bow as possible; but here it was not at all the question whether they reduced taxes on those small articles—the question was, whether they should transfer the duties paid on those articles to the mercantile transactions connected with them. However, after the speech of the hon. Member for Buckingham, who spoke so much to the point on that subject, it would be a waste of time to go over the ground again. He only hoped that, whatever might happen, they might not, under the notion of free trade, take such a mistaken step as to interfere with the freedom of the merchant's movements. No greater benefit could be conferred on the merchant of this country than by placing him in such a position that the freedom of his movements and the power of saving his time should not be unnecessarily restricted by Excise regulations. With regard to the remission of the paper duty, that, to his mind, was the best part of the Budget. He believed its remission would be a very great benefit, provided it could be made safely with reference to the revenue. Of all duties, so far as his experience went, those of Excise were the most inconvenient; because, let the Government be as liberal as they might to the trader, it was impossible to collect the necessary revenue without interfering with the operations of his trade. Though he did not join in all the hopes of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, yet he was not inclined to ridicule his expectation that the extension of the paper manufacture might be realized, provided he could secure for the manufacturer a command over the raw material. The Chancellor of the Exchequer talked of coaches and other articles being made of paper; he (Sir Francis Baring) had read in a very amusing book might proceed in the direction they were invited to take more safely; but he wished earnestly to call the attention of the House to the position in which they would stand if this Budget were adopted. No objections were made to Sir Robert Peel's alterations in the tariff, except the ordinary ones always raised against free trade—but he would ask the House to recollect what were the objections made to the income tax when it was first imposed by Sir Robert Peel? The main objection was, that Sir Robert Peel proposed a tax of such a nature that it was impossible to maintain it in its then position as a permanent source of revenue, and he was told that he might pass it then, but that some time or other such a feeling would be raised against it in the country that he would have either to remedy its inequalities or abandon the revenue derived from it. The income tax then brought in far on to £7,000,000; it was now estimated to raise a sum approaching to £10,000,000; and he (Sir F. Baring) wished the House to consider whether they thought the revenue of the country would be safe with £10,000,000 of it resting on the income tax alone? Let the House go with him into the history of the income tax, and then judge whether they had not had from time to time the narrowest escape of losing the revenue derived from it. In 1842 the tax was originally proposed by Sir Robert Peel on a lease of three years. In 1845, when the honeymoon of free trade was going on, there was a renewal of it for another three years without much objection. In 1848 the Government of the day thought they might increase the tax, but they were obliged to abandon that intention. At that time, while the income tax was under discussion, the disturbances in France and Europe broke out, and if it had not been for that circumstance he did not believe, even with the promise of reduced Estimates and the speedy extinction of the tax, the Government would then have carried its renewal. In 1851 his right hon. Friend the then Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed another renewal of the tax for three years. Did he carry it? No; it was carried only for one year, the amendment to that effect being proposed, not by any Conservative, but by Joseph Hume, the honest apostle of free trade. Then, in 1852, came the Budget of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire, and the great struggle to which it gave rise. The right hon. Gentleman did not carry his Budget, and the House was obliged to continue the tax for one year. Then came the proposal of the present Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1853. Did any one believe that the income tax would then have passed for seven years, if the expectation had not been then held out by the Chancellor of the Exchequer that measures would be taken which would have the effect of getting rid of it altogether at the end of that period? Even with that expectation attached to the proposal he (Sir F. Baring) was surprised to see the facility with which it passed. He had recently refreshed his memory by reading the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1853. It was one of the ablest financial expositions on record; but then the Chancellor of the Exchequer was sailing on a different tack. His two Budgets differed, but his eloquence was the same. But what was his proposal now? It was to renew the income tax for not more than one year. Was that a safe proposal? Was that leaving the finances of the country in a safe position? He was not now taunting the Chancellor of the Exchequer with not redeeming the pledge given in 1853; but, although the right hon. Gentleman could not perform all he promised, he might still have trod in the path he then pointed out. Now, what was our financial position? He (Sir F. Baring) had had something to do with Budgets, but he never had more difficulty in making out what our future revenue would be than from the present financial scheme. He believed, however, that he had done so, and fairly; the result being that, taking our expenditure to be the same—and a man would be mad to expect any reduction in it at present—there would be in 1861-2 a deficit of £12,000,000, or, allowing for anything like a surplus, at least £12,500,000. Was that a desirable position? When Sir Robert Peel, the great exemplar whom they were all now copying, proposed his financial arrangements, did he throw the revenue into such jeopardy? He, indeed, took the income tax to cover a deficit; but he took it not for one, but for three years, until the revenue recovered itself, and he was therefore able to show that for three years, and not for twelve months merely, he had an ample surplus. That was not the case here. In 1861-2 there would be a deficit of at least £12,500,000. "Oh yes!" it might be said, "but if we have an impending deficit, we have at hand the taxes to meet it. We have nothing to do but to continue the income tax and maintain the war duties on tea and sugar." Well, but even that would not do. A 10*d.* income tax and the present duties on tea and sugar would still leave a deficit of, with any margin, from £2,000,000, to £2,500,000; and this amount must be raised by new taxation. It really seemed as though some persons thought that by far the most statesmanlike way of increasing the revenue was by increasing the deficit; and in case of need a 1*s.* income tax was spoken of—but even that, again, he feared, would not be sufficient. Now, this was a formidable position, and he earnestly entreated hon. Gentlemen to consider it, and not rest contented with eloquent speeches about the blessings of free trade. What would happen if at the end of next year Parliament had a deficiency of £12,000,000 to meet? It was proper also to bear in mind a circumstance mentioned by the hon. Member for Stamford (Sir Stafford Northcote) in a remarkably good speech. The present House of Commons would not have to deal with this question. Even if it would have come before them, the Government ought to have looked forward, and to have placed the revenue of the country in some better position than they now proposed to leave it. But we should have not only a new Parliament but a new Constitution. Was it wise or statesmanlike, for anybody who remembered what the first Reformed Parliament was for some years, to bequeath to their successors a deficit of £12,000,000? He (Sir F. Baring) was as good a Reformer as most gentlemen there, and he hoped he should be insulting no one by what he was now saying. Probably it would not be his fate to appear in that House under a new constitution; but he would entreat hon. Gentlemen not to deal lightly with a question of such deep importance to our revenue and position as a nation. He was not one who supposed that England would ever "repudiate," or would deal otherwise than honestly with the national creditor. But no one could rely for a day or for an hour on what might be done under a new constitution by men carried away, perhaps, by some momentary excitement. No doubt the evil would be momentary only. No doubt the good sense and good feeling of the country would very soon set things right. Yes, but what would the nation suffer while things were wrong? Who, then, would think of such trifles as remitted duties on cheese and butter? Even that House had been guilty of acts which had occasioned great consternation in the commercial world; but the loss of our credit, the sacrifice of our character and position in the eyes of Europe, the loss also of our power to raise money when we required it, would be risked by such a momentary folly.

[Second Night.

Francis Baring

[Second Night.

[Second Night.

MR. BRIGHT: I have listened with more than usual interest, but not with more than usual pleasure, to the speech of the right hon. Baronet the Member for Portsmouth. It has reminded us forcibly of the Budget speeches which those who were in the House twenty years ago were accustomed to listen to, and which some of us, who were not in the House, were accustomed to read. It seems to me to be a speech which, whilst clinging very much to the past, is filled with an excess of doubt with regard to the future. Every part of it held up some hobgoblin to deter the House from pursuing the course which the experience of every one since 1842 has proved to be most wise. We were told what dreadful things were about to happen to the country, and how much we should disappoint many persons who are not here to mix in these debates; but unfortunately for the right hon. Gentleman's propositions and his doubts, there is but one voice—there is but one opinion expressed—from one end of the kingdom to the other, with regard to the general propositions which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has laid before us. And if this debate goes on, as I presume it will not go on, into one of the nights of next week, we shall have that apparition of a dissolving view which the right hon. Gentleman opposite, I recollect, once described in connection with a debate on a certain Indian despatch, and I believe there will at last be scarcely any one to vote with the mover of the Resolution now before the House. The Resolution itself is a very fair one and meets the whole question. It meets it more than any one would perhaps discover at the first reading of it. It says:—

"That this House recognizes the necessity of providing for the increased expenditure of the coming financial year—is of opinion that it is not expedient to add to the existing deficiency by diminishing the ordinary revenue—and is not prepared to meet the just expectations of the country by raising the income tax at an un-tion should be carried,

be fatal, not only to the Commercial Treaty with France, but to the whole scheme of the Government. It insists upon that which is the great blot in the policy of the Government—namely, the large and scandalous expenditure—it resists the income tax at the amount proposed—it opposes all reduction of duties, whether of customs or of excise, and it refuses absolutely in point of fact to give effect to the Commercial Treaty with France. It is directly against everything but the expenditure. I do not complain of this at all. I thank the hon. Member for Essex for bringing the matter before the House and before the country in a form in which it could not be mistaken. He wishes to throw out the Budget—to reject the Treaty—to overthrow the Government. The result of the success of his Resolution must be, if not a dissolution of Parliament—a new Government and a new Budget—an increase of indirect taxes—taxes, I presume, upon imports—and, at the same time, an estrangement from France, which I think would be very unfortunate. The country has decided, with the unanimity that I expected it would when I heard the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and I believe that Parliament will decide in accordance with the opinion of the country. Now I have some particular reasons for liking this Treaty with France. It has been the object of my most ardent wishes, and it is now the object of my most cherished affections. Not longer ago than in July last year, we had a discussion in this House upon the subject of the financial policy of Lord Derby's Government, introduced by a very remarkable speech from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire. The Chancellor of the Exchequer spoke after him, and I was permitted to address the House after them both. On that occasion I claimed the right hon. Gentleman opposite as a convert to the opinions long held, and so often advocated by the hon. Member for Rochdale and myself. I thought that the whole tenour of his speech was in favour of a better policy—better than his own Government had pursued—and better than any Government we generally have had even sitting on this side of the House—has pursued. On that occasion I took the liberty of urging the noble Lord at the head of the Government, and the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary, to attempt, if possible, to come to some arrangement with France, so that these two great countries would be united together in the bonds of common interest by the exchange of their productions. If the House will permit me, I should like, though it may appear egotistical, to read an extract from that speech. I was advising the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary, rather I was telling him what I would very much like to do if it were possible to imagine myself in his place. I said:—

“I would say to the French Government, ‘We are but twenty miles apart, the trade between us is nothing like what it ought to be, considering the population in the two countries, their vast increase of productive power, and their great wealth. We have certain things on this side, which now bar the intercourse between the two nations. We have some remaining duties which are of no consequence either to the revenue, or to protection, which everybody has given up here, but they still interrupt the trade between you and us. We will reconsider these, and remove them. We have also an extraordinarily heavy duty on one of the greatest products of the soil of France—upon the light wines of your country.’ The only persons whom, it is said, the French Emperor cannot cope with are the monopolists of his own country. If he could offer to his nation 30,000,000 of the English people as customers, would not that give him an irresistible power to make changes in the French tariff, which would be as advantageous to us as they would be to his own country? I do believe that if that were honestly done—done without any diplomatic finesse, and without obstacles or conditions being attached to it—that would make its acceptance impossible—it would bring about a state of things which history would pronounce to be glorious.”

These are the observations or opinions which I ventured to offer to the House in July last year. It was not more than a week after those observations were made, that a communication was entered into between a distinguished person in France and my hon. Friend the Member for Rochdale, with the view of discussing the possibility of carrying out the proposition I had suggested. This being so, the House will excuse me for feeling, perhaps, more than ordinary interest in the course which has been taken, and for feeling more satisfaction than I can express, that the Government has been able, by the liberality of the French Government, to come to an arrangement for the good of both countries, the extent of which it is absolutely impossible for any of us to calculate. I find very strong objections have been made to the course that has been taken. I am afraid that some of the real objections are kept in the back ground. I have been told by persons who seem to have a pedantic affection for free trade, but whose labours I never found united with mine when we were working for it, that this admirable Treaty is a violent infraction of the principle of free trade; but if any person had, in the year 1840, and from that to the year 1846, agreed to make a commercial treaty with this country, under which we were to abolish agricultural protection, or any other protection that existed, and that any country or that several countries should abolish theirs, is it to be supposed that the Anti-Corn-Law League, or any person in favour of free trade, would have shut their eyes to this great proposition of relief for this country? Would they not have accepted with enthusiasm a commercial treaty made for such a purpose at such a time? The noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs put it in a few words the other night, when he said he was in favour of commercial treaties that were in favour of free trade, but that he did not approve of commercial treaties that were not in favour of free trade. The hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate), in a speech the other night, said he regarded this Treaty as an act of submission to France, and he gave utterance to that sentiment in a manner almost tragic, so deeply did he feel the humiliation we were to endure. I have discovered that there are parties in France who say just the same thing, putting the degradation upon the French, and not upon us. I was offered liberty the other day to read a letter from a distinguished statesman, attached to the Orleanist party in France, in which the writer stated his regret that the French Government should make a treaty with England so humiliating to France, and which showed how vast were the sacrifices the Emperor of the French was willing to make for the purpose of having a strict alliance with England. Others, in this country, tell us that we are giving much more than we get. This is a thing which it is difficult to answer from a free-trade point of view; but if I could stand where the hon. Member for North Warwickshire stands, it would be very easy to answer it. And the hon. Member for Leeds to-night, in an able and eloquent speech, met that question. He showed that not only is the allegation not true, even from the hon. Gentleman's point of view, but that the reverse of it is true. If it be assumed, as Protectionists will assume, that whoever makes the greatest reductions makes the greatest concessions and sacrifices, I can demonstrate to the hon. Member, and to all who think with him, that on the face of the Treaty nothing is more clear than this, that with regard to concessions—I wish I had some other word—it does not meet my views at all to use it—the French make five times as many concessions to us as we make to them. Let me be understood as speaking now as if I were a Protectionist; and if I do not speak with common fluency in that character, I may be forgiven. It will be admitted by every one that the only articles upon which we are making a present surrender of revenue that is of importance, are the articles of wine, brandy, and silk—wine and silk being the chief; but if the hon. Gentleman were a Frenchman, he would be positively appalled at the list of articles not less important than wine and silk, but most of them far more important, on which the French are making concessions to us. There are metals of all kinds, of which we export yearly, £17,479,000; machinery, of all kinds, of which we export yearly, £3,700,000; cutlery, of which we export yearly, £3,826,000; cotton yarns, of which we export yearly, £9,465,000; cotton cloth, of which we export yearly, £37,640,000; linen yarns, of which we export yearly, 1,684,000; linen cloth, of which we export yearly, £4,302,000; earthenware, of which we export yearly, £1,313,000; woollen yarns, of which we export yearly, £3,080,000; woollen cloth, of which we export yearly, £12,032,000; leather, of which we export yearly, £1,359,000; making, together, the enormous sum of £95,280,000 sterling per annum. If the French, in place of an almost absolute prohibition of the whole of those articles, reduce the duties on them to a point from which, in all probability, a large trade will spring up, the hon. Member is too honest, too frank, and too intelligent to insist upon it, that wine and brandy and silk more than counterbalance those eleven articles I have enumerated. It is quite possible that city is ceived here is sums re, and cent.

[Second Night.]

mean ed; in stated duties
There
cent;
There

is no intention on the part of the French Government to exert their right to keep them at 30 or at 25 per cent. But when the convention is framed, and when the whole arrangements are concluded, and the trade is opened under it, I am assured by the very best authority that the result, however good the Treaty may look, will be considerably better than the Treaty. When the Treaty is in operation the tariff of France, in regard to this country, will be in full as liberal as the tariff of the United States; and your own trade and navigation returns issued the other day, show that to the United States are exported in a year £22,600,000 worth of the produce of the manufacturers of this country. The French may not be able to consume so much as the Americans; but taking into consideration the facts that I have now stated, and the figures which no one can call in question, I think we are fairly permitted to come to the conclusion that the present trade with France, which is almost nil, will in the course of a few years swell to an amount which will enable it to take rank with some of our very best customers among the other nations of the globe. If I were to refer to one particular article of this list which I have read, the article of earthenware—I might observe that an hon. Gentleman who generally sits on that (the Opposition) side of the House, and votes with Gentlemen opposite, voted the other way on Monday night. Is there any mistake as to the opinion of his constituents? It is no use in plying him with arguments of party warfare; he knows what his constituents think, and, whatever may be the opinion of hon. Gentlemen opposite, his constituents are better judges of what can be done with the produce of the English potteries, than Gentlemen who know nothing of the question. But I have a right to claim the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire as a friend to this Treaty. There was a time when he was not the leader of a “great party.” He was a giant then in another field. He vacated an elevated position there to assume one which is much more laborious. I know not that it is any more useful than that in which he laboured before. But in one of those very admirable books which the right hon. Gentleman wrote, partly for the instruction, and perhaps rather more for the amusement of his countrymen—he described the mode of living of an English nobleman of great wealth in Paris. He says:—

"Lord Monmouth's dinners at Paris were celebrated. It was generally agreed that they had no rival. Yet there were others who had as skilful cooks—others who, for equal purposes, were as profuse in their expenditure. What was the secret of his success? His Lordship's plates were always hot; whereas in Paris, in the best appointed houses, and at dinners, which, for costly materials and admirable art in preparation cannot be surpassed, the effect is considerably lessened by the fact that every person at dinner is served with a cold plate. The reason of a custom, or rather a necessity, which one would think a nation so celebrated for their gastronomic tastes, would better regulate, is that the French porcelain is so inferior, that it cannot endure the ordinary heat for dinner."

"Now the right hon. Gentleman, with an instinct which we cannot too much admire, breaks out into something like an exclamation. He says,

"Now, if we only had that Treaty of Commerce with France, which has been so often on the point of completion, and the fabrics of our unrivalled potteries were given in exchange for their capital wines, the dinners of both nations would be improved; England would gain a delightful beverage, and the French, (for the first time in their lives), would dine off hot plates."

And he concludes with an expression which I recommend to his devoted followers—"An unanswerable instance of the advantages to commercial reciprocity." One of those horrid phantoms which have been raised to alarm the country has been based—if a phantom can be based—upon the question of coal; and there is running in the minds of some hon. Members a notion that this country can do just whatever it likes at sea with regard to the question of contraband of war, and all those old subjects which have been so long matters of discussion among the nations of Europe. Now, last year, when the war in Italy was in progress, there was a discussion in the English papers, particularly in those of the party of which the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Newdegate) is a member, as to the propriety of declaring coal contraband of war. At that time hon. Gentlemen may recollect there was a statement in the papers that the French Government were building a great number of flat-bottomed boats which, it was said, were pretended to be wanted for the conveyance of coal, but were admirably adapted for landing soldiers on a sandy beach. But when these discussions were going on, and a Government not very favourable to France was in power, and the French Government did build these flat-bottomed boats for the purpose of conveying coal to their arsenals, in case England should take the foolish step of preventing its export, at that time there arrived in the harbour of Marseilles two vessels from America laden with coal, as if to show that the question as to whether coal is contraband of war does not rest with England. This question of coal with reference to the Navy of France is a mere bagatelle. I do not know whether hon. Gentlemen have read the statements which have appeared in the papers during the last few days. In the year 1858, not more than 160,000 tons of coal were consumed in the entire navy of France, and the extra cost, if you did not allow a single ton to be exported, would not be more than from 6s. to 10s. per ton. An extra cost of some £80,000 would not be much for a Government in the emergency of war, and, therefore, to raise this as an argument for not agreeing to the Treaty only shows how contracted must be the vision of the hon. Gentleman, how small his information, that he should suppose a great proposition like this could be impeded for a moment by an obstacle so small and so entirely unimportant. But another point which has been dwelt upon is, that everything that we concede is immediate, and everything that France concedes is in the future. Well, all I should say if I were a Frenchman is this, that it is a great pity that my Government does not follow the example of the English Government. Assuredly, if both countries have been greatly in error, that which soonest escapes from its error will gain the most, and it is clear that the Emperor of the French thinks that the policy of France has up to this hour been wrong. He does not object to meet you on the 1st of July this year from any doubt that he has as to the course of policy which he is pursuing; but he knows that when these great changes are made, changes met by many prejudices and fears, that he is bound to move at such a pace as that public opinion to a large extent will go with him, in order that there may be a general acquiescence in the policy which he thinks it right to pursue. The hon. Gentleman opposite, I think, remarked upon our lending ourselves to be a convenience to the French Emperor, if we agreed to a Treaty which was not necessary to us, because we could do all by the reductions of our tariff, and we did this that we might escape the difficulties of discussions in the French Chambers. We are not responsible for the constitution of the French Chambers; it will be enough for us, bye and bye, when our own House is being reformed, to be responsible for that. But even in 1846, when the free-trade cause was triumphant in the country and in Parliament, Sir R. Peel, wisely so far probably as the fears and prejudices of a portion of the people were concerned, unwisely, I think, as regarded their real interest, delayed the total abolition of the corn laws for a period of three years. I voted against that proposition; but I do not blame him for it now, and I did not seriously blame him for it then. It was a concession which every Government is called upon to make in carrying out a policy of this nature. When we had the great measure of Political Reform it was passed amid menaces and violence; those who would not concede to argument had to concede to terror. When the corn law was repealed, you had an Irish famine, and you had what hon. Members described in such strong language as a great act of treason to a political party. An act of treason to them it might be, but it was an act of the most undoubted patriotism, so far as the interests of the country were concerned. Now in this country at that time there was a gentleman whose name, I think, was Mr. Chowler, who said very extravagant things, and who was encouraged by hon. Gentlemen opposite. He said that "the farmers had more horses than any other class in the country, and what was a better thing, that they knew how to ride them, and that they would rather march upon Manchester than upon Paris." Well, I hope that Mr. Chowler is now penitent and converted. But there are men of this class in France—the French Chowlers. They say that "this Treaty would have to be rent by cannon-shot," which expressed much the same thing, but rather in stronger language even than was used in this country. There are persons in France who attack the Treaty with less genius in support of a bad cause, but, perhaps, with more faith in it than the right hon. Gentleman opposite. And we might find out somebody, if we were as familiar with France as with England—somebody the exact parallel of the Member for North Warwickshire—somebody who gets up and uses the unintelligible statistics of the party. Now, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire did not, I think, behave with the frankness which he ought to have done in discussing the question of this Treaty. He described my

[Second Night.

Mr. Bright

hon. Friend the Member for Rochdale as a secret negotiator, as if there were something not perfectly honourable and creditable in the course which my hon. Friend has taken. Now, negotiations between nations are not, so far as my reading enables me to judge, conducted in the market places. It is most desirable that these negotiations should, until they come to their final conclusion, be to a considerable extent unknown to the world. But if his negotiation was secret, it was at least successful, because I think never was a Treaty of equal magnitude, involving such vast interests, promising such great results, begun, continued, and ended, within the same space of time as this Treaty by my hon. Friend. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer spoke in much more graceful language of him. He feels, indeed, as I do, and as I will undertake to say the great majority of the people of this country feel. He spoke of him as a benefactor to his country, though undecorated and unrewarded. Sir, he is undecorated so far as those stars and crosses go, which in the history of the world, I think, have been earned as often by baseness as by merit. But he is honoured by the confidence of two Governments, and he possesses the affections of the great body of the people of this country, and as for his reward, he is rich in the consciousness that his public life has been devoted to the public good; and in whatsoever part of the world is to be found intelligent humanity, there are hearts that are ready to bless the beneficence of the labour in which he has been employed. So much, Sir, for this Treaty. It seems a work of supererogation to speak in its favour after the stamp of public approbation which has been placed upon it; but I think it right to say thus much, because my hon. Friend, who has been the main negotiator of it on the part of this country, is not present, and I am unwilling to lose an opportunity of saying how much I feel myself indebted to him for the labour he has bestowed, and the success which has attended it. But this Treaty forms but a part of the general propositions of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He proposes to sweep away—if I may so speak—that great nuisance—the complicated tariff, and he proposes to do what the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Portsmouth highly approves of, if somebody else had not to pay for it—he proposes to abolish the lated Excise upon paper. If we are to try to discover how much of good there is in these propositions—and I believe from the course of the debate that the opinion that there is great good is growing amongst hon. Gentlemen opposite; I should like to ask you now, without reference to any party struggle, whether you do not think that a penny, twopence, or threepence, more in the pound upon the income tax is not too much to pay for the great good the country will receive from the changes that are proposed? [Cries of "No, no!" from the Opposition, and Cheers from the Ministerial benches.] Hon. Gentlemen opposite, or some of them, have always said "no, no," to all propositions of this kind, that have been made during the seventeen years that I have had a seat in this House. If you go back to 1842—and here I find I am in error, because on that occasion, I believe, hon. Gentlemen opposite did with some grumbling acquiesce in the course taken by their own Government—in that year the course taken by Sir Robert Peel was exactly that which is now taken by the present Chancellor of the Exchequer. The Chancellor of the Exchequer does not pretend to any originality in his scheme. It is enough for a Chancellor of the Exchequer, if he follows the best and greatest example that has gone before him. Sir Robert Peel came into office then with a deficit of £2,500,000 for the past year and for the coming year. I think the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Portsmouth had been responsible for the finances of the country up to that period. I do not say this for the purpose of throwing anything like a slur upon the financial reputation of the right hon. Gentleman, because it is a melancholy, but a curious fact, so far as my observation has gone, that the Whig party has never yet produced a Chancellor of the Exchequer. Sir Robert Peel found that deficiency. It was a chasm something like that which the right hon. Gentleman made us believe there was in the floor of the House, only it was not quite so wide or quite so deep, as that which he described. But what did Sir Robert Peel do? He did not add 5 or 10 per cent to the taxes, which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Portsmouth had done without success. No; and he did not say there will be a deeper chasm next year, and what dreadful things will happen if we only follow this up with some direct taxation. But what he did do was this? He made the chasm deeper and wider. He found it £2,500,000, and he reduced the duties of Customs on 750 articles, by which he lost £270,000. He reduced the duty on coffee, by which he lost for a time £170,000; he reduced the duty on timber, by which he lost for the time £600,000; he reduced the duty on stage coaches, by which he lost £100,000, and he abolished export duties to the amount of £70,000, altogether being an amount of reduction almost precisely that which is caused by the Commercial Treaty with France; and he made the chasm which was represented by £2,500,000 into one represented by £3,700,000. That is exactly the course which the Chancellor of the Exchequer is now taking. Sir Robert Peel proposed, with an amount of apology and apparent fear, which, when we read it at this moment, is laughable, showing he knew the material that sat behind him—he knew the party he was leading, and he travelled with them on at a snail's pace for an hour and a half by the clock before he brought them to this perilous avowal that they were to be asked to endure an income tax of 7*d.* in the pound. At that time Sir Robert Peel knew that income tax was so unpalatable to the great owners of property who had been our legislators that he proposed it only for a very short period, but I am not sure he thought that period would see its termination. He proposed it in a manner, too, that was by no means just, because I believe that he felt that a just income tax at that time, even with his great majority, would hardly have been passed through Parliament. Well, his income tax, instead of producing, as he expected, £3,700,000, produced about £5,000,000. The chasm was filled up, there was no deficiency, and the surplus, of course, enabled him to do other things. The income tax from that time has enabled us to do other things, some of which, I am sorry to say, Sir Robert Peel would much have regretted if he had lived, and some of which, had he been Minister, never would have been done. Now, at that time, hon. Gentlemen opposite supported Sir Robert Peel. You saw the chasm of £2,500,000 of deficit; you allowed him to take off £1,000,000 more, and make the chasm deeper and wider; you supported him in a proposition of 7*d.* income tax to fill it up, and you did that although it was opposed by a very large portion of the Members on this side of the House. Well, now, why is it you quarrel with the policy of the right hon. Gentleman the present Chancellor of the Exchequer? He was then one of your Ministers. He supported this plan, and you having confidence in Sir Robert Peel, and him, and the rest of his colleagues, agreed to it all. I am satisfied that, apart from the question of party, you cannot deny that that policy has been a wise one to the country—and a just one, especially, to the great body of the people who are not the possessors of wealth. My hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, asked your attention to one or two facts—facts so astounding that if in 1842 anybody had been willing to stake his reputation upon them by stating them to the House, he would have lost his reputation, and would have been considered little better than a madman. Your exports have doubled, and almost trebled since that time. As to labourers—and here I may appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire—I recollect when driven to the last extremity for arguments, he used to say, I will rest the whole question of protection to the land upon the condition of the agricultural labourer. Is there a man on that side of the House who will deny for an instant that the condition of the agricultural labourer at this moment is better than he has ever known it? I believe since 1842 the advances of the labourer's wages—and when I speak of labourers I mean all the working classes of the country—the advance in their wages has been at the very lowest 20 per cent, and the steadiness, the continuity, and security of their labour has been increased by, at least, an equal amount. Look at your own farmers! You know they were charged with coming whining to the House for protection. They never come here now at all. Hon. Gentlemen, representing counties, do not move for Committees on agricultural distress. Your farmers are all busy at their farms, instead of coming to Parliament to ask for protection and very high prices to pay their rents, and your landowners—the most fortunate men in the whole world have survived that which threatened annihilation. You are now more prosperous in your abundance than ever you were. You have more enjoyment in what you possess, because you know the rest of your countrymen have more enjoyment than they had before. All that Providence, a stable Government, and an industrious people have showered upon you, is at this moment infinitely more secure than it was at the time when these measures were first propounded and had begun to be carried into legislative force by Parliament. Why will you not comprehend this? You do comprehend it. I have been told by Members of agricultural counties, and in the south and in the west, where free trade was most feared, and that with reference made specially to the hon. Member for Rochdale and myself, that we never did or proposed anything, and nobody else ever did or proposed anything for the agricultural interest that was so beneficial to them as the abolition of the corn laws. But, Sir, though I have spoken thus far in approbation of the Treaty, and in approbation of the relaxation of the tariff, and the abolition of the excise duties upon paper, do not let it be understood for a moment that I am not sensible to the blots which there are—to that one great blot, at any rate, which there is in the statement which the right hon. Gentleman had to make to us the other night—a very foul blot which will tarnish the character of the Government, and which, I venture to promise them, if there be not something done to remedy it, will make their term of office not at all protracted—I will say, as I said before in another place, the frightful, scandalous expenditure. Now I shall have a word or two to say to the Government on this matter, because when I am giving, as I am anxious to give, my hearty support to their general scheme, it would be unjust to my own convictions and to the interests of the country if I omitted to point out where I thought the Government was guilty of that which the whole country almost, now, and all, by-and-by, will loudly condemn. Now, I hear some Gentlemen say, £30,000,000, after all it is very cheap for the securing of the country. But, then, Gentlemen who have got the expenditure of the £30,000,000 are not a bit more secure than they were when it was £15,000,000. I have heard the first Lords of the Admiralty year after year,—and I must refer to more than half a dozen of them—year after year assure this House the defences were perfect, and the country was in an absolute state of security. I always found the successor of the first Lord of the Admiralty unsaying all his predecessor had said, and assuring us, unless we paid more than a million additional, the aforesaid security would not be obtained. There are Gentlemen also equally simple-minded, who tell us this expenditure has no reference to France. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli) did not believe in the cry of invasion; but yet the right hon. Gentleman did not rise to protest against the amount of the Estimates proposed by the Government. He left the amount of the Estimates in the hands of the Government, but felt fully confident as to their raising the amount. I cannot help saying that the whole of this matter has reference to France, and, therefore, let us not disguise it from ourselves. I believe the whole cry to have been a huge imposture—to have been a huge lie palmed on the country. I believe there is not a particle of foundation for all the panic which has been raised by many persons out of doors, and I am sorry to say by not a few persons who have seats in this House. Now, in 1853, the Chancellor of the Exchequer made a famous speech, for which people have been twitting him because he does not do now what he hoped at that time he would be able to do. Now, people cannot have money in their pockets and spend it, and no country ever went to war, more especially this country, without incurring a fearful expenditure; and if they will indulge in this luxury they will find, as they have always done, it is a very expensive one. Since 1853 your naval and military expenses have been doubled. Let us exactly see our course—and I will not detain the House more than a minute or two,—our course with France since 1853. In 1853, during the Russian war, according to my belief, the blood of your countrymen was needlessly shed in the Crimea. At the same time, in the same conflict, the blood of the subjects of the Emperor of the French was shed, I believe, needlessly also. That war concluded, you negotiated with the Emperor of the French as your friend and ally in 1856. At the end of 1856, in concert with the Emperor of the French, you were acting on the Governments of Italy, especially on Naples, and you withdrew your Minister from the Court of Naples. In 1857, you were, by a course which I think most rash and most criminal—by your Minister and Plenipotentiary in the East—you were involved in a war with China. And at that time you received—I do not know whether you solicited—but you accepted the cordial assistance and concurrence of the Emperor of the French, and of the forces which he had in the East. Well, in 1860, or rather in 1859-60 you have by the unwisdom of another of your representatives in the East, apparently another war with the Chinese. And contrary to every principle of sound policy, contrary to the interests of England both here and there, you have again engaged with the Emperor of the French to conduct operations in China, and great English forces, and a great French force, are on their way together to the Chinese seas. So, from 1853 until now, through good and through evil generally, too often through evil, you have had a close alliance with the French Government, and now, in 1860, you negotiate a Treaty of the most important character, more important, I believe, to the future of the two countries than any other that was ever negotiated between France and England. What are the instructions, and I read only one sentence from them, which the noble Lord the Minister for Foreign Affairs wrote over to Paris, addressed to Lord Cowley and Mr. Cobden, he says,

[Second Night.]

Mr. Bright

“Its general tendency would be to lay broad and deep foundations in common interest, and in friendly intercourse, for the confirmation of the amicable relations that so happily exist between the two nations.”

Not that henceforth may exist, but that now so happily exist. What does the Treaty itself say? The very first introductory clause in the Treaty says this:—

“Her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of great Britain and Ireland, and his Majesty the Emperor of the French, being equally animated with the desire to draw closer the ties of friendship which unite the two peoples, and wishing to improve and extend the relations of commerce between their respective dominions, have resolved to conclude a treaty for that purpose.”

Well, now, what can be the reason that with those instructions, with that Treaty ratified, with this perfect amity, with these more powerful than all past bonds for uniting not only the two Governments, but the two peoples—why is it we have this enormous increase of the Estimates? I say it is a wonderful inconsistency; it is altogether illogical, and somewhere or other there is a great hypocrisy—and that somebody is guilty of an immorality, the darkness of which I find myself at a loss to select words to describe. Now, if hon. Gentlemen opposite had fixed on this blot, if you could have had, shall I say, the patriotism—if the hon. Member for Essex could have moved a Resolution to this effect:—“That whereas Her Majesty's Government has recently concluded a Treaty of Commerce and amity with the Emperor of the French, therefore this House does not see the necessity for increasing the Estimates beyond £26,000,000, which were voted by Parliament last year"—if you had proposed a Resolution—for if £26,000,000 gives you no security, rely on it, £30,000,000 will not; it is not any power which is in money or oppressive taxes to secure you—if you could have proposed a Resolution like this, you would have come before the country with a character for a regard for economy and the interests of the common people, which, I say, you will not earn if you succeed with the Resolution you have submitted to the House. I should like to ask about this expenditure which I condemn, and which I think is an insult to the intelligence of Parliament and the country. Am I hostile to any interest in the country in speaking thus of this grievous extravagance? Am I supposed to be hostile to the interests of the Court? There is no rock on which so many dynasties have foundered, as the rock of reckless and needless expenditure. Am I supposed to be hostile to the interests of the aristocracy of the country? What has destroyed aristocracies more than the corruption engendered amongst them by the lavish expenditure of public money, and by the discontent which must be created amongst the people? Am I hostile to the services which swallow up for the most part these sums? The military service of the country should be the servant of the country; it should be the defender of its rights and its property; it should never be allowed to grow to an extent, and to be fed with such profusion—its appetite growing with what it feeds upon,—that it becomes not a blessing, but an evil of the first magnitude to the country. It may be that the Cabinet had hard work to make up its mind on the subject. I suspect so,—I know nothing, but having got the Treaty in one hand, and £30,000,000 of military expenditure in the other, there must be contending in the Cabinet two principles very adverse in character, and if that contention goes on for another year, we may promise ourselves another change amongst the Gentlemen who at present occupy seats on the Treasury Benches. But hon. Gentlemen have referred in language of apprehension to what the next Parliament may do. I am not much afraid what the next Parliament may do, or what the next Chancellor of the Exchequer may do. I shall be very glad if he is more economical—if he has recourse more fully to the principles of direct taxation, so far as he has already established it. But the £12,000,000 of income tax is not to come off unless by a reduction of Estimates. You cannot go back to the Excise and Customs. Let me tell right hon. Gentlemen who represent so much of the property of the country, henceforth it is written irrevocably that the vast expenses which you are incurring, not for the great body of the working people, for they seem very much alike in all the old countries in Europe, but if, as you suppose, for the defence of your property, then this vast expenditure must henceforward be charged to the property of the country. That expenditure and that income tax are inseparably bound up together, and the sooner people make up their minds to it the better. Let it not be supposed that I am speaking in favour of the income tax as it now exists. I believe, with the hon. Member for Buckingham, whose speech I am sure the House listened to to-night with great pleasure, that the income tax, as now levied, is becoming intolerable. I judge of it, for one thing, by the number of letters which every day I receive from all parts of the country on the subject, and I dare say other Members receive as many as I do. I judge of it also from what I see in letters published in the columns of newspapers, and from what I hear from those among whom I mingle. I am in favour of the income tax, so far as it is a direct tax and a tax on means. I support it now, objectionable as it is, just as I supported it in past years, because we have this present compensation for it. But the time may come—it may come next year—I think it probably will come next year, if the Estimates be not largely reduced—it certainly will—when you will be placed in this difficulty, that you cannot dispense with the income tax, and the country will not tolerate it in the shape in which it has hitherto been levied. But now the question is not of the income tax, for nobody proposes its abolition this year. The question is between the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Resolution of the hon. Member for Essex. I am in favour of the proposition of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I speak the sentiments of my constituents—I believe all but, if not actually, universally—and the sentiments of every public assembly, so far as I have seen, which has been gathered together to consider the question throughout the country during the last ten days. This scheme is a great scheme: if it had not been for those thirty millions, what a scheme it might have been! I heard the Chancellor of the Exchequer treading on the thorny path of those thirty millions, and I did think that there must be, somehow or other, a conscience, which is not always a convenient partner for a Chancellor of the Exchequer. I thought if he had the power logically to carry out his own principles, the principles embodied in the Treaty and in the tariff, there would have been a much larger reduction of duties and a much greater relief afforded to all classes in the country. He spoke of the patience of the tax-payers. Do not try that patience too far. I would not ask you to be afraid of the people; I ask you only to be just to them and just to yourselves. It is not the poor man alone who suffers from injustice. He suffers now, and heavily too; but there is a suffering hereafter if history does not lie, that shall come upon the rich if they continue expenditure and taxation which are needlessly oppressive to the poor. I say, then, this scheme is a great scheme, and, therefore, I support it. It relieves industry by the removal of Customs' duties, and abolishes one of the very worst Excise imposts that ever crippled the industry of any portion of the people. It extends the hand of friendship, not to a Government only, but to a great nation across the Channel. Amid the much darkness of Europe it is a spot of light, and opens to humanity a prospect,

Mr. Bright

"Bright as the breaking East, as midday glorious."

I think it a great measure of justice to England—a great measure of friendship to France; and I am convinced that, acting and working through the means of these two great nations, it will be found hereafter to be a great measure of mercy to mankind.

MR. WHITESIDE: Sir, there was one expression which dropped from the lips of the right hon. Member for Portsmouth which I am sure we all heard with regret, that in which he stated that he perhaps might not be in a future Parliament. I believe, notwithstanding the sneers in which the hon. Member for Birmingham has seen fit to indulge, that the character and conduct of the right hon. Gentleman, the good sense and sagacity shown in his opinions, and the moderation with which he urges them, entitle him to the respect both of his friends and his opponents. The hon. Member for Birmingham has given to the right hon. Gentleman's speech no reply. The opinions of a statesman of experience meet with no favour from the hon. Gentleman. The only impression made on the hon. Member for Birmingham in listening to the arguments of an opponent is wonder that a man can be found so irrational as to differ from him. The fears and hobgoblins that haunt the right hon. Gentleman are discussed by the hon. Member with a smile of contemptuous pity. He forgives the right hon. Baronet, because he says the Whig benches were never known to furnish a Chancellor of the Exchequer. That is the hon. Gentleman's courtesy towards a great party that has held a high position in this country, that has been led by men whose names are written in the history of England. But the hon. Gentleman has fallen into a mistake—if he will pardon me for pointing out a slight error in one who is generally so accurate. He says he will support a certain section of the administration. That is quite a mistake; it is they that support him, and he has not hesitated to announce that if they misbehave—that is to say, if they differ from him—he will dismiss them. How complimentary is this to statesmen who have long held office; especially how complimentary to the noble Viscount and the other eminent persons who assist him in the administration. But let the hon. Gentleman recollect that before now he has attempted to defeat the noble Viscount, and that in a fair fight on a former occasion he did not find that noble Lord a feeble antagonist. Parliament, he says, will agree in his views. Sir, that is the strongest argument against Parliamentary Reform that I ever heard, because if the House of Commons understands its duty, which is to watch the opinions as they may be expressed of the hon. Member for Birmingham, if they respond to all he says, no future Parliament could do his bidding more effectually and completely. Now, he means to insinuate that this is a question of which nothing is to be said but on one side, and that the best thing that could be done would be instantly to endorse every opinion he has uttered. And what was the style of his speech tonight? He informed us first, of what I was glad to hear, for I never heard them before—namely, the circumstances under which the negotiation, out of which this Treaty sprung up, was commenced. He has informed us that it all arose out of a speech he himself made. He read an extract from that speech, and I admit that it is worth hearing a second time. But having read that extract, with a modesty remarkable in him, he then pointed out how his Friend, Mr. Cobden, travelling on the Continent, and carrying that extract in his head, commenced in France a negotiation on his own account, and was then employed by Her Majesty's Ministers to effect the most glorious Treaty that was ever entered into between two great kingdoms. Now, the hon. Gentleman says, that as a Free-trader he supports this document as it stands, and expresses his astonishment that any one can be found to criticise it. Sir, some of the ablest men in this country, men of the soundest understanding, individuals who love their country as dearly as the hon. Gentleman can do, have ventured, not in a spirit of ill-will or animosity to France, but in the performance of their duty to their country, to point out the blemishes and defects to be found in that Treaty; and that, as they understand it, it is a Treaty, not of reciprocity, but of a one-sided and partial character. The hon. Gentleman has not done justice to his opponents. I have always heard that it was the custom of the great men of this country to put the arguments of their opponents more strongly than they had been put, in order that their replies might be more brilliant and decisive. But what has the hon. Gentleman said with reference to this transaction? He first gives us an account of the exports of England, and informs us of our great trade with America. Quite true. The hon. Member for Buckingham said the same thing to-night, and pointed out with all the good sense which a man thoroughly acquainted with his subject would evince, that such is our trade with America, and it would be idle to expect we could ever enjoy the same extent of trade with France. And I believe that is quite true. The hon. Gentleman then said that this Treaty was a master-piece of wisdom on the part of the French Government and a marvellous piece of liberality. And why? Because, he said, the duties on many articles were much higher than 30 per cent, but now, owing to the persuasive eloquence of Mr. Cobden, the Emperor of the French has reduced the duties to the moderate amount of 30 per cent for a given time, to be still further reduced to 25 per cent at a future time. Was he authorized to say that the great staple manufactures of England and Ireland could find an entrance to France under that scale of duties. Has he any right, in fair argument, to say that the duties will be less than that which the Emperor of the French has reserved to himself the right of making them? Has he any right to argue that they will be different from that which is expressed in the letter of the bond? I tell the hon. Gentleman I have been informed by gentlemen connected with the manufacturing interests, and as respectable as himself, that linen yarns from Ireland never could, with a duty of 30 per cent, gain an entrance into the kingdom of France. Nay, more—I have been informed that under that Treaty, so ingeniously contrived by Mr. Cobden, while under former circumstances a certain class of yarns, the duty upon which was paid by weight, could be admitted, they will now be excluded, while the finer and lighter descriptions cannot be admitted. Therefore, until we see the Convention which is to be laid on the table—until we know all the details of the measure which is to consummate that Treaty, and with which the hon. Gentleman appears to be perfectly acquainted—we shall not thoroughly understand the grandeur of the scheme propounded for our acceptance. Now, Sir, the hon. Gentleman not only spoke on behalf of the French Government, but on the part of the British Government. I saw the hon. Gentleman leave his seat and hold a brief consultation with Ministers of that section of the Cabinet upon which he smiles. No Member of the Cabinet has yet spoken in this debate; no Minister has yet indicated the policy of the Government of this country. But, somewhat unexpectedly, the hon. Member for Birmingham has undertaken the defence of a section of the Government, and of the French administration and government. Now, is he quite sure that this Treaty has been framed in accordance with the principles of free trade? Those gentlemen who write books and make speeches on the subject of free trade are a very peculiar race. When you quote their books they say—"Oh, those are written to confute you, and not to bind us." When you quote their speeches, they say, free trade is an excellent thing; but if you allude to its theory, they charge you with the antiquated principles of Protection. But what is to be thought of a Free-trader who approves in general of Treaties of Commerce? Did the hon. Gentleman ever read the Motion made by Mr. Ricardo, when that eminent person, skilled in political economy, said—"We want trade, not Treaties of Commerce, for they are opposed to our principles;" and called upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer of that day to carry out those principles and to reduce those duties in a very marked degree? Does the hon. Gentleman recollect the answer of the right hon. Gentleman the then Chancellor of the Exchequer to that appeal, when he told Mr. Ricardo that it was well the Government of England was not committed to such hands as his. Why, the very thing itself—a Treaty of Commerce—is a contradiction of your creed. Mr. M'Culloch has said it. But just let us look at this Treaty for a moment, and consider what the hon. Gentleman has told us. We find in it an Article relating to coal—an article concerning which the hon. Member has made merry. What is the nature of that Article? It is a contract between France and England, whereby England binds herself for a period of ten years not to place any duty on the export of coal. What is the effect of that Article? It strips this House of its legislative authority for that time, and this country of its power to deal with that article during the whole period of the Treaty. If the hon. Gentleman is right in his argument, what follows? A similar Treaty may be made with Portugal, with Spain, with Russia, and with every country in Europe. What becomes, then, of the principles of the creed which denounces such treaties on the ground that they fetter you. Now, Sir, with reference to the political effect of that Article: has it none? The hon. Member derides the antiquated notion of any articles being considered contraband of war. I have inquired into the opinions of French jurists upon this subject, and I will mention a significant fact. French writers held a few years ago that coal was contraband of war, but they now most suspiciously hold a different opinion, and say it is not contraband of war because it is wanted more for French consumption than for war. Then, Sir, the hon. Gentleman proceeded to inform us that of all the magnificent measures ever carried this was the most magnificent. Will he pardon me for saying that he has extended his researches but slightly into the history of Treaties of this kind if he holds that opinion. He has heard during this debate of the great Treaty of 1787, carried by Pitt. What was the character of that treaty? It was a treaty of navigation and of commerce. And why has it been eulogized by great writers on the subject of free trade? Because it was founded upon commercial reciprocity—because it secured no benefit to one country that was not enjoyed by the other, and, therefore, was equally beneficial to both. Can any one say that this Treaty is of a similar character? The hon. Gentleman cannot be of that opinion; and in discussing it fairly and freely, those gentlemen who sit here on this (the Opposition) bench are not deserting the duty they owe to their country, but performing it strictly and thoroughly. Then the hon. Gentleman says that the cost of coal to France would be very slight. That is not the question. He knows very well that the French coal is not fit for ships of war or for navigation, while the English coal is eminently so. [Mr. BRIGHT: No, no!] He says "No," but I say "Yes," and the French themselves say the same thing. The English coal is hard, and does not break into small particles. The fleet of the French Emperor, according to the accounts published of it, is to extend to 100 sail of the line, and the vessels of that fleet would lie like useless logs on the water unless they were supplied with a proper description of coal to navigate them. The hon. Gentleman then says that the French Emperor has acted wisely, as I understand him, in effecting this Treaty without consulting the Legislative Chamber of France. [Mr. BRIGHT: Not so.] I understood the hon. Member to argue that the Legislative Chamber of France was of such a character that it was a wise policy on the part of the Emperor not to consult them.

Mr. Whiteside

MR. BRIGHT: No, indeed; I did not say anything about it.

MR. WHITESIDE: Well, he certainly cast no censure on the French Emperor for not consulting his Legislative Chamber. But, in my opinion, one of the greatest objections to the principle of this transaction is this—that a treaty of this kind ought to be what the hon. Gentleman has himself described it as—namely, a treaty between two nations, and which has the assent and cordial approbation of the people of each. It ought not to be effected by an absolute ruler without taking the advice or the consent of that portion of the people who are appointed to give either.

[Second Night.]

It is one of the most unfortunate circumstances connected with this Treaty that such a chamber as France possesses, being a Legislative Chamber, has not had an opportunity of expressing its opinion upon this Treaty; and those who are the champions of a free and constitutional Government in other countries ought not to frown on the Senate, such as it may chance to be, which exists in another kingdom. But I have observed of the hon. Member for Birmingham that he is very well disposed towards absolute Powers, and has before now pronounced even panegyrics upon the Emperor of Russia and the Emperor of the French; has condemned those who ventured to impugn their aggressive policy, censured those who endeavoured to restrain their inordinate ambition; and has invariably shown rather an attachment to despotic power in foreign countries. I maintain his speeches in this House on the subject of Russia and of France were not speeches that were responded to by the English nation; and I think it is very remarkable to observe in the career of the hon. Gentleman that he seizes every opportunity of denouncing those who ventured to oppose the designs of Russia, or who have ventured to repress the ambition of the French Emperor. But, Sir, when he made his speech about Russia to-night, did he recollect that of the Cabinet—that celebrated Cabinet which drifted into a war with Russia—the present right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer was the shining ornament? Has he contemplated that that section of the Cabinet which he now befriends were Members of that unhappy Administration? Is he of opinion that they deserve censure for the part they took in that Russian war? And, as an economist, does he not know that the cheese-parings that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer sometimes recommends are mere trifles in comparison with the cost of that Russian war? If that war was wrong, then the gentlemen who conducted that war are entitled to and deserve the censure of the hon. Member for Birmingham. But I observe in the tone of the hon. Gentleman's speech something not creditable to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I observe that the hon. Member for Birmingham makes a distinction between the members of the Cabinet, and says there is a section consisting of Gentlemen sitting in that Cabinet who might be supposed to disapprove of war Estimates, to condemn the expense incurred in the defences of the country, and to hold an opposite opinion from that which they officially expressed. If I understood that rightly, as having been spoken by the hon. Member, I think he pronounced as severe a censure upon the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer and his friends as ever was pronounced by one public man upon another. If these expenses have not the right hon. Gentleman's cordial approval, if the policy of the Ministry is not his policy, if he does not in part assent to what they are doing in reference to the expenditure, military and naval, of the country, he ought to join with the hon. Member for Birmingham, and then what power could resist their united talents. The hon. Gentleman seems bent upon constructing a Ministry that shall be formed exactly conformable to his wishes; and he has intimated to the Whigs in this House, once constituting a formidable party, that the knell of their political doom is rung, and that they must no longer expect either his smile or his favour. I do not exactly comprehend what he meant by his dissertation on the corn laws, nor by his denunciation of the naval and military expenditure. Why is he not here when these Estimates are moved for? Why is he not here to perform the duty he owes to his constituents? Why is he not here to point out the extravagance, and to control and limit the expenditure he condemns so loudly in the lump? Why? because it is easier to make a speech condemning what is done by a Minister than to discharge the laborious and painful duty which a critical examination of that expenditure must impose on him, and to undertake a duty which he has never performed regarding them. I cannot understand the course the hon. Gentleman has taken. He has commanding eloquence, untiring energy, and he fears nobody; but why does he not grapple with the Minister who proposed these inordinate Estimates, and make a distinct proposition to the House and to the country? I believe that the hon. Member acts wisely and prudently, and that he suspects his proposition would not meet with the favour of the House, and that it would be sure to be dissented from by his countrymen. The hon. Gentleman condemned the war with China, and I agree with him on that subject. Mr. Cobden brought that question before the House in a spirit of fairness, and with an ability and power of argument that commanded the assent of those whom he addressed; but has the hon. Member failed to forget that he is supporting a Ministry that has now sent out another warlike expedition to China? Has he forgotten the Estimate of £850,000 that was delivered this morning as a beginning, a small beginning, for the expenses of another Chinese war, and all springing out of the policy of the chief of the present Administration, who placed that policy successfully, but as I think erroneously, on the country. Why does the hon. Gentleman, who abhors the principles of war, and who thinks this war with China barbarous and inhuman, not stand up in the House and bring the Minister to account for his conduct respecting it? The Chancellor of the Exchequer himself moved that Estimate. Why was not the hon. Member in the House? He has a taste for irony and an aptitude for ridicule, and he might have heard the master of rhetoric deliver a sentence that no human being could listen to with patience, namely—that powder and ball, and Armstrong guns, and 30,000 men, would be dispatched as messengers of peace to conciliate the Celestial Empire. Did the right hon. Gentleman imagine at the time he so represented this warlike expedition to the House, that it was in truth a message of peace and conciliation, and that the best way to conciliate an ill-used, oppressed, and injured people, was to adopt the policy pursued, and send out a mighty armament and troops to bombard and destroy the Celestial City? Why does the hon. Member for Birmingham not oppose that policy? He condemns the war in China, but by a strange inconsistency supports the Minister that makes war upon it, and passes a panegyric on the right hon. Gentleman who must have advised that war with China, who had the talent and the capacity to get us into it, but who wanted the talent and tact to get us out of it. What is the use of making vague speeches that terminate in nothing? There is no inconsistency in his own conduct, I admit, because he is in favour of peace and of peace Estimates. How does he reconcile the inconsistency of supporting a peace policy and war Estimates? They are irreconcilable. He told them the other night that if Gentlemen on the Conservative side of the House thought fit to carry out his views, that they might be sitting on the Treasury Bench, and that when those Gentleman in the Ministry whose talents they all admired, and whose abilities no one would deny, ceased to be agreeable to him, they must shift places with their opponents. My private opinion is that the hon. Member for Birmingham overrates his power. He has warned us in the course of his discursive address, in which I think he showed more industry than originality, how a former Reform Bill was carried by violence and clamour. But is it not possible that another Reform Bill might be carried by the same means? When was it the hon. Gentleman conceived that distaste for violent legislation, or clamorous appeals against the constituted authorities of the country, that he expressed to-night? I trust that the Reform Bill, when it comes, will not be carried by clamour, violence, or outrage, and that we shall have the pleasure of hearing the hon. Gentleman in a future Parliament condemn the Estimates and rise to reduce the expenditure of the country. The hon. Gentleman says he does not hate the aristocracy, and that on the whole he is no enemy to the aristocracy. Well, that is consolatory; it is an old institution of this country. I agree with him that an aristocracy that sustains itself by corruption—by a privileged abuse of its power—by a wasteful expenditure of the public money, ought to fall; but I believe the aristocracy of this country will stand, notwithstanding the assaults of the hon. Gentleman—that it will stand by reason of the useful services rendered by its Members in the other House of Parliament to their countrymen by unflinching patriotism and their exalted wisdom. The hon. Gentleman has not said much upon the merits of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and his Budget; will he allow me to say a word, and to pay to that right hon. Gentleman a just compliment? I heard the right hon. Gentleman's speech on opening his Budget for four hours without once winking. I could not do more for Cicero; but, Sir, the light of reason dispelled the delusion and chased away the enchantment. When I considered the subject-matter of his speech, I was convinced against it by the inexorable logic of facts. The hon. Member for Coventry designated the Budget as an ambitious Budget; another hon. Member characterized it as an audacious Budget; and if I may express myself more modestly and measuredly, I would say it is a bold experiment on the country. The right hon. Gentleman spent the first hour of his speech in explaining, with painful particularity, the amount of his deficit. The right hon. Gentleman seems to me on certain occasions to represent himself in Parliament as an injured political economist, who is endeavouring, but in vain, to stem a torrent of wasteful expenditure perpetrated by a spendthrift Parliament. Having created and explained his deficit, he said if his policy were carried out you would have an overflowing exchequer; but it was necessary, he said, at the same time to point out the disturbing causes which exhausted our resources, and what are they? The Russian war, which he himself counselled and advised. I admit that the right hon. Gentleman has the talent to fill the Exchequer, but he has likewise the cleverness to empty it effectually. The Member for Birmingham, a man of sense, must know that a mistaken war will cost more than all the niggardly economy of half a century will save. Having moralized on the Russian war, he proceeded to inform us what were the disturbing causes which reduced his balances. I was asked by an East Indian whether the right hon. Gentleman had made in the House a speech about China, and whether he had stated that the expense would be half a million for the invasion of China. I said I thought he did. "Then," said my informant, "the Budget is a myth." He then asked me, "Did you ever hear of the war with Persia?" But I answered I knew nothing about it, and I think, in saying so, I speak the sense of nine-tenths of the House of Commons. It was a war carried on by the noble Viscount on his own account. Mr. Layard was so unlucky as on one occasion to ask the noble Viscount a question about the Persian war. He got an answer that brought down peals of laughter on the unfortunate interrogator, and the subject was never alluded to afterwards. But, said the questioner, are you aware what the bill was for the Persian war two millions, notwithstanding the short comparative distance of Persia from a country where arms, ammunition, and troops were? Well, said this Gentleman, you may be sure that if the war with China is a reality, and if the business is to be done, the Chancellor of the Exchequer ought to have fixed the cost, and modestly fixed it at four millions. The paper of this morning makes a beginning of £850,000—a figure which ought to recommend itself to the attention of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham.

Mr. Whiteside

[Second Night.

Mr. Whiteside

I appeal to the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether that is not a disturbing cause in his Budget, and I think he will leave the lucky Gentleman who succeeds him a deficit of twelve millions, as the hon. Member for Portsmouth said, including the indefinite expense of the Chinese war, combined with his lamentations that he could not give us a more generous Budget. Having pointed out his deficit, one would have supposed that the right hon. Gentleman would have exercised his marvellous ingenuity to show us how it might be supplied, but, instead of this, he proceeded with indefatigable industry to make still further and greater gaps in his revenue. Having explained what sum had to be paid, he went on simply to propose a double income tax. Now, if he wishes to know why we venture to oppose him on the Budget, I will tell him. My notion of the character of his speech was, that he sincerely regretted that the income tax was not greater, and that if he could he would make it more—not having the fear of the hon. Member for Birmingham before him, who, I remember, resolutely said last Session that if he were alive, he would, in the next Parliament, face and confront, and put down, the Minister who would presume to maintain that most odious of all taxes ever invented by statesmen. He has performed his threat, and kept his word. He is here to compliment the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the income tax. I think that a Gentleman whose ideas of political economy are so accurate and clear, has altered his own opinion, and that when the good time comes, and the new Parliament arrives, and the Whigs are scattered to the winds and their party shattered into fragments, that then the great system of direct taxation to which he had alluded would be carried out effectually by a brilliant triumvirate consisting of himself, the hon. Member for Rochdale, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Now, what did the Chancellor of the Exchequer do when he made an hiatus in his revenue? He said, you must take away the duty on wine. Suppose there was no Treaty with France, still it might be said if you could reduce the duty on tea and sugar, paper and wine, you would. The right hon. Gentleman misunderstands the policy of Sir Robert Peel. That policy was not to dry up sources of revenue. His policy was to reduce the duty on consumable articles, expecting, and wisely so, that by a greater consumption the revenue would be increased? Now, what is the ground on which the Chancellor of the Exchequer ushered in his views? Was there anything more unfair or unsound than the analogy he presented to the House to induce it to adopt his proposal first of a 3s. and then of a 1s. duty on wines? "Wine," he said, "was said to be the rich man's luxury. The same was once said of tea, but it was reduced and became the poor man's necessary, and if you follow my advice the same consequences will follow." He put it very eloquently—but it was a brilliant fallacy. Consider the nature of the article, and the class of the consumers—consider the history of taxation in every country in Europe, and it would be seen that there never was a more unjust analogy. The Chancellor of the Exchequer asked why should not the article of tea be called a luxury as well; but the masterly authority of Adam Smith differs from him, for when he distinguishes, in his able work, articles which are necessities from luxuries, he places the article of wine in the category of luxuries, and declares his opinion that it should be taxable as such. M'Culloch, in writing on taxation, is of the same opinion. All the authorities are against the right hon. Gentleman. The analogy he puts defeats his argument, namely, the great consumption of tea. I have looked through the whole of the returns, not merely in this country, but in Belgium and France, and the facts are just the converse. No more interesting paper can be read than the Report of the Commission of Inquiry sent from Paris in 1849 to examine into the cause why wine was not consumed more largely in Belgium after the differential duty in favour of French wines in that country. The question the Commissioners had before them was whether wine might not be largely consumed in Belgium, and what habits tended towards the consumption of that article. They investigated that subject with the acuteness for which Frenchmen are remarkable, and the result was that in exact proportion as you find tea, and cocoa, and coffee, and beer consumed by the masses, will you find wine consumed precisely in the opposite degree. So here likewise the same results will follow, and the writers on political economy pointed to that very fact. They constructed tables to prove, and to prove to demonstration, that the article of tea is unlimited in consumption; that tea may be consumed by the young, the old, the sick, the strong man and women; but that wine is to be put in an opposite category. Therefore, the analogy contended for by the right hon. Gentleman—namely, that wine would be consumed in the same way as tea was utterly unsound, and was contradicted by the very facts found recorded in the books to which I have referred. Now, what authority had he for showing that wine would greatly increase? Was it Sir Robert Peel, or was it Pitt? Why, Pitt raised the duty on wine, and at the time when the duty was the highest the consumption did not fall off, and he got the most money. What was the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman himself on the subject? Why, when I desire to answer the Chancellor of the Exchequer, I will appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford. He has himself given the reason why the whole of his plan is impracticable. I will now read to you what the right hon. Gentleman himself said on the subject, and I never heard anything more satisfactory. Indeed, I should not be surprised if I induced the right hon. Gentleman to withdraw his Budget. The right hon. Gentleman in 1853 said:—

"I will first mention an article of importance in which we can make no change, and that article is wine. I refer to this tax, as it is a tax of peculiar susceptibility, and the cause of an agitation out of doors which is almost as perilous to the wine duties as certain climates are to the growth of wine itself; and because it is desirable that if the House and the Government think no change can be made in the duty, that opinion of the House and the Government should be clearly and intelligibly expressed."

And he then said, as is customary with gentlemen of that school, there are three courses to take:—

"There are three plans, any one of which may be followed with regard to wines. One would be to reduce the duty to a low uniform duty of 1s. 6d. or 2s., or at most 2s. 6d. the gallon."

Now, recollect the effect which also must attend the present scheme:—

"Now, you cannot do that unless you are prepared to sacrifice an amount of revenue for the first year of, at the very least, £700,000, besides an additional difficulty in regard to the drawback on stocks on hand."

We have not heard what the drawback will be now. I think the answer of the right hon. Gentleman was a little vague on that subject—

"With respect to which," he goes on, "it is not impossible that the Government might form a sturdy Resolution, to which the House of Commons might be induced not to concur. But whether that be so or not, a loss to the revenue of £700,000 on the article of wine is very serious, and the importance of the change in connection with its cost will not, we think, advantageously bear a comparison with other objects which the Government have in hand. Another plan would be to fix a duty of several rates on wine of different values, somewhat resembling the duty on different qualities of sugar. But if that is attended with difficulty in the case of sugar, with how much greater difficulty would it be attended in that of wine? It has many recommendations certainly, and this among them, that it would admit low classes of wine at a smaller loss to the revenue."
[Second Night.]

That is as good now as it was then.

"But the revenue departments will have the greatest difficulty in carrying out such a system. It would be complex in its operations; the wine trade, almost to a man, are opposed to it; and I cannot say that public opinion is so much in its favour as to induce us to attempt to carry it into effect. That being so, there is no choice for us but to say that, whatsoever be our opinion of the operation of the present wine duty, we are unable to propose any change in it, and we must pursue the third and only remaining plan—that is, to retain the existing duty. While we cannot propose any change in it at the present time, neither can we see any definite or early prospect of a change hereafter."

Now I would ask the House whether that argument is not as good an argument now as then. Will you answer this question? Are you abolishing the wine duty from a sincere conviction that you are abolishing it wisely and safely; or are you abolishing the duty in consequence of the French Treaty, and nothing else? Why, when the wine merchants held their meeting, they stated that the plan of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was impracticable—that is, the alcoholic test. I happen to know a gentleman who went to Paris to see the way in which they test the alcoholic strength, and he said, "It will require a chemist to do it; the plan, for quick and ordinary business, is impracticable." Now, one word about the paper duty. This Treaty stated the fact, that French paper is to be introduced into this country; and in the same document the raw material from which they make paper is prohibited being exported to this country. Do you call that commercial reciprocity? It is commercial reciprocity on one side. While I hold that a treaty which gives reciprocal duties to be right, for that reason I hold this Treaty to be wrong. The right hon. Gentleman wound up his financial scheme in a short and summary manner—that is, by doubling the income tax. I will not enter into the character of that tax. I forgive the right hon. Gentleman many mistakes. I forgive him the result of the succession duty, as I consider he carried that measure with great ability; but his calculations, though elaborate and ingenious, were wrong. I do not censure him on that ground, but what I cannot understand, and what I never will submit to patiently and silently, is, to hear a gentleman of his attainments and his position inform me of the character of the income tax, and then tell me to double and to adopt it. I recollect one sentence of the right hon. Gentleman as to the whole policy of the income tax. It did him the highest honour, and I have never forgotten it since, and I will venture to say, if the right hon. Gentleman will resume his old position, and perhaps a higher position than he now holds, one independent of office, the representative of the learning, piety, and wisdom of the country, he would, I think, feel forcibly the appeal he made to Parliament in reference to that tax.

Mr. Whiteside

"No doubt the income tax has a great many recommendations as part of the permanent revenue of the country, but there are also great objections against it. One is a moral objection, for I believe it does more than any other tax to demoralize and corrupt the people, not from the extent of its levy, not from the fault of those who levy it, but from the essential nature of the tax itself."

Here, then, we have a statesman of the highest character informing us in the same speech in which he stated that he had studied the subject with the deepest and closest attention announcing that the income tax is the most demoralizing and corrupt of any. Having established that great truth—having shown that it is a demoralizing tax—that it changes the manly virtues of the Englishman into the opposite vices—makes him a deceitful, scheming, hypocritical, lying character; sometimes, it is true, exhibiting remorse and repentance by making restitution. If this tax is to be doubled, then, according to the right hon. Gentleman we are to double the immorality and double the corruption of the country. Now, Sir, I agree with him in that opinion, which he deliberately expressed. I believe, as he declared, that of all taxes the income tax is the most mischievous. He has given me no sufficient reason for now increasing its immorality and doubling its corruption, and, acting on the opinion he proclaimed, with all the fervour of conviction, I must say that I never will consent to the Chancellor of the Exchequer doubling a tax which is the most vicious in our system of taxation, which demoralizes and corrupts our country. How a Gentleman can call on the House of Commons to double that tax without holding out the slightest chance of amelioration, but rather pointing to an increase and future addition to that tax, how he expects us to be convinced by such arguments passes my comprehension. It is a tax which corrupts society, and therefore I oppose it. I believe the wine duty ought not to be reduced, and therefore I object to its reduction. I believe the paper duty ought not now to be repealed, although, as the right hon. Member for Portsmouth says, it may hereafter most properly be reduced, but not now. I believe, according to the speeches of the right hon. Member for Carlisle and the right hon. Member for Kidderminster, some few years ago, that where a deficiency exists you ought not to draw bills on futurity and leave to another year all the confusion of the finances of the present which your impolicy may have created. For these reasons, I, for one, think that the Treaty requires to be reconsidered, and reconsidered in three or four important particulars, and that the Budget of the right hon. Gentleman, considering the circumstances of the country, is unwise and inexpedient, and ought to be resisted.

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, the lateness of the hour conspires with the admonition which the speech of the right hon. and learned Gentleman who has just spoken furnishes to warn me against any vague observations on general subjects. I shall, therefore, confine myself, in the course of the remarks which I am about to make, to that which is the legitimate question under the notice of the House. The Resolution which has been submitted to us by the hon. Member for Essex sets forth, I must admit, most candidly and fairly the policy of the party to which he belongs. He protests against the whole scheme of the Government, rather than raises objections to particular provisions. He calls upon the House in the most explicit manner, to reject the Treaty with France, and to give its assent to none of those great and important remissions of taxation which are proposed in the financial scheme of the Government. He does not seek, in short, to kidnap a single vote, but invites hon. Members to go with him into the lobby upon grounds the most intelligible and direct. Let us, then, clearly understand the position in which the country is placed. You are now called upon to provide the largest military Estimates which probably any legislative assembly was ever called upon to vote in a time of peace. This financial year is, moreover, rendered remarkable by the fact that there will be a large remission of the public burdens consequent on the falling in of the Long Annuities. Now how, let me ask, ought we, under these circumstances, to proceed? The hon. Member for Essex contends that the £2,000,000 and upwards which we gain by the remission I have just mentioned ought to be taken advantage of with the view of reducing the income tax. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, on the other hand, invites you to avail yourselves of this sum to enable you to pursue still further that great and beneficial policy from which such invaluable results have been experienced. But let me for a moment call your attention to the Estimates; and in doing so I may perhaps be permitted to say that I think the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down has—considering those obligations under which he and his Colleagues were formerly placed by the hon. Member for Birmingham—displayed to-night the quality of political gratitude to but small advantage in commenting upon the lucid and brilliant speech which that hon. Member has addressed to the House. But to return to the subject of the Estimates; I am perfectly free to admit that I think great honour is due to the Government by which we have been preceded in office for having called upon Parliament to sanction an increase in our expenditure with the object of placing the honour and safety of the nation beyond dispute. And I feel assured that, whatever may be the success of political parties, and to whatever side the smiles of fortune may incline, the hon. Member for Birmingham will find, when he appeals to that public opinion which, he says, is the last resort, that there is no subject on which the people of this country are more unanimous than they are with respect to that which involves the maintenance of our naval and military services upon a footing calculated to secure the safety and honour of the country, unlimited and unmodified by mere financial considerations. Having those large Estimates, then, to provide, with the view of securing that object, and having a remission of over £2,000,000 on the public burdens owing to the falling in of the Long Annuities, next comes the question whether you are to adopt a policy of stationary finance, or to take another onward step in that policy of progressive finance to whose benefits we are each and all of us witnesses. Hon. Gentlemen opposite, indeed, desire that we should deal with other sources of revenue than those which my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has fixed upon for the purpose of meeting our increased expenditure. They have, however, failed to inform us on what articles contributing to the comfort and enjoyment of the people at large additional taxation to supply the deficiency between our income and expenditure is to be raised. In 1852, the year preceding that in which the great increase in our Estimates took place, the revenue derived from those other sources to which hon. Gentlemen seem desirous particularly to draw our attention was £48,000,000. In the present year you have an increase of nearly £14,000,000 in your naval and military Estimates, as compared with 1852, for which you have to provide; and is the whole of that sum, let me ask, to be made up by the income tax? Why, if you take into account the produce of the income tax in 1852, as contrasted with its estimated amount for the present year, you will find that the additional sum raised by the tax is only £5,500,000. Whence, then, comes the remainder of the large increase that has taken place in your naval and military expenditure? From those other sources of revenue to which you refer. But, you will say, the argument on this head fails, because those other sources are not the subject of remission of taxation. The greater amount which is now raised from them is, then, the result of the prosperity of the people, you have increased the sources without adding to the burden on the community that we are to take another step in it. Since 1852, when the revenue yielded by Customs and Excise by the aid of the income tax has been obtained, and through the agency of the income tax you are now able to remove from the public shoulders a burden greater than the large increase that has taken place in the navy and military expenditure for which we have to provide. But the hon. and learned Gentleman who has just sat down says, we are not taking another step in the course which Sir Robert Peel began. Sir Robert Peel, he says, understood the instrument with which he worked, and he adopted a plan by which when he removed taxes he added to the productiveness of the revenue. I forget whether the hon. and learned Gentleman was in Parliament at the time; but let me ask him whether he remembers when the duties on glass, cotton, wool, and a hundred other articles entirely disappeared from the Customs? When we repealed the duty on glass, bricks, soap, and other articles, and when we now propose to repeal the duty on paper, is it the doctrine of Gentlemen opposite that in no shape do we return the revenue to the Exchequer, because we cannot obtain it from those very articles themselves? Do you not increase the industry of the country? Do you not give more employment, and add to the wages of those employed; and, by stimulating consumption, add at the same time to the commerce of the country and to its revenue? The hon. and learned Gentleman appealed to Adam Smith. I do not know whether he is deep in the study of Adam Smith's works; but seventy years ago this doctrine was laid down in his book, that if you were to reduce the Customs' duties to a small number of articles in general consumption, you would find that the net results would not be diminished, and that your trade would be greatly increased. And so we have found during the last fifteen years, when step by step we have, through the agency and instrumentality of the income tax removed burdens, increased the means of industry, and added to the comforts and consuming power of the community. The policy we have pursued has conferred innumerable benefits on the country. It has trebled your foreign trade, added to the wealth of every part of the community, diminished the expenditure for pauperism and the returns of crime, and, indeed, produced almost every social benefit that the wisdom of the Legislature could confer. But we have heard to-night of the great importance of the foreign relations of the country. We have heard of the extensive trade that has under this enlightened policy been carried on with the United States of America. Since 1842, when this policy began, we have had frequent disputes with the United States, and it will be recollected that in 1846 there was a feeling of the deepest anxiety lest those disputes should involve us in the calamity of war with that country. In the year just passed we have had a misunderstanding with the United States, but no feeling of anxiety was felt by the public on the subject. Why? Because such had been the growth of commercial intercourse between the two nations in the interval—so strong were the commercial recognizances into which the two nations had entered—so great the securities they had mutually given for the maintenance of peace—that no man believed that any carelessness or neglect or want of wisdom on the part of either Government, or of both, could be the cause of war between them. If that has been the case with respect to the United States, what may we not anticipate from the present Commercial Treaty with France? Is there any commodity which France produces that we do not want or any that we produce that France does not want? Some gentlemen talked as if French wines were naturally hateful to the English constitution; but is there the slightest foundation for the idea that the produce of the one country can be injurious to the other, and can any good reason be shown why the population of the one country should not desire to enjoy the productions of the other? The two nations—the greatest and most highly civilized of the world, appear destined by nature to consume each other's produce. Yet our trade with France is not so great as with Holland or the Hans Towns. And why have we not a large trade with France? We had one once, but the Treaty which arose out of the national jealousy of France put an end to it, and in this respect was the most successful for its evil purpose of any that has ever been negotiated. David Hume, a hundred years ago, wrote in this strain respecting the trade that had been destroyed between the two countries. He said—

[Second Night.

“Our jealousy and hatred of France are without bounds. These passions and prejudices have raised innumerable barriers and obstructions in the way of commerce, and we are commonly accused of being the aggressors. What is the result? We have lost the French manufactures, and our woollen manufactures have been transferred to Spain and Portugal, where we pay a higher price for what we get. Every new vineyard in France formed to supply us with wine would necessitate the establishment of an equivalent manufacture to supply them with English goods.”

But that is not the view taken by Gentlemen opposite. They are such enthusiasts in free trade, these recent converts, that they will not allow you to introduce free trade through the agency of a treaty which would put an end to the protection that originated in a treaty. But the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite seemed to be horrified at the idea of free trade in France being introduced under the constitution of things now existing in that country, and even, as he seemed to think, in opposition to the constitution under which the French people lived. Suppose the French had reached that stage of progress when they are prepared, not to adopt free trade pure and simple, but only in the shape of a commercial treaty—why, if the conditions of the Treaty are favourable to us, and if it is a recommendation to France that the object should be carried out under the form of a treaty—why should we not be permitted to treat with them in that shape? We have had considerable difficulty in converting hon. Gentlemen opposite; after long years of exertion we have now satisfactorily accomplished that task; why then should not the Government be permitted to pursue with regard to the French that plan which will most recommend to their feelings the great objects of commercial freedom? Of one thing I can assure the hon. and learned Gentleman; when once a nation has begun to taste the benefits which freedom of commerce necessarily confers, their own experience will lead them to walk onward in the same course. Probably not twenty years will expire before the most determined opponent of these liberal measures now existing in France will be as cordial, as enthusiastic, a supporter of them as the hon. and learned Member himself. The hon. and learned Gentleman objected to have these commercial relations with France except in a perfectly constitutional manner; the right hon. Baronet the Member for Portsmouth (Sir F. Baring) objected to have them at all. The policy of the French in Italy did not please him, and therefore he did not see the use of making a commercial Treaty with them. On the other hand, Sir, I believe our policy should be to break down the barriers which have so long separated the two countries, by introducing the products of the one to the consumption of the other; and by so doing I feel assured we shall be conferring on mankind as well as on ourselves a benefit and a blessing second only to that which accompanied the downfall of Protection itself in this country. Sir, there were many points in the hon. and learned Member's speech on which I should have liked to offer some observations, but already we have passed the hour at which it would have been possible to enter on those parts of the question. Before I conclude, however, I wish to say another word with regard to the case put by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Portsmouth. He looks with dismay at the future prospects if this financial scheme be carried; but he did not tell us in what way the dismay was to be remedied by the adoption of different counsels. If we have a large expenditure to meet—and no one more cordially than myself believes that, in the present circumstances of the country, it is absolutely necessary to incur that great expenditure—but if that great expenditure must be incurred, the ways and means must be provided. We have had an able speech to-night from a distinguished financial authority; he ended by landing us in a deficiency of £2,000,000, offering no suggestion as to how that should be supplied. Probably he would recommend an export duty on coal. The hon. Baronet the Member for Stamford had not solved the problem how the deficiency could be met without an addition of taxation. To what new tax did he refer?

[Second Night.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: None whatever. I took the Chancellor of the Exchequer's own figures.

MR. CARDWELL: So far as I could make out, the hon. Gentleman did not tell us how the deficiency should be made up. The question simply turns on this,—how

£2,000,000 the produce of the to be utilized? The Member for North Essex diminishing the income tax. t, on the other hand, says: ; sum of £2,000,000 in a hall remove the pressure from the shoulders of the shall unfetter industry; mulate trade; which shall nfort of the people; which eir powers of expenditure ndation of future additions of the Exchequer." There ed a considerable period o advance has been made commercial freedom. We sell have had the beneficent experience of the great experiment of former years. We have a more loyal and contented people, and the same produce of the Exchequer as before that great experiment was made. I say it is a narrow and short-sighted policy to renew the income tax, and pass no remedial measures for the benefit of the people. I say he who so proceeds is like that person who in the severity of winter and the pressure of distress shall consume his seed-corn. The man who now adopts the better policy, by which the temporary sacrifice of revenue, with an addition of corresponding amount, shall be made in order to produce increased resources for the future, is a wise husbandman who meets the temporary emergency by a temporary sacrifice, and commits to a fruitful soil that seed which he knows from former experience will speedily return to him in a large and an abundant harvest.

MR. NEWDEGATE moved the adjournment of the debate.

Debate further adjourned till To-morrow.

House adjourned at One o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, February 24, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1st Charitable Uses.
3^d Indictable Offences (Metropolitan District); Endowed Schools.

SPAIN AND MOROCCO.

QUESTION.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, he wished to put a Question to the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. Their Lordships were aware that the Spanish troops had obtained considerable advantages over the Moors, and that in consequence of their recent victory and the capture of Tetuan the aspect of affairs in Africa had undergone a considerable change. He understood that negotiations had been going on between the Moorish authorities and the Spanish commander; and he saw it stated in the newspapers of that morning that Marshal O'Donnell had made proposals for a peace between the two countries. The terms which he offered to the Moors were stated to be, that an indemnity should be paid to Spain for the war, that the Roman Catholic religion should henceforth be respected in Morocco, that commercial stipulations should be entered into between the two nations, and that the territory which the Spaniards had occupied by force of arms should be made over to them as a permanent cession. With the first two conditions England was not particularly concerned; but he conceived that she had a material interest in the other two. The Spaniards were, no doubt, perfectly entitled to enter into any commercial or financial arrangements with Morocco, but this country was obviously interested in seeing that they did not, whilst securing advantages for themselves, impose indirectly restrictions upon the commercial privileges which other nations already possessed. He wished, therefore, on this head to ask the noble Lord whether he was in possession of any information as to the commercial stipulations under negotiation between Spain and Morocco, and whether he had any objection to produce the papers on the subject. The last condition of the proposed agreement—having reference to the cession of territory—was of still greater moment to this country. It appeared from the printed correspondence that on the 22nd of September the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, alarmed at the reports which prevailed as to the intentions of Spain in regard to the retention of territory she might have acquired by arms, wrote to Mr. Buchanan our Minister in Spain for information on the subject. The noble Lord stated that the British Government had no intention whatever of placing any obstacles in the way of the Spaniards, so long as they limited their operations to the reparation of the injuries they had suffered from the Moors, and the vindication of national honour; but that if the outrages of wild Moorish tribes were to be made a ground for the cession of territory, Her Majesty's Government were bound to look to the security of Gibraltar; and he therefore instructed Mr. Buchanan to ask for a written declaration of the intentions of the Spanish Government on that point. Mr. Buchanan accordingly applied to the Spanish Government for information on the subject; and the Spanish Minister replied by a rather wordy communication, which furnished little definite indication of the intentions of his Government. Mr. Buchanan was thereupon desired to renew the subject of which, Lord John Russell stated, the importance could not be overrated. He received for answer that the Spanish Government felt it difficult to state the exact nature of the guarantees they might find it necessary to demand, but that at all events they would not vary the intentions they had formed from the beginning of the question, not to occupy any point on the Straits, whose position would afford to Spain a superiority dangerous to the navigation. Now, it was clear that what constituted a position dangerous to navigation was one thing in an English and another in a Spanish point of view. He wished, therefore, to ask whether the Government were in possession of any reliable information on the subject, and if so, whether they would have any objection to lay it on the table? The correspondence closed at a point which left the intentions of both Governments in doubt, and the impression to be derived from the communications on both sides was far from satisfactory. If the Spanish Government determined to hold permanent possession of this territory, they would hold the ground from Ceuta southeast to Tetuan, and it was not quite clear that they did not intend to occupy ground in a westerly direction from Tangier. Such an occupation might easily become dangerous to our navigation and the security of Gibraltar, and was a question which could not fail to be regarded with interest and solicitude by the Government of this country.

LORD WODEHOUSE said, that as the noble Earl had only given him notice that he intended to ask him whether the information published in The Times of that day was correct, relative to the terms of peace offered by Marshal O'Donnell to the Moors, he should confine himself to answering that question, and should not enter into the other matters to which the noble Earl had referred. The intelligence received by the Government was that—besides the demands specified in The Times, for the cession of the territory conquered by Spain, including Tetuan, the payment of a large indemnity, and concessions as to commerce—Marshal O'Donnell had demanded that a port on the Atlantic coast, near the Canary Islands, should be ceded by Morocco to Spain, and that Spain should have the right to establish a diplomatic agent and a Roman Catholic Mission at Fez.

DIVINE SERVICE IN THEATRES.

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON, in rising, pursuant to notice, "to call attention to question the Liturgy of the Church was not used, and that there was merely an extempore prayer and a sermon. But he thought that would be begging the question. To him it seemed wholly unimportant whether the clergymen preached an extempore or a written sermon, or whether he used one form of prayer or another. It was enough to know that he was ministering in a theatre. But these parties were, he was persuaded, the cause of great and serious evil. In both the services in question an example had been set which, by and by, might have a dangerous tendency. He would never hesitate to enter his protest against a practice which, though adopted on the plea of promoting the spiritual welfare of the humbler orders of the community, he believed was injurious to true religion, and would end in materially undermining the foundations of the national Church. If there existed such a great desire among the working classes in the metropolis to hear the Word of God, would not all the churches be filled to overflowing? And yet it was a notorious fact that the services in most of the City churches were attended by not more than fifty or sixty people. Besides, if there was really a need for providing services for the poorer classes, why not make an appeal to the country? He was certain that such an appeal would not be made in vain, and it would surely be better than establishing a precedent of this description. He had a sincere love and veneration for his own Church, and would yield to no man living in the desire to see the Word of God propagated; but, however much he might honour the motives of those who promoted the services in question, he entirely dissented from the mode in which they sought to give effect to them. The present state of things was worthy of the careful consideration of the right rev. Bench. Had they or had they not the power of directing these proceedings, if to religion? Had they looking the practices common at George's-in-the-East? If it was high time that it should be placed in their power, he looked upon this with great regret, because it would be productive of a total disregard for religion, and that, far from producing the effects which its promoters would lead to utter confusion in religious questions in the minds of the people. Believing that these services would neither convert the unbeliever, reform the scoffer, or convert the waverer, and that they would end in utterly disappointing the hopes of those who had originated them, he should move the Resolution of which he had given notice, leaving it to their Lordships to deal with it as they thought fit:—

"That the Performance of Divine Service at Sadler's Wells and other Theatres by Clergymen of the Church of England on Sunday Evenings is calculated to injure rather than advance the Progress of sound religious Principles in the Metropolis and throughout the Country."

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY said, that he gave the noble Viscount who had brought forward this subject the fullest credit for the purity of his motives, and for his sincere desire to promote the interests and dignity of the Church of England. With regard to the questions of law which the noble Viscount had put to the Episcopal Bench it was true, as the noble Viscount had represented, that some years ago the course of which he complained would have been open to ecclesiastical censure; but since the period to which the noble Viscount referred an Act had been passed for extending the liberty of religious worship; and, having regard to the provisions of that Act, the course complained of could not be said to be illegal. With regard to the question whether that course was one of which the Bench of Bishops approved, he (the Archbishop) would say, and he believed his reverend Brethren would concur with him, that, had they been asked before the course of proceeding was adopted of which the noble Viscount complained, whether they considered its introduction would be proper and expedient, their answer would have been in the negative, inasmuch as our associations are altogether opposed to the idea of making use of a theatre as a church. But the matter had not been so brought before them, and the question now before their Lordships was, not whether these services should be introduced, but whether, having been already so introduced, their Lordships were prepared to interfere with a view to their suppression. He (the Archbishop)—and he believed many of his Brethren would concur with him—must say that he was not. Their Lordships must not forget that in this crowded metropolis there were great numbers of persons whose feelings and associations are entirely different from their own: who are not less opposed to regular religious services, and regular places of worship, than the feelings of others are opposed to the connection of religion with the scene of theatrical representations. Neither could he subscribe to the statements of the noble Viscount as to there being such ample accommodation for religious worship in the consecrated buildings of the metropolis. It was too well known to him (the Archbishop) that for the poor and outcast there was not such accommodation; and it must be borne in mind that it was not for the upper or for the middle classes, but for the outcast and poor, who had no other accommodation provided for them, that this attempt was made of which their Lordships were called upon to express their disapprobation. If persons, of whom there are too many, who close the doors of the church against themselves, or if others against whom the doors of the church are practically closed for want of room,—if some of those can be induced, either from curiosity, or any other motive, to attend Divine service even in a theatre,—if some could be induced to hear the Word of Truth, perhaps for the first time, in those unhallowed places—if some of those who came, possibly to scoff, remained to pray—he (the Archbishop) could not find it in his heart, even if he had the power, to shut the gate against them, or to take upon himself the responsibility of discouraging those who had provided them with means of hearing the word of God, which otherwise might never have reached their ears. His counsel was to leave these services to find their natural level—they had not originated them—why should they interfere to prevent them?

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY: * My Lords, however unwilling I may be to address your Lordships on this or any other subject, I believe that, as I am certainly the only culprit in this House, and as I have been one of the principal movers in originating these services, your Lordships will naturally expect me to give you some information on this subject. I rise, therefore, not to justify but to explain; although I should have thought that even the superficial knowledge which everybody must have of the condition of this metropolis, and the difficulties and dangers which beset society here, would have been quite enough to have carried conviction, and have satisfied any reasonable mind. But if your Lordships desire it, and will bear with me, I will state the motives which have actuated myself and others in this movement, the mode in which it has been conducted, and the results which we have attained.

Now, the first argument urged against these services is, that between them and the associations connected with a theatre there is an utter incongruity. Well, I admit that the case is an abnormal one, and I am not going to find fault with those who feel startled by the proposal to hold religious services within the walls of a play-house. It is natural that such a feeling should be entertained; and, indeed, I myself have shared it to a certain extent. In deference to this feeling we have done everything in our power to procure other buildings in which these services might be performed. The necessity to do something for the vast multitudes in the east and south of London was overwhelming; and minute inquiries were made for any large rooms or open spaces in which Divine worship could be celebrated. Nothing of the sort, however, could be found, and we were therefore compelled to hire theatres as being the only places fit for the reception of any large body of people. My Lords, among the masses to whom religious services are altogether unknown, who are rarely or never visited, the greatest possible repugnance is found either to church or chapel—to anything, in short, which bears the least appearance of a registered place of worship. I have heard many of these people say over and over again that they never had been inside any place of worship, and that they never would enter one so long as they breathed. Possibly such a prejudice may in time be overcome, but meanwhile we have to deal with it. Now, there are music-halls which might have been hired, although not so capacious as the theatres; but these places were rejected because, in almost every instance, they are connected with taverns; and it was apprehended that great mischief would follow if those who were expected to attend were brought into any such connection. But before going further I will notice one of the most monstrous assertions I have ever heard. Surely that may be called monstrous which is quite inconsistent with truth. The noble Viscount (Viscount Dungannon) said that ginger-beer bottles were opened and oranges cried during Divine worship just as during the theatrical performances. Now, having myself attended some of these services, I can solemnly deny any such statement. What might have been going on outside question the Liturgy of the Church was not used, and that there was merely an extempore prayer and a sermon. But he thought that would be begging the question. To him it seemed wholly unimportant whether the clergymen preached an extempore or a written sermon, or whether he used one form of prayer or another. It was enough to know that he was ministering in a theatre. But these parties were, he was persuaded, the cause of great and serious evil. In both the services in question an example had been set which, by and by, might have a dangerous tendency. He would never hesitate to enter his protest against a practice which, though adopted on the plea of promoting the spiritual welfare of the humbler orders of the community, he believed was injurious to true religion, and would end in materially undermining the foundations of the national Church. If there existed such a great desire among the working classes in the metropolis to hear the Word of God, would not all the churches be filled to overflowing? And yet it was a notorious fact that the services in most of the City churches were attended by not more than fifty or sixty people. Besides, if there was really a need for providing services for the poorer classes, why not make an appeal to the country? He was certain that such an appeal would not be made in vain, and it would surely be better than establishing a precedent of this description. He had a sincere love and veneration for his own Church, and would yield to no man living in the desire to see the Word of God propagated; but, however much he might honour the motives of those who promoted the services in question, he entirely dissented from the mode in which they sought to give effect to them. The present state of things was worthy of the careful consideration of the right rev. Bench. Had they or had they not the power of directing or of checking these proceedings, if found injurious to religion? Had they the power of checking the practices complained of at St. George's-in-the-East? If not, he thought it was high time that such a power should be placed in their hands. For himself he looked upon this state of things with great regret, because he feared it would be productive of un-mixed evil—of a total disregard for religious forms—and that, far from producing the good effects which its promoters anticipated, it would lead to utter confusion in religious questions in the minds of the people. Believing that these services would neither convert the unbeliever, reform the scoffer, or convert the waverer, and that they would end in utterly disappointing the hopes of those who had originated them, he should move the Resolution of which he had given notice, leaving it to their Lordships to deal with it as they thought fit:—

Viscount Dungannon

“That the Performance of Divine Service at Sadler's Wells and other Theatres by Clergymen of the Church of England on Sunday Evenings is calculated to injure rather than advance the Progress of sound religious Principles in the Metropolis and throughout the Country.”

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY said, that he gave the noble Viscount who had brought forward this subject the fullest credit for the purity of his motives, and for his sincere desire to promote the interests and dignity of the Church of England. With regard to the questions of law which the noble Viscount had put to the Episcopal Bench it was true, as the noble Viscount had represented, that some years ago the course of which he complained would have been open to ecclesiastical censure; but since the period to which the noble Viscount referred an Act had been passed for extending the liberty of religious worship; and, having regard to the provisions of that Act, the course complained of could not be said to be illegal. With regard to the question whether that course was one of which the Bench of Bishops approved, he (the Archbishop) would say, and he believed his reverend Brethren would concur with him, that, had they been asked before the course of proceeding was adopted of which the noble Viscount complained, whether they considered its introduction would be proper and expedient, their answer would have been in the negative, inasmuch as our associations are altogether opposed to the idea of making use of a theatre as a church. But the matter had not been so brought before them, and the question now before their Lordships was, not whether these services should be introduced, but whether, having been already so introduced, their Lordships were prepared to interfere with a view to their suppression. He (the Archbishop)—and he believed many of his Brethren would concur with him—must say that he was not. Their Lordships must not forget that in this crowded metropolis there were great numbers of persons whose feelings and associations are entirely different from dirty poor,—the working people such as we visit. Astley's, the Surrey Theatre, and the Bower Saloon are all very near the district, as well as many concert-rooms of a low character. The district is notorious for vice. Granby Street, Waterloo Road, is the chief place for fallen women in this neighbourhood. In this street and the next there are supposed to be more than 100 women who live on the wages of iniquity. They are not so wretched in their appearance or their homes as are those at Westminster, nor are they so accessible. The women who keep the houses do all they can to keep me from speaking to the inmates. It is at the doors of the houses that I have my interview with them. In describing the state of the district the depravity of the juvenile population must not be overlooked. It is at the Sunday evening ragged school that much of this is seen. The conduct of many of the youths is abominable; their language is outrageous, and cannot be repeated. Human nature is seen here in some of its darkest shades. But for the ragged school things would be worse with this class than it is."

Evidence may be multiplied without end. Here is the opinion of the rev. Mr. Weeks, whose testimony no one could gainsay:—

"The late incumbent of this district, the rev. Mr. Weeks, has been recently appointed Bishop of Sierra Leone, where he was before for many years a missionary of the Church Missionary Society. He was for years incumbent of the district, and, after gaining much knowledge of its condition and the habits of its population, he remarked in a printed statement which was issued by him, 'I can testify that the moral and religious condition of St. Thomas's, Lambeth, will bear no comparison to that of Sierra Leone, on the west coast of Africa, with which I was connected as missionary for twenty years.' We mentioned in our introductory remarks, that St. Thomas's district had at present no church. Contributions have been for many years collected for the erection of one. And it is a remarkable fact, as illustrative of the heathenish condition of parts of London, even as compared with the distant parts of the globe to which foreign missionary societies send labourers from England, that £29 14s. 6d. has been contributed from native congregations in Sierra Leone towards the proposed new church for this part of Lambeth."

My Lords, I maintain that, in order to know what is the condition of the people, it is necessary to go among them, not only by day, but by night, and to visit them early and late in their dens and recesses. It is necessary to see them under all their conditions and in all their phases if we desire to become acquainted with their precise character, to examine their peculiar habits, and, as it were, their natural history; and I defy any one who has penetrated into their retreats, not to come back in terror, dismay, and shame at finding that among a great number of people in this country there should exist a state of things so perilous and so disgraceful.

Not but that the special religious services of the last two years have produced good fruit; and when the noble Viscount taunts me with my early prediction, and says, that great benefit has not arisen from those services, I reply that, regard being had to the means which the promoters of the movement have had at their disposal, they have come up to and even exceeded our expectations. By a letter to myself from the incumbent of one of the largest parishes in Southwark it appears that nearly 100 artisans from that parish had gone to Exeter Hall because they liked the style of the service there, and what was the result? why that, instead of being absentees from the parish church a large proportion had become habitual attenders on Divine worship. This is the way the heaven works; and if a taste for God's Word is thus excited in men's minds, they will settle down by degrees either as members of the Church of England or of some one of the Nonconformist bodies.

Another and very material fact to be borne in mind is the peculiar character of a large portion of the people of London. Considerable numbers are nomad in their habits: not less, perhaps, than 50,000 or 60,000 persons in the metropolis are in an almost constant state of motion, seldom being stationary for more than two or three months. The statement in my hand proves the migratory life, either from taste or necessity, of the population:—

"The missionary," says one witness, "has been for the long period of fifteen years labouring in the district, and certainly not without result, although that result would doubtless have been more apparent but for the migratory character of the people. He estimates that of the 600 families visited by him, about 300 annually remove."

Again, the books of a school in ——— district showed that, with an average attendance of 380 scholars, there has been an average of 340 new scholars every year.

"I have to deplore," says another, "constant changes of residence on the part of the people. Often the missionary had no sooner obtained a footing in a house than its occupiers removed. In one street, on going round, he had found all gone."

And yet, let it be remembered, that the City missionary must revisit the whole of his district once every five weeks. But the most remarkable evidence received on this point came from a most amiable and efficient minister, the Rev. Albert Rogers. That gentleman stated—

the walls of course I do not know; but I can quote statements made by clergymen and Nonconformist Ministers who have attended these ministrations from the first of January down to the present time, in order to show that nothing could have surpassed the order, decency, and attention of the persons present. I have myself attended three of these places, in each of which there were 3,200 people of the lowest description; and during the whole of my experience I have never seen a body of men so attentive to the great truths that the preacher addressed to them.

I do not deny that the associations of a theatre are, to a certain extent, incongruous with such services; but is it more incongruous than for a Christian Missionary to enter a heathen temple, defiled, as it may be, by every impure and cruel rite, and there announce to the listeners the truths of the Gospel? Many a Minister of the Church of England is compelled, during his ministrations, to go into the worst places, and exercise his sacred functions even at the death-bed of a prostitute in a brothel; but, as he is engaged in his duty, the place becomes sanctified by the duty he performs. Surely, the noble Lord is passing the most complete condemnation—it is he, not I—on all those that go to a theatre on a week day, when he says that a theatre is so foul that it is impossible to entertain in it a high and holy thought; that the Word of God cannot be preached there even on a Sunday without desecration, and without casting a stain on the character of a Minister of the Church of England. If then, theatres be such foul places, even on a Sunday, and with religious services, what must be the condition of those who enter them on a week day, when they must be at the very depth of foulness and secularity!

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON denied that he had stated what the noble Lord attributed to him. What he had said was, that there was a class of persons of a serious character who objected to what passed in theatres, extending even to immorality, and he had asked whether those persons could approve public worship in those places on Sundays. He had never said it was impossible for well-disposed persons to go to theatres, nor had he found fault with those who went to them.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, I understood the noble Lord to say that a theatre was a place where even on Sundays no holy sentiment could be felt, and I justly inferred that if that be the case on Sundays, it must a fortiori be far more so on week days. Now, let me point out what is the true history of this movement. Those who are really acquainted with the state of a great portion of the people of this country, and particularly of the metropolis, have long beheld it with dismay and apprehension. I believe I may state, without fear of contradiction, as the statement is founded on minute inquiry, that not two per cent of the working men in London attend any place of worship whatever. In the inquiry before their Lordships' Committee on Church Rates, Dr. Hume, of Liverpool, gave the following evidence, which, bad as it is, gives a result more favourable than for London.

The Earl of Shaftesbury

“Do you think, he is asked, that the active progress of irreligion is one of the phenomena that now surround us?—If your Lordship will allow me to read a few numbers, I think those will speak for themselves. In Southwark there are 68 per cent who attend no place of worship; in Sheffield there are 62; in Oldham, 61½; in Lambeth, 60½; in Gateshead, 60; in Preston, 59; in Brighton, 54; Tower Hamlets, 53½; Finsbury, 53; Salford 52; South Shields, 52; Manchester, 51½; Bolton, 51½; Stoke, 51½; Westminster, 50; Coventry, 50. I have taken 34 of the great towns of England, embracing a population of 3,993,467; and 2,197,388, or 52½ per cent of the population of those towns, attend no place of worship whatever. The population is growing very rapidly in our large towns, and religion ought to grow with at least equal rapidity, but is not doing so. Our population in England is rapidly increasing; but it is still more rapidly becoming a town population. In 1851 we had 9,000,000 in towns of 10,000 people and upwards, and only 8,000,000 in smaller towns, in villages, and in rural districts; and at the close of the present century I believe that 70 per cent of the gross population will be seated in large towns. Therefore, if our large towns are left to themselves, practical heathenism must inevitably soon outgrow Christianity.”

Listen to the statement of a City missionary in Lambeth. These are mere representative instances, samples of what is generally prevalent:—

“At 1 o'clock the public-houses open, when it is no uncommon thing to see more than 100 men waiting for the opening of the three gin-palaces at the Marsh Gate, and in the evening to find these places full of men and women, who feel themselves more at home here than they do in their wretched apartments. The New Cut is as notorious for its places of amusement as for its Sabbath-breaking or its drunkenness. The penny gaff, or Olympic Circus, still exists, and there is reason to fear it is doing a world of mischief. No respectable person goes, so they have it all their own way, and corrupt the minds of youths without rebuke. The Victoria Theatre is well attended. The company may be seen standing at the doors about four o'clock. They are almost exclusively the dirty poor,—the working people such as we visit. Astley's, the Surrey Theatre, and the Bower Saloon are all very near the district, as well as many concert-rooms of a low character. The district is notorious for vice. Granby Street, Waterloo Road, is the chief place for fallen women in this neighbourhood. In this street and the next there are supposed to be more than 100 women who live on the wages of iniquity. They are not so wretched in their appearance or their homes as are those at Westminster, nor are they so accessible. The women who keep the houses do all they can to keep me from speaking to the inmates. It is at the doors of the houses that I have my interview with them. In describing the state of the district the depravity of the juvenile population must not be overlooked. It is at the Sunday evening ragged school that much of this is seen. The conduct of many of the youths is abominable; their language is outrageous, and cannot be repeated. Human nature is seen here in some of its darkest shades. But for the ragged school things would be worse with this class than it is."

Evidence may be multiplied without end. Here is the opinion of the rev. Mr. Weeks, whose testimony no one could gainsay:—

"The late incumbent of this district, the rev. Mr. Weeks, has been recently appointed Bishop of Sierra Leone, where he was before for many years a missionary of the Church Missionary Society. He was for years incumbent of the district, and, after gaining much knowledge of its condition and the habits of its population, he remarked in a printed statement which was issued by him, 'I can testify that the moral and religious condition of St. Thomas's, Lambeth, will bear no comparison to that of Sierra Leone, on the west coast of Africa, with which I was connected as missionary for twenty years.' We mentioned in our introductory remarks, that St. Thomas's district had at present no church. Contributions have been for many years collected for the erection of one. And it is a remarkable fact, as illustrative of the heathenish condition of parts of London, even as compared with the distant parts of the globe to which foreign missionary societies send labourers from England, that £29 14s. 6d. has been contributed from native congregations in Sierra Leone towards the proposed new church for this part of Lambeth."

My Lords, I maintain that, in order to know what is the condition of the people, it is necessary to go among them, not only by day, but by night, and to visit them early and late in their dens and recesses. It is necessary to see them under all their conditions and in all their phases if we desire to become acquainted with their precise character, to examine their peculiar habits, and, as it were, their natural history; and I defy any one who has penetrated into their retreats, not to come back in terror, dismay, and shame at finding that among a great number of people in this country there should exist a state of things so perilous and so disgraceful.

Not but that the special religious services of the last two years have produced good fruit; and when the noble Viscount taunts me with my early prediction, and says, that great benefit has not arisen from those services, I reply that, regard being had to the means which the promoters of the movement have had at their disposal, they have come up to and even exceeded our expectations. By a letter to myself from the incumbent of one of the largest parishes in Southwark it appears that nearly 100 artisans from that parish had gone to Exeter Hall because they liked the style of the service there, and what was the result? why that, instead of being absentees from the parish church a large proportion had become habitual attenders on Divine worship. This is the way the heaven works; and if a taste for God's Word is thus excited in men's minds, they will settle down by degrees either as members of the Church of England or of some one of the Nonconformist bodies.

Another and very material fact to be borne in mind is the peculiar character of a large portion of the people of London. Considerable numbers are nomad in their habits: not less, perhaps, than 50,000 or 60,000 persons in the metropolis are in an almost constant state of motion, seldom being stationary for more than two or three months. The statement in my hand proves the migratory life, either from taste or necessity, of the population:—

"The missionary," says one witness, "has been for the long period of fifteen years labouring in the district, and certainly not without result, although that result would doubtless have been more apparent but for the migratory character of the people. He estimates that of the 600 families visited by him, about 300 annually remove."

Again, the books of a school in ——— district showed that, with an average attendance of 380 scholars, there has been an average of 340 new scholars every year.

"I have to deplore," says another, "constant changes of residence on the part of the people. Often the missionary had no sooner obtained a footing in a house than its occupiers removed. In one street, on going round, he had found all gone."

And yet, let it be remembered, that the City missionary must revisit the whole of his district once every five weeks. But the most remarkable evidence received on this point came from a most amiable and efficient minister, the Rev. Albert Rogers. That gentleman stated—

"As the late incumbent of Regent Square Church, the district attached to which contained about 10,000 souls, of whom some 6,000 or 7,000 were poor, and having laboured among them during a period of nearly seven years, I am capable of forming a very decided opinion respecting the habits of the lower classes. I had laboured with me between thirty and forty district visitors, one or two curates, and three lay agents, and their unanimous testimony was to the effect that our united efforts for the good of the poor, and especially of the poorest, were almost paralyzed in consequence of their roving character. Repeatedly whole streets in the lower parts of the district have been cleaned out of their inhabitants, and a new colony has arisen in it in the course of a few weeks. Some houses were occupied by thieves and prostitutes, who generally have no certain dwelling-place. Our schools suffer in proportion to the roving habits of the parents of the children, and it would not be difficult, from the statistics of the schools in London, to prove the migratory character of the poor."

Now, these migratory habits of the people render it impossible to bring to bear upon them the ordinary parochial machinery of the Church. Moving, as they do, from one point to another, it stands to reason that, in this manner at least, they can never be reached. But something must be done, and that speedily; for, although matters have greatly improved within the last twenty years, and are still improving, yet the state of things is of the most fearful description. I am speaking correctly when I say that, although the regular depredators and thieves of London—those who live by perpetual breach of the law and nothing else—may not, according to the inquiries I have made, exceed the number of 3,000, yet there is a large floating class of the most dangerous description in the metropolis, who get their daily sustenance by jobs of all kinds, small trades, and by picking up money here and there, not in a violent or fraudulent way, but of whom it may certainly be predicted, that if there should be, from any cause, but a momentary suspension of order and authority, they would, to the number of 100,000, be let loose upon the property and lives of the inhabitants; and sure I am that their terrible excesses would throw the riots of Nottingham and Bristol into the shade. A moment's sight of the populace when aggregated in Houndsditch, Petticoat Lane, Rag Fair, the New Cut, and other such places, would be better for proof than whole volumes of Reports, and endless speeches founded upon them. No evidence, however full, no language, however strong, is adequate to the truth. It must be seen, and felt, and tested, by personal contact with the people themselves.

The Earl of Shaftesbury

Such are the classes whom I and my friends desire to soften and to render amenable to order and civilization. They must be won, and for that purpose resort must be had to everything that is true and legitimate. For this purpose I rejoice to say that many Churchmen and Nonconformists have joined together in a common effort. The question now is, shall these vast masses be left in ignorance, or shall they be brought in this way to a knowledge of the truth? Is the evil of thus opening the theatres comparable to the evil of abandoning the people to total darkness? I may be told that a Committee of your Lordships' House, appointed at the instance of the Bishop of Exeter, has produced a very admirable Report, recommending a variety of measures for the diffusion of religion. Very true; but, in the first place, I doubt whether that project will ever be carried into effect; and, in the next, I am not quite certain that, if carried into effect, it will be in any degree successful. The old prejudices will still continue against church and chapel. But your Lordships have been told by the noble Viscount that there is church and chapel room in many parts of London sufficient to contain the largest congregations. It is not so in fact, but let it be so for the sake of argument. How will that overcome existing prejudices? In the first place, the preacher may not be attractive; yet these wild and irregular people must be conciliated; and, in the next, the church or chapel may be at too great a distance from the abodes of the poor. Reference has also been made by the noble Viscount to the City churches; but the City is entirely denuded of its population on Sunday, and, in many parts, even on the week days; the churches are surrounded by tenements converted into warehouses, and even if the clergymen could compel the people to attend Divine Service, their congregations would never exceed forty or fifty persons each. The City churches are altogether useless for missionary work.

My Lords, I must maintain that in an endeavour to bring these poor people to a knowledge of sacred things, we must have no little regard to their habits, their feelings, and even their prejudices. They are men of like passions with ourselves, of the same capacities for virtue and vice, for time and for eternity. It is by our neglect, and by the neglect of those who preceded us, that they have been reduced to their present condition. We have given them no help in matters where it was impossible that they should help themselves; we have permitted every physical and moral mischief to grow up around them, tainting both body and mind by their poisonous influences; and it is not for us to censure or ignore the weaknesses that our own misconduct has created. We may not treat them with indifference, and say that, unless they conform at once to our rules and systems, they shall receive nothing at our hands. Why, consider, there are many who dislike to show their faces during the day. It is a fact, that the afternoon services are never so well attended as those in the evening; and for this reason, that many of these unhappy beings are so filthy and so ill-clad that they are ashamed to come out in the light and expose themselves to the public gaze. They creep forth under the shadow and shelter of night, and thus occasionally attend the evening service.

But there is a lower stratum of humanity still; and this, too, must be reached. We cannot stop in what we have begun; and we are resolved to go deeper and deeper, and use every legitimate and every available appliance for the purpose of spreading a knowledge of God's truth among the destitute and outcast population of London. My Lords, I assert that it is not the locality that can desecrate the word of God, but it is the word of God that consecrates the locality; and here is a proof. The noble Viscount has spoken of disorderly scenes in one of the theatres. There has never been any disorder. When the people, unaccustomed to such things, entered for the first time, and took their seats, there may have been a great deal of bustling about; but I defy the noble Viscount to produce a single human being who will venture to say that he was present during the time the services were going on, and saw or heard anything that would have been objectionable in the most devout and pious congregation ever assembled within the walls of a church. Now for the proof of what I have asserted. At the opening of Sadler's Wells on the 1st of January, a most indefatigable and admirable clergyman of the Church of England, officiated—the Rev. Mr. Owen—well known during the fury of the cholera at Bilston. What was his description of the conduct of the people? The adults, he said, entered the building quietly enough; but about 500 or 600 boys in the upper gallery made considerable disturbance by shuffling their feet and calling out to one another. Before the services began Mr. Owen rose, and addressing the boys, told them he had come to do them good here and hereafter; that if they would be quiet and listen to what he had to say, he should thank God for their presence; but if their object was to create a disturbance he entreated them to leave the place. From that moment to the close of the services, which lasted an hour and a half, "you might," to use the words of Mr. Owen, "have heard a pin drop." Was that no triumph? Was there here no moral discipline?—no hope for good and lasting effects? The services began with a plain hymn, then a chapter of the Bible was read, then an extempore prayer was put up by the minister, then another hymn, and then a sermon. Must we not regard it as a great moral victory, that a minister of religion, by simply announcing to a motley crew that he had come to preach to them the Word of everlasting life, had persuaded 2,500 persons—the mass of them unaccustomed to any religious services whatever—to sit quietly for an hour and a half, and listen to the glad tidings of the gospel? At the Victoria Theatre there occurred a remarkable scene. A well-known man was going in. One of the policemen present said to a City missionary, "You should not admit that person; he is one of the most dangerous men in the district, and will make a terrible disturbance; it will take four of us to carry him to the station-house." The missionary allowed the man to pass. His conduct throughout was admirable; and next morning the missionary called upon him at his own house, and the man suffered him to read the Bible and offer up a prayer. Was that no triumph? Was there here no prospect of better things? Had not clergymen and Nonconformist ministers described in touching language the good impressions they had seen produced? The experiment, in fact, has been attended with wonderful and encouraging success. This letter, dated the 6th of February, which I have received from Sir Richard Mayne, will show how the people have behaved themselves in circumstances so trying and so novel:—

"Before answering the inquiry in your letter I thought it best to make special inquiry on the subject. I have now the satisfaction to acquaint

membered Merthyr when there were only seven houses in it, but at the last census the population had risen to 15,000. The clergy in his diocese were all anxious to do their duty; but how could they be expected to cope with the spiritual wants of such an enormous population? They were told there was a great number of Dissenters in the diocese. They admitted it, and were thankful that it was so. Dissent in Wales originated in a great degree in the apathy of the Church of England, but it had been augmented a thousand fold by the inability of the clergy to supply the wants of the church while the population had been increasing to so great an extent. The Prelates of the Church were conscious of the evil associations of a theatre to which the noble Viscount (Viscount Dungannon) had alluded. But what were they to do? If he (the Bishop of Llandaff) was called on to elect between allowing Divine worship in theatres, and seeing thousands of the population perishing in their sins, he could not but remember his Saviour's command, to go into the highways and hedges, and compel them to come in. He hoped the debate might result in calling the attention of the Government to the great and pressing want of spiritual accommodation which prevailed, not only in the metropolis, but in many parts of the country. As for appeals to the public, the noble Viscount must have read the Report published last year of the evidence taken before the Committee of the House of Lords on the subject of church rates. The subject of appeals to the public was over and over again referred to in that Report, and clergymen said that they were completely secularized by having to make constant appeals in order to obtain the necessary funds for the Church.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, it was desirable that no misapprehension should go abroad with reference to the position assumed by the right rev. Bench on this question. The discussion had been of so extremely interesting a character, and had elicited so many facts with which their Lordships could scarcely have been expected to be acquainted, that he trusted it might stir up a desire to remedy the evils which had been so forcibly pointed out. But they must not allow themselves to be so far carried away by the noble Earl (the Earl of Shaftesbury) as to conceive that the plan he had so eloquently and feelingly set forth was the only one by which those evils could be met. He (the Bishop of London) believed they were really indebted to the noble Viscount for having brought this subject before the House. He had done so in the most temperate and quiet manner. Nothing but the conviction that he was conscientiously discharging a duty could have induced him to bring the question under their Lordships' notice; and he (the Bishop of London) for one did not regret that he had done so, even though he should eventually consent to withdraw his Motion, which he (the Bishop of London) trusted he would do. But it would be said, if the evils were so great, and the remedy proposed by the noble Earl was so efficacious, it was surely the duty of the heads of the Church to put themselves distinctly in the front of this movement. It had been said that neutrality appeared to be a wrong position for a Bishop to assume in this matter. A few nights ago he stated that the position which he himself had assumed was, more or less, one of neutrality. He would now state why he had assumed that position. The noble Viscount, in his opening address, would have had their Lordships to suppose that this was a public movement which the heads of the Church sanctioned. But it was obvious to all now that it was a private movement—a movement of certain private individuals, who, feeling deeply the responsibility cast on them as Christian men, living in a community which was in a very abnormal state, determined to try an experiment, not perhaps consonant with the general feeling of the Church, but yet one which they thought might result in great good. He (the Bishop of London) thought they had acted wisely in not consulting the heads of the Church in entering on an experiment which might not, after all, have been successful. He was glad in not having been invited to take public part in this matter, but rather that the right rev. Bench should be asked to allow it to take its course, and then, when they saw that it was really attended with good, say whether or not they could give it their sanction. The noble Viscount argued that a few years ago a clergyman would have been suspended for taking part in the services in question. He (the Bishop of London) did not know that that would have been the case. He could hardly think that it would. At all events, the most rev. Prelate had pointed out the change that had taken place in the law within the last few years. It was not illegal, and nothing could make it so but an inhibition from the Bishop. The noble Earl did not speak with very much respect of an episcopal inhibition, but had intimated that the question might be tried in a court of law. Supposing, however, that an inhibition were legal, would the noble Viscount, after hearing the statements which had been made that evening, say that it was his (the Bishop of London's) duty or that of the Bishop of Winchester, in whose diocese some of those theatres were situated, to drag before a court of law any clergyman who, from conscientious motives, took part in these services? Surely no one would wish that if this were not illegal now, he should take steps to make it so. He was aware that a Bishop's power was not altogether dependent on inhibitions. One word from the most rev. Prelate of his entire disapproval of this movement would, no doubt, have at once induced the clergy to bow to his revered authority and cease to take part in these services. But the right rev. Bench felt that they would be taking upon themselves a very grave responsibility indeed in expressing any such opinion in the face of a mass of human beings whom either they or their forefathers had hitherto sorely neglected. Could they, dare they, call upon the clergy, either by inhibitions or by other means, to refrain from ministering to these persons? The right rev. Bench did not feel called upon to prevent the clergy from engaging in this work. At the same time, he was not prepared to say that he went entirely with the movement. There were several things in it which he did not like. The associations connected with a theatre created a certain dislike to the use of such a building for religious purposes; but on mature reflection, he did not know whether this was not an objection founded on feeling alone, and whether, therefore, the conflict was not one between mere feeling and the deeper call of duty and of principle. With regard to the effects of theatrical entertainments, to which allusion had been made, he did not know whether one result of this movement might not be that theatres would become something better than they had ever been before. No doubt it was a great evil that there should be so much mixed up with a theatre which rendered it impossible for Christian people to avail themselves of it as affording a highly innocent and improving amusement; but it was, nevertheless, a popular amusement, and, perhaps, a better state of things in connection with it would result from the present movement. They might be thankful if this were so. He begged that their Lordships would not go away with the impression that, because this great experiment was being tried, no other efforts should be made in the same direction. Other buildings more suitable for Christian worship might no doubt be found; and, above all, he did not doubt that if an appeal were made to the country to consider how great was the mass of irreligion and indifference which required to be grappled with, funds would be forthcoming, if it depended on funds, for the extension of our parochial system. True, they must wait long before churches could be built; but they need not despair on that account, and meanwhile it would be well if those who felt strongly against this movement would see that the churches we had already were thrown open to the poor as freely as possible. It might be very difficult to lure them in, but at present they were not lured in but locked out. No idea seemed more deeply ingrained in the minds of many officials in our parishes than that the abject poor had no right to be accommodated in our churches. In this and other ways, perhaps, important results might flow from this movement. They were not to accept it as the best which could be originated; but that it had been productive of good few could doubt, and he hoped that many other efforts of a kindred nature might be made to promote the same ends.

The Bishop of Llandaff

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON said, that what had passed left him still unconvinced that evil might not arise from turning places of public amusement into places of public worship. Throughout the country there was a strong feeling that such practices involved a desecration of God's holy ordinances. But he should not regret having brought this subject before their Lordships if it had the effect of inducing the community at large to consider these things, and see how a remedy could be best applied to those crying wants which the noble Earl (the Earl of Shaftesbury) had so forcibly described. It had never, however, been his intention to put the House in, perhaps, the invidious position of having to express an opinion upon this subject. He was satisfied with the discussion which had taken place, and should now withdraw the Motion.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR had been forcibly reminded by this discussion of a

you that the people attending religious worship in the theatres and public places mentioned in the memorandum have conducted themselves with great propriety. There has not been cause for the police interference on any occasion."

On the 23rd (for I was desirous of having the latest information), Sir R. Mayne again wrote:—

"The conduct of the people continues to be most decorous. I have been able to reduce the number of police on duty at each of the places since my letter to you of the 6th of February."

He had reduced the number of constables at our theatres; and yet at that very time he had sent, of necessity, sixty policemen in full uniform to attend the services and keep order at St. George's-in-the-East!

Again, I say, was that no triumph—was nothing gained there? Was the contrast, though painful, not instructive? Is it nothing to find that if we only speak to the people in a kind, straightforward, sincere, open, and earnest manner, we may govern their affections, and keep them in obedience and good order? My Lords, what the people of England want is, not patronage, but sympathy; the bringing of heart to heart, the acknowledgment on the part of persons of all conditions, of all degrees of wealth, that they are men of like passions with themselves, with the same hopes, the same aspirations, the same fears, and the same destinies. If any Prime Minister of England, and those associated with him in the Government, will only show that sympathy, especially in its highest and most solemn form, the people might be led like a flock of sheep.

The question will naturally be asked, What are the numbers of those who have engaged in these services, and upon whom so happy an influence has been exerted? Observe, my Lords, it is not in a single instance only that good effects have been produced, nor have audiences been attracted by the mere novelty of the thing. These services have been going on since the 1st of January, at five different theatres during the first five weeks, and at seven since last week. The total number of people who attended at the seven houses which were open on Sunday last was 20,700; and allowing, for the sake of argument, a deduction of 10 per cent for people coming from mere curiosity, there would still remain 18,630 persons who had come to hear the word of God, and who had never before frequented any places of public worship. I am aware of the assertion that these people do not belong to the lowest class, which has never yet been reached, and that these services only serve to withdraw good folks from the churches and chapels they ordinarily attend. But this has been disproved in the most emphatic manner by the experience of all those who have been present at any of these celebrations. I do not deny that there is a still lower class than that which has hitherto come to these services, a class which we shall have much difficulty in reaching; but we have, I maintain, most certainly got at a very low class indeed by means of this movement. A City missionary writes:—

The Earl of Shaftesbury

"I have been really astonished at the multitude of persons who are attending these services out of very low neighbourhoods, and who previously altogether neglected public worship."

The incumbent of St. Matthew's, St. George's-in-the-East, a young minister, who has been very zealous in going about among the poorer classes, and has acquired much experience of their character, states:

"I have preached at the Obelisk in Southwark, in Ratcliff-highway; I have preached for two seasons on the steps of the Royal Exchange; and last Sunday I preached at the Garrick Theatre. The place was densely crowded by persons of a class I never before got at."

Mark these words, my Lords, "never before got at," from a person so conversant with these classes.

"I have carefully inquired," he adds, "from the City missionaries, and I find that their meetings are better attended, a deeper religious feeling pervades them, and their access to the homes of the people is much more easy."

Another experienced clergyman says—

"These characters, and such as they, do not, and will not, attend the ordinary ministrations of the Word of God in church or chapel. They have an aversion to cross the threshold of a place of worship, where they think their appearance would be a subject of remark."

The same testimony is borne by the Rev. Newman Hall, the distinguished minister of Surrey Chapel, who states that the class of people who attend the Special Services are just those whom we are most anxious to improve. But let me read to your Lordships, in illustration, two short letters, giving an account of these celebrations. They are well worthy of attention. The first is from a very eminent Nonconformist Minister, the Rev. Mr. Graham:—

"In connection with the united committee," he writes, "I preached in the Victoria Theatre last Sunday evening to a great concourse of people. The assembly was of the most heterogeneous character, but the great body of the hearers were evidently such as never enter a house of worship, and never would, except the Gospel sought them in such places as those in which it now can get them to assemble. When we entered the theatre, the assembly, especially in the galleries, was noisy and confused, and cries of 'Tom' and 'Bill' and 'Jack' were frequent and loud; but before the service had proceeded ten minutes, all were as orderly and attentive as in most religious assemblies. Indeed, before the close of the sermon, all was deeply solemn and still. I mingled with the multitude as they issued from the service, and had an opportunity of more closely observing their bearing and grades. They appeared to be drawn from the lowest stratum of London population, such as the Great Master would have had compassion on as sheep scattered and without a shepherd. Nowhere in the three kingdoms, during a ministry of nearly twenty years, have I ever preached to an assembly of my fellow men that seemed more deeply to need the preaching of the Gospel of holiness and peace. In none of the Special Services have I felt myself so much in place as an evangelist as preaching to those who are in every sense 'the poor.' The spirit of Christian union in these services makes them, I think, especially telling."

What can be more descriptive, what more touching than this narrative? The other is from the Rev. Mr. Acworth, the Vicar of Plumstead, and is of equal value:—

"When I officiated," he says, "at the Victoria Theatre, the theatre was so crowded that it was found necessary by the police to shut the door before the time of service. The congregation consisted almost entirely of working men. The hubbub that existed ceased the moment I asked the dense congregation to unite in prayer; but from the few voices that joined in repeating the Lord's Prayer, I judged that the larger portion of them had little or no acquaintance with it. After singing a hymn, I preached, for nearly three-quarters of an hour, upon Moses lifting up the serpent in the wilderness. On giving a narrative of the life and miracles of Moses, and of the lifting up of the serpent as typical of what our Saviour had suffered to obtain for us eternal life, I was listened to with the most extraordinary attention, as if the subject had never been heard of before. I had had a considerable prejudice against going into a theatre; and it was only the strongly-expressed opinion of laymen who had studied the character of our London population that induced me to undertake the service. The best answer to my prejudice was the appearance of my auditory. During a ministry of thirty years, I never entered so much into the feelings of the Author of our religion, who 'when He beheld the city wept over it.'"

These statements I can confirm by my own personal experience, having myself attended at the Victoria Theatre on three successive occasions. The audience each time numbered no less than 3,200 persons, so closely crowded that a straw could not have been placed between them. From the beginning to the end of the service no assembly could have been more orderly, more attentive, more apparently devout, and more anxious to catch every word that fell from the preacher's lips. On one of the occasions, so solemn and touching was the discourse of the preacher, and so moved were many even of the wildest and roughest present, that when, after the "Benediction," they rose to leave the building, they went so quietly and solemnly that you could hardly hear the sound of a foot-fall. Surely no one can deny that a deep and solemn impression is made on the minds of those people: it is found that many come to the services week after week; and can it be doubted that we are by degrees spreading a leaven throughout the whole population? We only want, I am confident, more extended machinery, and more numerous opportunities, to produce a really living and lasting effect upon those large masses.

Now there can be no mistake as to the character of the assembly. At one celebration of the service, the men mustered in proportion to the women as nine to one, and on another occasion as seven to three. I asked a person who happened to be present, and who is conversant with the character of the people in the neighbourhood, and knows most of them, both by calling and by name, to give me some idea of the sort of people who were gathered together. The man replied that there were 3,200 present he was certain, because he was expert at such calculations, from having to count the people in the theatre; and of that number 2,000 belonged to the class called "roughs"—the most violent, disorderly, and dangerous of all the men in that very quarter. This man lifted up his hands in amazement when he saw how quiet was their demeanour. He had expected uproar, and even danger, and he frankly said he could not comprehend how those two thousand wild, unruly fellows behaved themselves so well. And certainly it is a very remarkable thing, and a great moral result, that so many men of such turbulent character and disorderly habits should have been got to listen patiently and quietly for an hour and a half to a religious service, an occupation so unusual, and, as we might have supposed, so distasteful to them. Do you inquire as to the fruits? A report is weekly made to the committee for conducting these services as to the character of the audiences on these occasions, and the effect produced. These reports are one theme of congratulation and expression of thankfulness from those who have taken part in them, that they had been permitted to enjoy an opportunity of making known religious truth to thousands and tens of thousands, who, except for this instrumentality, would have gone to their graves without a knowledge of the God that made them, and of the Saviour who died for them.

But it is said that the issue of holding these religious services in theatres is to draw away the congregations from other places of worship. Happily, the fact is just the reverse. I hold in my hand the testimony of several clergymen and Dissenting ministers of the districts around these theatres, who unite in saying that there has been no abatement, but rather an increase, in the numbers of their congregations. They state, and it is reasonable that it should be so, that many of those who had attended these services had been so impressed by what they had heard, that they had become regular attendants at the churches or chapels of the neighbourhood. Now, if there is a human being who is well acquainted with the working people of the metropolis it is the Rev. Joseph Brown, rector of Christ Church, Blackfriars. Mr. Brown's parish is included within one of the most awful localities in the world. I wish that your Lordships would go there and spend a little time in that and similar neighbourhoods. You would thus do a great service. It would be time well spent. Proofs such as this, of interest in the welfare of the people, of a desire to know, and, if possible, improve their condition, tend to harmony and good-will among all classes, the preservation of order, and loyalty to the Crown. I remember, in one of my walks in the east of London, an intelligent working man said to me,

"I hear that there are very fine folks at t'other end, with such fine carriages and horses; why don't they come here, and see what we are a-doing on? We are worth thinking on, for we are many."

He spoke the truth: they are "worth thinking on;" and it is to recover a treasure so valuable, and bring them back to the Communion of Christian life, that the present labour is bestowed. Now, Mr. Brown, whose church is near the New Cut, says that his afternoon service is not affected by the services in the Victoria Theatre; and he even recommends a morning service therein for the benefit of the tens of thousands who are to be found in the New Cut on Sunday morning. In the New Cut, like Petticoat Lane and Rag Fair, on Sunday, are thousands of persons, many of whom pass the day playing at skittles, at pitch-farthing, and in almost every crime; and it is hoped that some of these, at least, may be enticed into the playhouse to listen to the Word of God. However abnormal these services may be, good cannot but follow the collection of 20,700 of these persons to hear the Gospel, many of whom would otherwise be in the highways and the streets, having no other occupation than to break the Ten Commandments from first to last. The Rev. Newman Hall, minister of Surrey Chapel, says:

The Earl of Shaftesbury

"My church was quite full with an attendance of 2,500 prior to the services. There has been no diminution since."

The Rev. R. Robinson, of York-road Chapel, states:

"I am happy to say that the attendance at the chapel has suffered no diminution whatever since the opening of the Victoria; even the young have not been drawn away."

The Rev. Hugh Allen, the rector of St. George's, Southwark, writes:

"None of my church services have been at all diminished, either in number or interest; and I have no hesitation in saying that these special services at the theatres, so far as they have come under my notice, were attended principally by the class of persons for whom they were instituted; and the attention given to my preaching there was as solemn and as marked as ever I witnessed in any church."

Of the services at Sadler's Wells, the Rev. Daniel Wilson, of Islington (a well-known name), says:

"I am not aware that the congregations attending any of our churches in this locality have been affected by the special services."

The Rev. Robert Maguire, of Clerkenwell, observes:

"My congregation in Clerkenwell church has not been in the slightest degree affected by the theatre services."

The Rev. A. M. Henderson, of Claremont Chapel, testifies:

"My congregation has not been lessened."

The Rev. H. Ingram, of Pentonville Chapel, also:

"My evening congregation has improved, rather than diminished, since the opening of Sadler's Wells. On the evening of the special services we were crowded."

With respect to the services at the Garrick

Theatre, Whitechapel, the Rev. T. Richardson, incumbent of St. Matthew's, Pell Street, to whom I have already alluded, says:—

"My evening congregation has increased ever since I preached at the Garrick, and the increase has been from the lowest orders."

The Rev. R. H. Baynes, incumbent of St. Paul's, adds:—

"These services have in no way affected my evening congregation, though my church is not more than three hundred or four hundred yards from the theatre."

This is an important fact. The Rev. W. Tyler, Mile-end Chapel, says:—

"We are still always full."

The Rev. C. Stovel, Commercial-road Chapel, says:—

"If anything, the evening attendance has improved."

The Rev. J. Markwell alone writes:—

"I must say that the congregations of an evening at St. James's, Curtain Road, have, since the service at the Britannia Theatre, Hoxton, fallen off greatly; still would fondly hope that God will own and bless these extraordinary efforts for the conversion of sinners."

But here I may remark that the congregations, assembled at the Britannia Theatre, are of a somewhat superior class, and though consisting of persons who are not frequenters of places of worship, are not composed altogether of the wild and destitute beings who flocked to the other theatres. Who can entertain a doubt that these services are producing a considerable benefit by small means—an enormous church and chapel-extension at a small cost? The argument against them, and it is the only one, is, that there is something unpleasant in the association. I do not deny there is something abnormal in these services, something that is unpleasant. But the Right Rev. Archbishop has put the case truly and well when he says, that, "while on the one side there is a natural and legitimate sentiment, on the other there is principle." It is so; for what do those who object to these services give in exchange, what do they offer in the present most awful necessity for doing something? Suppose that an appeal be made to the country for church accommodation, and that the country should in time respond to the appeal, would the response be equal to the demand? I was told by the late Bishop of London that, when an appeal was made to the public for twenty additional churches for the metropolis, by the time the money was collected, and the churches were built, the population had increased in a far greater proportion than the churches would contain, and the arrear remained the same as before. Now, suppose the House should adopt the Resolution, and suppose the services should in consequence be discontinued, what is to be done meanwhile? Years must elapse before this great scheme of church accommodation, even if adopted, could be carried into effect, and hundreds of thousands would go to their graves in utter ignorance of all saving truth, and contributing while they live to the disgrace, dishonour, and insecurity of the country.

My Lords, hard things have been said of the ministers of religion who have taken a part in these services. I have a totally different view; I cannot too much commend them. I feel bound and rejoice to bear my testimony to the conduct of the Nonconformist ministers in this matter. Some of their most eminent men have joined this movement with hearty zeal. The noble Viscount says that we are endangering the Church. Just the reverse. I believe that the movement of which this is a part has done more to strengthen and perpetuate the Church than any other cause; and the clergy of the Church who have participated in these services have gone far to rivet the hearts of the people to the Establishment. But there has been some talk of an inhibition to stop these services. Now, first I doubt the legality of such an inhibition; and I, for one, am prepared, if an inhibition be issued, to test its legality. I question whether any human being or any law has the power of preventing a clergyman in his capacity of a Christian citizen from performing that great duty, the salvation of souls, in season and out of season, at all times and in all places, to any who may be disposed to hearken. I hold in my hand a short letter from a clergyman of the Church of England; and here I may remark that many other clergymen of the Church are coming forward to join in this work—it speaks the sentiments of a large body who feel that principle in such a work is paramount to every other consideration. The writer says:—

"I presume the right of Christian men to exhort an ungodly multitude, wherever found, ought not to be interfered with; and it was only as a Christian man that I addressed the multitude in the Garrick Theatre. I wore no ecclesiastical dress, and used no part of the Church service."

He well asserts the right of the clergy, and shows that it is exercised with moderation and judgment.

My Lords, you must perceive the rising struggle to preach the Gospel among this mighty mass of human beings. Can you be indifferent to it? I ask whether you are prepared, as members of the Church of England, to see the Church stand aloof, and the whole of this movement given up exclusively to the Dissenters? Will you say to these destitute and hungry men, "We can do you no sort of good. Come, if you like, to Episcopal churches and chapels, and there you shall be preached to in a stiff, steady, buckram style. We will have you within walls, consecrated in due and official form; otherwise you shall never hear, from us at least, one word of Gospel truth." Are you prepared to admit that the Church of England, despite the pressing necessity, is bound so tightly by rule, and rubric, and law, and custom, that she can do none of the work? Will you say, "We have not a sufficient force of clergymen; we have not churches or chapels; we have no money to ordain and support the ministers of religion?" In that case the people, who are benefited by these services, will reply, "Let the Nonconformists, then, do the work, but let the Church of England take up her real position as the Church of a sect and not that of the nation; she has been applied to and found wanting, and let us follow those who have called us to the knowledge of the truth." My Lords, I believe it will be found that those who have been awakened to religious impressions by ministers of the Church of England will connect themselves with the Church, and that those who owe those impressions to Nonconformist ministers will join Nonconformists. But whatever may be the case in this respect, I trust your Lordships will not be heard to declare that no minister of the Church ought to take part in this great movement, and fatal would it be, if, for any reason, our clergy were to withdraw from it. I have great respect for the Nonconformist body. Among them I have many affectionate and valued friends; but I have a sincere attachment to the Church of England. I dread to see that Church lose one particle of its influence or power, or shrink from what I believe to be its sacred duty. I rejoice to the friendly rivalry that exists between clergy of the Church, and Nonconformists, in relation to this great work; but I, for one, will not surrender to them the right, the comforts, the privilege, and the joy, of evangelizing the masses of the people. My Lords, you are asked to pass a Resolution. The Resolution, if passed, cannot have the force of law in reference to this movement: it would be just so much waste paper, and no more; and not being backed by public opinion could have no influence out of doors in checking or impeding us; the only effect it could produce would be to rouse a strong feeling of indignation or sorrow. I hope the noble Viscount will not go away with the notion that this is a movement in which the middle classes take no interest. The middle classes of the present day are much better informed than those of a former generation. They know that the safety of their lives and property, and the preservation of public order, depend on their having around them a peaceful, happy, and moral population; and they feel that the course now being pursued, is one which, by the communication of Christian truth, will mainly conduce to that issue. I implore your Lordships not to adopt this Resolution; but whatever may be the decision of the House, I feel myself bound to say—and I am speaking, I know, the sentiments of those with whom I am associated—that, by the blessing of God, we will persevere in the course which we have begun, as long as we have breath to speak and material to work upon.

The Earl of Shaftesbury

EARL GRANVILLE hoped, after the turn the conversation had taken, that he was not going beyond his province in making an earnest appeal to the noble Viscount to withdraw the Resolution which he had brought before the House. Their Lordships would remember that the noble Viscount, in bringing forward his Motion, based it on certain circumstances which were very obvious at first sight, that these special services in theatres were contrary to our ordinary associations and feelings, and then stated certain facts which he alleged had taken place in connection with the performance of Divine service at the theatres. He denounced in strong terms certain things which he believed to have taken place on the information of an anonymous report in a newspaper, the name of which he did not mention. Some part of these facts had been contradicted by the most rev. Prelate, who at the same time informed their Lordships that, while these services were in the first instance repugnant to his feelings and convictions, yet, after full examination of the whole state of the case, he could not find it in his heart, even if he had the power by law, to prohibit those who availed themselves of the only earthly means in their power of bringing the Divine truths of the Gospel to the knowledge of many who in no other way could find it. They had heard also in the very remarkable speech of the noble Earl (the Earl of Shaftesbury)—a speech temperate, eloquent, and impressive, and delivered under the advantage of a full knowledge of the circumstances—information of very great interest and importance. The noble Earl had stated many important facts which every one who had heard them must have listened to with the deepest interest; but he concluded that the noble Viscount would not be inclined to admit statements coming from one who was to a certain degree bound up with this movement. It was impossible for the House to entertain a question on which it did not possess full information; and besides, they must bear in mind that this was a subject with which the House ought not to deal in its single capacity. If this movement was a good one, if it justified the hopes and expectations entertained of it by the noble Earl, if it should prove a blessing to any portion of their fellow-creatures, their Lordships would only make themselves a laughing-stock by attempting to oppose it. If, on the other hand, it was found calculated to produce mischief to society, and to injure rather than advance the interests of religion, public opinion would, he believed, speak out in such a way as to put an end to it. More than that; in such a case it would be the duty of Parliament to interfere by an Act, but it was not for that House to pass a Resolution, which, as the noble Earl observed, would only be so much waste paper. He thought, therefore, that for the sake of the House itself it was important that they should not—even if it were regular to do so—pass Resolutions on subjects as to which they could have no practical effect whatever, and so accustom the public to treat their Resolutions with indifference, which he flattered himself was far from being the case at present. He was sure, therefore, that he only spoke the feeling of the House when he asked the noble Viscount to withdraw his Motion.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH said, that whatever might be the opinion entertained as to the services to which their attention had been directed, it was obvious from the very remarkable speech of the noble Earl (the Earl of Shaftesbury) that there was a great spiritual need, which it was their duty to supply. The noble Viscount seemed to think that sacred things belonged to sacred places only, and that the Gospel of Christ should only be preached within consecrated walls. But an abnormal state of things called for an abnormal remedy. He thought the noble Viscount had not sufficiently considered the spiritual exigencies of the country, which required peculiar and extraordinary efforts to meet them. They must endeavour, by all legitimate appliance to meet the wants of the great mass of the community, and especially of those of the poorest and most neglected class. Whether the theatres were or were not proper places for meeting the wants of these classes so far as Divine service went they were only taken possession of because no other suitable places could be found. What the spiritual necessities of the people were had been more fully laid open by the Reports of recent Parliamentary Committees, and it behoved all Christian men to grapple earnestly and speedily with a declared necessity. There could be no measure better than the introduction of Sir Robert Peel's system, which provided for the formation of parishes without churches in the first instance; and the proper source from whom endowments for those parishes was to be derived, was an improved administration of the Church property. He hoped some measure would speedily be taken by the sale of a portion of livings under Crown patronage to increase the number of churches—a scheme which had been recommended in the Report of the Royal Commissioners. He was glad that the Motion of the noble Viscount had brought forth the interesting statement of the noble Earl, which would, he thought, be attended with the best effect.

THE BISHOP OF LLANDAFF said, the population of his diocese had increased in a greater ratio than in any other part of the kingdom, not even excepting Lancashire; but not so the church accommodation. At the beginning of the present century the population of his diocese was 107,000; at the census of 1851 it had increased to 347,000, having much more than trebled itself. He was acquainted with a gentleman who knew Cardiff fifty years ago; its population, which was then 1,800, was now nearer 40,000 than 30,000. He believed the late Sir John Nicholl remembered Merthyr when there were only seven houses in it, but at the last census the population had risen to 15,000. The clergy in his diocese were all anxious to do their duty; but how could they be expected to cope with the spiritual wants of such an enormous population? They were told there was a great number of Dissenters in the diocese. They admitted it, and were thankful that it was so. Dissent in Wales originated in a great degree in the apathy of the Church of England, but it had been augmented a thousand fold by the inability of the clergy to supply the wants of the church while the population had been increasing to so great an extent. The Prelates of the Church were conscious of the evil associations of a theatre to which the noble Viscount (Viscount Dungannon) had alluded. But what were they to do? If he (the Bishop of Llandaff) was called on to elect between allowing Divine worship in theatres, and seeing thousands of the population perishing in their sins, he could not but remember his Saviour's command, to go into the highways and hedges, and compel them to come in. He hoped the debate might result in calling the attention of the Government to the great and pressing want of spiritual accommodation which prevailed, not only in the metropolis, but in many parts of the country. As for appeals to the public, the noble Viscount must have read the Report published last year of the evidence taken before the Committee of the House of Lords on the subject of church rates. The subject of appeals to the public was over and over again referred to in that Report, and clergymen said that they were completely secularized by having to make constant appeals in order to obtain the necessary funds for the Church.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, it was desirable that no misapprehension should go abroad with reference to the position assumed by the right rev. Bench on this question. The discussion had been of so extremely interesting a character, and had elicited so many facts with which their Lordships could scarcely have been expected to be acquainted, that he trusted it might stir up a desire to remedy the evils which had been so forcibly pointed out. But they must not allow themselves to be so far carried away by the noble Earl (the Earl of Shaftesbury) as to conceive that the plan he had so eloquently and feelingly set forth was the only one by which those

The Bishop of Llandaff

evils could be met. He (the Bishop of London) believed they were really indebted to the noble Viscount for having brought this subject before the House. He had done so in the most temperate and quiet manner. Nothing but the conviction that he was conscientiously discharging a duty could have induced him to bring the question under their Lordships' notice; and he (the Bishop of London) for one did not regret that he had done so, even though he should eventually consent to withdraw his Motion, which he (the Bishop of London) trusted he would do. But it would be said, if the evils were so great, and the remedy proposed by the noble Earl was so efficacious, it was surely the duty of the heads of the Church to put themselves distinctly in the front of this movement. It had been said that neutrality appeared to be a wrong position for a Bishop to assume in this matter. A few nights ago he stated that the position which he himself had assumed was, more or less, one of neutrality. He would now state why he had assumed that position. The noble Viscount, in his opening address, would have had their Lordships to suppose that this was a public movement which the heads of the Church sanctioned. But it was obvious to all now that it was a private movement—a movement of certain private individuals, who, feeling deeply the responsibility cast on them as Christian men, living in a community which was in a very abnormal state, determined to try an experiment, not perhaps consonant with the general feeling of the Church, but yet one which they thought might result in great good. He (the Bishop of London) thought they had acted wisely in not consulting the heads of the Church in entering on an experiment which might not, after all, have been successful. He was glad in not having been invited to take public part in this matter, but rather that the right rev. Bench should be asked to allow it to take its course, and then, when they saw that it was really attended with good, say whether or not they could give it their sanction. The noble Viscount argued that a few years ago a clergyman would have been suspended for taking part in the services in question. He (the Bishop of London) did not know that that would have been the case. He could hardly think that it would. At all events, the most rev. Prelate had pointed out the change that had taken place in the law within the last few years. It was not illegal, and nothing could make it so but an inhibition from the Bishop. The noble Earl did not speak with very much respect of an episcopal inhibition, but had intimated that the question might be tried in a court of law. Supposing, however, that an inhibition were legal, would the noble Viscount, after hearing the statements which had been made that evening, say that it was his (the Bishop of London's) duty or that of the Bishop of Winchester, in whose diocese some of those theatres were situated, to drag before a court of law any clergyman who, from conscientious motives, took part in these services? Surely no one would wish that if this were not illegal now, he should take steps to make it so. He was aware that a Bishop's power was not altogether dependent on inhibitions. One word from the most rev. Prelate of his entire disapproval of this movement would, no doubt, have at once induced the clergy to bow to his revered authority and cease to take part in these services. But the right rev. Bench felt that they would be taking upon themselves a very grave responsibility indeed in expressing any such opinion in the face of a mass of human beings whom either they or their forefathers had hitherto sorely neglected. Could they, dare they, call upon the clergy, either by inhibitions or by other means, to refrain from ministering to these persons? The right rev. Bench did not feel called upon to prevent the clergy from engaging in this work. At the same time, he was not prepared to say that he went entirely with the movement. There were several things in it which he did not like. The associations connected with a theatre created a certain dislike to the use of such a building for religious purposes; but on mature reflection, he did not know whether this was not an objection founded on feeling alone, and whether, therefore, the conflict was not one between mere feeling and the deeper call of duty and of principle. With regard to the effects of theatrical entertainments, to which allusion had been made, he did not know whether one result of this movement might not be that theatres would become something better than they had ever been before. No doubt it was a great evil that there should be so much mixed up with a theatre which rendered it impossible for Christian people to avail themselves of it as affording a highly innocent and improving amusement; but it was, nevertheless, a popular amusement, and, perhaps, a better state of things in connection with it would result from the present movement. They might be thankful if this were so. He begged that their Lordships would not go away with the impression that, because this great experiment was being tried, no other efforts should be made in the same direction. Other buildings more suitable for Christian worship might no doubt be found; and, above all, he did not doubt that if an appeal were made to the country to consider how great was the mass of irreligion and indifference which required to be grappled with, funds would be forthcoming, if it depended on funds, for the extension of our parochial system. True, they must wait long before churches could be built; but they need not despair on that account, and meanwhile it would be well if those who felt strongly against this movement would see that the churches we had already were thrown open to the poor as freely as possible. It might be very difficult to lure them in, but at present they were not lured in but locked out. No idea seemed more deeply ingrained in the minds of many officials in our parishes than that the abject poor had no right to be accommodated in our churches. In this and other ways, perhaps, important results might flow from this movement. They were not to accept it as the best which could be originated; but that it had been productive of good few could doubt, and he hoped that many other efforts of a kindred nature might be made to promote the same ends.

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON said, that what had passed left him still unconvinced that evil might not arise from turning places of public amusement into places of public worship. Throughout the country there was a strong feeling that such practices involved a desecration of God's holy ordinances. But he should not regret having brought this subject before their Lordships if it had the effect of inducing the community at large to consider these things, and see how a remedy could be best applied to those crying wants which the noble Earl (the Earl of Shaftesbury) had so forcibly described. It had never, however, been his intention to put the House in, perhaps, the invidious position of having to express an opinion upon this subject. He was satisfied with the discussion which had taken place, and should now withdraw the Motion.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR had been forcibly reminded by this discussion of a line written by Dr. Johnson. On one occasion, when far removed from cathedrals and sacred edifices, this great moralist joined in a worship which was no doubt most acceptable to Heaven; and he then expressed this sentiment:—

"Legitimas faciunt pectora pura preces."

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

PERFORMANCE OF DIVINE SERVICE.

PETITION.

LORD EBURY presented a Petition from Charles John Bosanquet, R.N., a magistrate of the County of Essex, and Churchwarden of Enfield, complaining of the present state of the Law respecting the Performance of Divine Service, and that more Power may be given to the Bishops to enforce their legal orders. The noble Lord stated that the Petitioner complained of the manner of performance of Divine Service by the Vicar of Enfield in a church in that parish, and prayed that the law with regard to the celebration of Divine Service might be made so plain and simple that such practices as these and such as had taken place at St. George's-in-the-East, might be put an end to in a complete and summary manner. He ought to state that, in reply to an inquiry upon this subject, he had received a communication from the Vicar of Enfield, stating that, according to law, he was perfectly right in the course he had pursued. He would, therefore, make no observations on the present Petition beyond remarking how well founded were the objections which he had himself brought under the notice of the House on this subject.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, that his noble Friend seemed to consider that this was a case similar to that of St. George's-in-the-East. But there were in reality several differences between the two cases. The present case was not that of a parish church, but of a private building licensed as a chapel, and one of the points relied on by the vicar was that it was his own private property. Now, the difference between a parish church and a private building was very great indeed; and it did not follow that because certain practices were inadmissible according to the common rules of good sense in a parish church, they should not therefore be allowed in a private chapel. The vicar also alleged that that chapel had been built almost entirely by the subscriptions of persons who wished that particular form of service which was observed there; so that he was only carrying out the desire of those who had caused the edifice to be constructed. There was this further great difference between the two cases, that the authorities could only judge of the feeling of the parishioners through the representations of the churchwardens, and two out of the three churchwardens were opposed to the views of the petitioner, and were anxious to have Divine worship conducted in the mode adopted by the vicar. So that this was not a petition by the churchwardens in their united capacity, but that of a single gentleman. Moreover, there was this essential difference between the two cases, that the vicar, in conformity with the opinion expressed by himself (the Bishop of London) and the Archdeacon, had, as he (the Bishop of London) understood, discontinued in the parish church every practice to which the parishioners had objected, while he maintained his right in the private chapel built by private persons to adopt the forms which they desired. At the same time he stated that if he (the Bishop of London), his diocesan, intimated to him that he had better close the chapel he would close it immediately, but that having received the money of the persons who wished for that peculiar service he could not adopt any other. He did not know that the vicar was right in that view of the matter, but this was what he had stated. He regretted to say that that case had been brought in another form before the magistrates in petty session; but the magistrates, exercising, as he thought, a very wise discretion, had dismissed it. There was one point of great importance involved in the case. The petitioner prayed that the law with regard to all these matters should be altered, or should, at least, be thoroughly investigated. He (the Bishop of London) could not conceal from himself that that evil was every day extending and that in various parts of the country the people were becoming irritated against individual members of the clergy who chose to set themselves against the wishes of their parishioners in respect of the form of worship. It was no wonder, that the law upon the subject should be uncertain. The very idea of a national Church was that it was a Church rooted in the affections of the people, and it was not likely that there should be found in the statute-book a distinct law to force clergymen not to introduce practices which were alien to the feelings of their parishioners. He, therefore, earnestly trusted that the presentation of that and of other petitions would lead, if not to an alteration of the existing law, at least, to a thorough examination of the law. It was the opinion of persons of great authority—and that opinion was, he thought, deserving of the consideration of Her Majesty's Government—that many of those difficulties might be got rid of by a certain clause in the Act of Uniformity of Elizabeth, whereby there resided in the Crown, acting on the advice of the Metropolitan (the Archbishop of Canterbury), a power to settle those questions, and that the decision so come to would have the force of law. If that were the case it would relieve Parliament from the necessity of further legislation. Such a power, he was sure, ought to be vested in some constituted authority, and he believed that, without it, great danger would result to the Church.

The Lord Chancellor

LORD REDESDALE thought that the case might be met by the introduction of a new canon. There was a strong feeling among a large class of persons that the question should be settled by Parliament; but unquestionably Parliament was not at the present moment a fit body to undertake the solution of the difficulty. Every one, however, must feel that if there was a doubt as to the law of the case it was desirable that that doubt should be cleared up, for the sake alike of the Bishops, of the clergy, and of the people. His belief was that if the question were fairly taken up by Convocation, it might be settled by the introduction of a canon, in a manner which would give satisfaction to everybody except the most extreme party, who, however, would feel themselves specially bound by any decision emanating from such an authority.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, his notion was that a canon of Convocation could not change the law of the land; it could only bind the clergy of the province in which it was enacted. The Act of Uniformity which was enacted by Parliament could not be altered without the authority of Parliament.

LORD REDESDALE thought that a canon would not in the slightest degree interfere with the Act of Uniformity.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that all these matters were settled by various Acts of Parliament known as the Acts of Uniformity, all of which were founded on and referred to the Act of King Edward VI.

VOL. CLVI. [THIRD SERIES.]

LORD EBURY said, he had the greatest desire to see the question settled in a peaceful manner. He should be happy to see the question taken up by the members of the right rev. Bench. He wished to ask the right rev. Prelate whether a Commission had not inquired into this subject, and reported against the conduct of the vicar.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, that the word "commission" had two meanings. This Commission was only a private inquiry, at which the Archdeacon presided, and his (the Bishop of London's) advice was, that these practices should be discontinued.

Petition to lie on the Table.

House adjourned at a Quarter past Eight o'clock, to Monday next, Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, February 24, 1860.

MINUTES.] NEW WRIT ISSUED.—For Surrey (Western Division), v. Henry Drummond, esq., deceased.

PUBLIC BILLS.—1^o Admiralty Court Jurisdiction; County Prisons (Ireland).

3^o Attorneys and Solicitors; Dwellings for Labouring Classes (Ireland).

SPAIN AND MOROCCO.—THE DUKEDOM OF TETUAN.—QUESTION.

MR. WYLD said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if Her Majesty's Government have received any information of the Decree of Her Most Catholic Majesty the Queen of Spain, by which the title of Duke of Tetuan has been conferred upon Marshal O'Donnell, together with the territory of Morocco, upon which the victory of Tetuan was gained?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he must beg to state that the Government had received information from our Minister at Madrid, stating that the Spanish Government intended to confer the title of Duke of Tetuan upon Marshal O'Donnell; but they had no information with regard to any intention of accompanying the title with any grant of territory. The Government, however, had been informed that it was intended to ask for Tetuan as part of the terms of peace.

VOLUNTEER RIFLE CORPS.

QUESTION.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether Her Majesty's Government intend to order any Battalions or Regiments of the Volunteer Rifle Corps now formed and in course of formation, during the ensuing summer, to the Camp at Aldershot, or any other encampment, in the same manner and for the same purposes as Regiments of the Line and Militia Regiments have been encamped?

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he would beg to interpose another question on the same subject before the right hon. Gentleman answered. As the Secretary of State for War had stated that he hoped the Volunteers would become a part of our permanent establishment, and that with the augmentation of batteries those Volunteers would become a substitute for the Royal Artillery, he wanted to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the Articles of War applied to those "parties" as at present enrolled; and whether they were liable to the same military duty and discipline, as regulated the British Army?

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, with regard to the first part of the hon. Baronet's question, that, as it proceeded upon the supposition that he had stated that the time must come when the Volunteers would replace the Royal Artillery, he had no hesitation in sweeping away the whole superstructure, by saying that he had never entertained such an opinion, and therefore never could have made any such statement. [Sir R. PEEL: "You distinctly stated it."] If he had said any such thing he could not conceive how his words could have been so ill put together, as to bear a meaning so opposite to the sense which he entertained of the relative value of the Volunteer Corps and the Royal Artillery. The Volunteers were not under the Articles of War, like the Yeomanry, except when called out for some special purpose. With regard to the possibility or probability of the Volunteer Corps being sent down to Aldershot, like other regiments, he could assure his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. E. James) that the terms on which these troops were engaged, and the intentions with which they were enrolled, were so different from those of the regular troops that he could not imagine that it would enter into the head of any Government to think of ordering them to leave their homes to go down to Aldershot. Indeed, the Government had no such power by Act of Parliament, and certainly they had no intention of asking for the power by any sort of post facto legislation.

MEDICAL OFFICERS IN THE NAVY.

QUESTION.

SIR EDWARD GROGAN said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty if it be intended to carry into effect the spirit of the late Naval Warrant as regards Medical Officers in the Navy by granting to these officers when serving afloat naval rank, and uniform with the distinctive badges of rank, corresponding to the military rank granted to them by this Warrant, both afloat and when serving with Her Majesty's Forces ashore?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, the terms of the Navy Warrant had been carried out with regard to the pay and the rank of these officers, and with regard to the uniform, the Admiralty were only waiting until the decision of the House in reference to the increase of pay of Masters and Engineers had taken effect before taking it into their consideration.

EXEMPTION FROM RATING OF STOCK-IN-TRADE.—QUESTION.

MR. WHALLEY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is his intention to introduce a Bill for renewal of the Act 3 & 4 Vict., c. 89, exempting the profits of Stock-in-Trade, and other property liable by law to be Taxed for Relief of the Poor, from being so taxed; and, if so, whether such Bill will be introduced at such a period of the Session as to admit of inquiry by a Select Committee as to the grounds for such exemption, either in connection with any inquiry which will be ordered as to the assessment of the Income Tax under Schedule D, or otherwise?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the Act of 3 & 4 Vict., c. 89, by which Stock-in-Trade was exempted from rating, by an Act of last Session, c. 44, had been continued until the 1st of October, 1862, and the end of the following Session. It was not his intention, therefore, to introduce a measure this Session to continue that Act.

MALT FOR CATTLE-FEEDING.

QUESTION.

LORD HENRY THYNNE said, he wished to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he is prepared to remit the Duty on Barley malted for agricultural purposes?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the question which had been put to him by the noble Lord did not grow out of any proposal recently made by the Government. It was one which had been made for many years—he might almost say for generations—in discussion with the Revenue Department; and he was sorry to say that he was not aware of any arrangement which could be made for the purpose of permitting the malting of barley for feeding cattle free of duty without the greatest danger to the Revenue. Her Majesty's Government consequently were not prepared to sanction any such remission.

DRAWBACK ON PAPER.

QUESTION.

BARON LIONEL ROTHSCHILD said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, if he is prepared to state whether, at the time of the abolition of the Paper Duty, he will grant the Drawback upon all the stocks of Paper in the hands of the Stationers bearing an uncanceled Excise Label?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he must remind the hon. Member that the proposition of the Government was to repeal the duty from the 1st of July, on which day the drawback would be allowed on all paper made since the 1st of April which was found in the hands of dealers. The proposal for granting the drawback on whole stocks of paper, irrespective of the date at which they were made, was one which would be attended with great difficulties, and he therefore was not prepared to accept it. But he believed it was possible to meet all reasonable desires in another mode without causing any sensible inconvenience to the country, or any obstruction to the ordinary and regular progress of trade, which would be by postponing to a somewhat later date the absolute repeal of the duty. If the question were renewed in a day or two he should be prepared to state the precise date which might be fixed upon; but it would be a date later by one or more months than the 1st of July.

SALARIES OF COLONIAL CHAPLAINS.

QUESTION.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether Her Majesty's Government have decided to advise the Queen to withhold the Royal Assent from the Bill lately passed by the Legislature of Tasmania for reducing the Salaries of the Colonial Chaplains?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, that it was with some regret that the Government had advised Her Majesty to withhold Her Assent from the Bill in question. That had been done, not from any desire on the part of the Home Government to interfere with the policy of the Colonial Government upon ordinary domestic questions, but solely on the ground that the Bill in question affected improperly the rights and interests of Chaplains in Tasmania, which the Crown was bound to protect.

PRISONS (SCOTLAND).—QUESTION.

MR. E. CRAUFURD said, he rose to ask the Lord Advocate what course he intends to pursue with regard to the Prisons Act (Scotland) Continuance Bill, and whether he will undertake to introduce a general Bill to abolish the Prison Board, and to amend the present system of Prison Assessments in Scotland, at a period sufficiently early to insure its being dealt with during the present Session?

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he proposed to proceed that evening with the Prisons Act (Scotland) Continuance Bill, which was only intended to regulate a difficulty that had occurred about Assessments. With regard to the other branch of the question, it was his intention to introduce a measure on the subject, and he hoped that it might be passed into law during the present Session.

THE IRISH POST OFFICE.

QUESTION.

MR. VANCE said, he wished to ask, Whether there is any inquiry pending with respect to the expediency of removing the Accountant's branch of the Post Office in Dublin as well as in Edinburgh?

MR. LAING said, there was no intention of removing the Accountant's branch of the Dublin Post Office to London.

On Motion that the House at its rising do Adjourn till Monday next,

NOTE CIRCULATION.—(INDIA.)

QUESTION.

MR. R. W. CRAWFORD desired to put a question to the Secretary of State for India, which through some inadvertence had not been placed upon the Notice Paper, respecting proposals that may have been made by the Government of India, and the course that the Home Government are prepared to recommend, for the issue of promissory notes payable upon demand in that country. He also wished to inquire whether the right hon. Gentleman will be willing to produce any despatch containing the terms of the arrangement, which is one of great importance to commercial interests?

SIR CHARLES WOOD replied that proposals had some time in the summer been forwarded by the Government of India for establishing a note circulation in that country; but they expressed some doubt as to the expediency of introducing it at that time when the public mind was in a feverish state on financial subjects. This despatch arrived soon after he became Secretary of State for India, and at that time it was in contemplation to send out Mr. Wilson as Financial Councillor to that country. An answer was accordingly returned to the effect that the Government thought it desirable that such a measure should be introduced after full consideration, and after the arrival of Mr. Wilson, who from his thorough acquaintance with the subject, and from his experience of all which had taken place in this country respecting the circulation of notes, was likely to bring a considerable stock of English knowledge and experience to the aid of the Indian Government, who, well acquainted as they were with the circumstances of that country, had not much practical acquaintance with the issue of notes. Before Mr. Wilson left England he (Sir Charles Wood) held communications with Mr. Wilson, with several Members of the Council, and with the Governor and Deputy-Governor of the Bank of England, and the general outlines of a scheme were arranged. Since Mr. Wilson's arrival in India he had communicated with the Governor-General and with many of the ablest officers of the Government, with commercial men both English and Natives, and with others on the subject, and he had sent home a very able Minute embodying the results of their consultation. The document, however, was not in the shape of a despatch, because it had not been considered by the Members of the Council of Calcutta, to which place Mr. Wilson was to have returned about the middle of last month, and he then proposed to introduce a Bill for the purpose of establishing a note circulation in India. An answer to the Minute was now before the Indian Council, and as soon as it had passed, he (Sir Charles Wood) should lose no time in laying all the papers on the table. No precise amount of notes to be issued had been determined upon; but the object of the Government was to establish in India a circulation issued by Government, on the same footing as the notes of this country were issued by the Issue Department of the Bank of England. They would be altogether independent of any bank already in operation, and totally disjoined from any banking operation whatever.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.—QUESTION.

MR. DISRAELI: Assuming that the discussion on the Motion of the hon. Member for Essex will be concluded to-night, as I hope may be possible, it would be convenient for the House to know what is the proposed course of public business for next week.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: It is proposed to go on with the discussion connected with the Budget on Monday, and we hope the House will permit it to proceed continuously.

NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND).

QUESTION.

LORD NAAS said, it appeared by the Dublin papers of the previous day that a very important circular had been issued by the Lord Primate of Ireland to his clergy on the subject of national education, in which reference was made to a certain correspondence which had taken place between the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland and the secretaries of the Church Education Society. He wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether that is the only official correspondence which has taken place between the Government and the Church Education Society; and whether the right hon. Gentleman has any objection to that correspondence being produced?

MR. CARDWELL said, he was sure that the noble Lord and all who were interested in the cause of education in Ireland had seen the circular with the greatest satisfaction. The only official correspondence were the letters referred to in the circular, and he should have great pleasure in laying it on the table.

THE WINE AND SPIRIT DUTIES.

QUESTION.

Mr. T. DUNCOMBE said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer to state, Whether he means to propose the Resolution on the Spirit Duties on Monday next. He also wished to know whether he will have any objection to postpone the first Resolution, which relates to Wine, until the question of the amount of the Spirit Duties has been decided. The two questions were so mixed up that it was impossible to come to a satisfactory arrangement with regard to the Wine Duty previously?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he could not accede to the appeal which had just been made to him. With regard to the wine duties, it was true that under certain circumstances the duty on wine must be affected by the duty on spirits; but, in his opinion, those circumstances with reference to the state of the British wine trade were so improbable that he did not feel that they constituted an element of discussion. The intention of the Government to propose the alteration of the duties on wine and spirits, in the terms of the Resolution now on the table, was so thoroughly understood by the public that it would be very inconvenient to deviate from that resolution, and accordingly the Government intended to proceed with the Resolution in Committee on the Customs Acts on the first day that they found themselves at liberty to do so. With regard to the second Resolution—that relating to the duty on spirits—it was their intention that it should be taken immediately after that on wine. He was now in a position to state the precise terms in which the duty on spirits would be proposed, and which varied somewhat from the wording of the Resolution as standing on the books. The Resolution would, of course, be printed and circulated immediately; but he took that opportunity of reading it, in order that it might be made known at the earliest possible moment:—

“ That the duty on foreign spirits, excepting rum, shall be at the rate of 8s. 6d. per gallon;

the duty on rum, whether colonial or foreign, at the rate of 8s. 3d. per gallon; and the duty on British spirits of all descriptions, at the rate of 8s. 1d. per gallon.”

The House would perceive that the existing difference between British spirits and colonial rum—namely 2d. a gallon—would be retained; and the difference between British spirits and all others, excepting rum, would be fixed at 5d. To make the information complete, he would state that it was the intention of the Government, in consequence of the disadvantage under which the British distiller laboured in endeavouring to manufacture spirits for the foreign market, to propose a limited allowance on the export of British spirits over and above the amount of export duty ruling; that allowance was as follows:—On raw and unrectified spirits, 2d. per gallon; on rectified and potable spirits—that was, spirits prepared for consumption—3d. per gallon.

SIR FITZROY KELLY, in reference to what he now understood would be proposed, asked whether it is intended on the Resolution relating to the Duty on Wines, to raise the general question as to the reduced Duty, and the application of the alcoholic test?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I am not aware that any part of the Resolution will require to be changed. In point of fact, there will be no difficulty, because the question respecting the application of the alcoholic test, as it is called, has no reference at all to any change that will come immediately into operation, but entirely to changes that will be proposed at a later period. It will be quite open to any hon. Gentleman to vote on or discuss the question of the reduction of the duty on wine to a uniform rate of 3s. per gallon, without prejudice to the other portion of the Resolution, which is founded on the scale of the alcoholic test.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE thought that with regard to the spirit duties the statement of the right hon. Gentleman was not quite satisfactory. With the intervention of Sunday, the distillers would only have one day to consider the alteration that had been proposed almost at the eleventh hour. He hoped that this part of the Resolution would be deferred till that day week, or Thursday, and the discussion on the other parts of it might be taken in the interval.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I wish to meet, as far as I can, the convenience of the hon. Gentleman;

but the only concession the Government can make, with a due regard to the exigencies of the circumstances, is this:—I will take the Resolution respecting manufactured goods as the second, immediately after the Resolution on the wine duties; and the Resolution on the spirit duties shall be taken last in the order. I do not mean the last of all the Resolutions, but the last in order of those involving the changes in our Customs required to satisfy the terms of the Treaty entered into with France.

On Motion, That the House at its rising do adjourn to Monday next:—

THE CHINESE EXPEDITION. QUESTION.

GENERAL PEEL thought it desirable (as there were many contradictory reports in circulation) that the Secretary for India should state to the House what was the amount and description of the military force about to be despatched to China. He had seen in The Times newspaper of Monday last a statement, taken from the Indian journals, that a force of 20,000 men was about to proceed from India to China. It was said to consist of fourteen regiments. Now, it was very desirable it should be known what those regiments were, as great interest was naturally felt by those who had friends serving with their regiments in India as to whether they were to remain in that country or be sent to China. The right hon. Gentleman had already stated that all the European regiments had been transferred from the Indian to the English establishment. With regard to that part of the force which consisted of Native regiments, he understood that three of them were intended to relieve the three Native regiments already in China. As these three regiments in China were paid by the Indian Government, he took it for granted that those going to relieve them would also be paid by the Government of India; but the remainder of the Native regiments would be paid by this country. Now, in the Estimates no provision had been made for them, except the sum of £500,000 taken on account of the expenses of the war. This amount would not cover the expense of transport and stores. The force in China would also be on Indian pay and allowances. The second part of his Question referred to the number of

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

British troops to be paid for out of the Indian revenue during the next financial year. The total number of Her Majesty's army was 235,852; of these 143,362 were on the British establishment, and provision for them voted by Parliament, leaving 92,490 on the Indian establishment. It was important they should clearly understand this point, even in reference to the subject they were about to discuss that night. The sum taken for military purposes for the next year would not cover the total expenditure, including that of the Chinese expedition, and hereafter the House would have to vote additional sums for the China war. It was most important that the right hon. Gentleman should, if possible, give a reply to his question, What is the amount and description of force that has proceeded, or is about to proceed, from India to China; specifying, if possible, the Regiments of which the European portion of the force is composed; and what number of British Troops (including the depôts) he is prepared to pay for out of the Revenue of India during the next financial year?

CHINA—LORD ELGIN AND SIR MICHAEL SEYMOUR.—PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

SIR MICHAEL SEYMOUR said, that before the Question was answered, he would request the indulgence of the House on a matter personal to himself, not only affecting his character and honour as a naval officer, but also as a Member of the House. He should merely have to make a reference to a paragraph that appeared in the public journals of Thursday. The statement to which he referred had been made by a noble and distinguished Earl in the most public and distinct manner, and he should, with the permission of the House, read the paragraph in which that statement was contained, with the view of making a few explanatory observations with respect to it. The noble Lord to whom he alluded said:—

“ But I must solemnly say that when Admiral Seymour made to me the communication I have referred to, I stated to the gallant Admiral that it was absolutely necessary, not only for my own vindication, but also in order that Her Majesty's Government might be in possession of the facts of the case, that I should report in the fullest manner to the Government the extent to which, in my opinion, our prospects in the north were compromised by the failure on his part to furnish me with the armament on which I had relied. I added that if he had any counter statement to make, if he thought anything in my conduct, either in the wa of omission or commission, was the cause of his failure, I begged of him to make a corresponding report to the Admiralty, in order that the whole case might be before Her Majesty's Government."

Now, having read that paragraph, he desired to impress on the House the fact that it was inaccurate in its purport, and he made that statement on his honour as an officer in Her Majesty's service, and as a Member of the House of Commons. Wishing to use no harsher term than he had employed—no communication such as the paragraph described, or anything approaching to such a communication, had ever been made to him. Had such a communication been made to him it would have been his duty to request the noble Earl to make it in an official form, and thus to give him the power of making an official representation to the Board of Admiralty.

QUEEN'S OFFICERS AND THE COMPANY'S OFFICERS.—QUESTION.

MR. CONINGHAM said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India a question with reference to a distinction which appears to exist between Officers in the Queen's and those in the Company's service. The hon. Gentleman said he was induced to put the Question, in consequence of an Officer in the Company's service being indebted to a considerable amount to one of his constituents. He wished to know whether it was one of the peculiar privileges of the Company's service not to pay their just debts. In a similar case, in which an Officer of the Queen's service was concerned, he (Mr. Coningham) had applied to the Horse Guards, and after a correspondence he obtained payment of the debt to another of his constituents. He was sorry to say that the Secretary for India did not seem willing to follow the example set to him at the Horse Guards, and did not seem inclined to interfere for the purpose of compelling payment of a just claim.

SIR CHARLES WOOD: In answer to the Question which has been put to me by my right hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon (General Peel) I have to state that one company of Engineers as well as the 3rd Buffs and the 67th Regiment of Foot, have already been despatched from India to China. Two squadrons of the Dragoon Guards, three batteries of Artillery (horsed) and one without horses, together with the 31st, 44th, and 99th Regiments of Infantry, have in addition been ordered to proceed to that country. That, I believe is the full amount of the European force which is reported as being under orders to proceed to China. Instructions had, however, been sent out to the Governor-General of India to send out two more regiments, as it was understood that the regiments which had been already ordered mustered little more than 800 strong. I have, since the issue of those instructions, ascertained that the regiments which are going to China have been filled up to their full complement of 1,000; and whether under these circumstances the two additional regiments which have been ordered will be despatched, I do not exactly know. But, be that as it may, five regiments of infantry, amounting to about 5,500 men, are under orders for China. I am asked which are the regiments which will go to China; if the two additional regiments go to China, I have been informed at the Horse Guards, that the authorities there have received intimation that the 3rd battalion of the 60th from Madras, and the 1st of the 13th from Calcutta, are about to proceed to China; but there is, I am bound to admit, some discrepancy between that statement and the account which I have received, which is to the effect that the 66th from Madras, and the 56th from Bombay, are the regiments which are to follow those to which I have already alluded. There are, besides, three regiments of Native troops to be sent out, to replace those already in China—that is a mere relief. The Native troops, which are to constitute a portion of the expeditionary force, will consist of five regiments of Irregular Native Infantry, to the amount of 4,000 men; one regiment of cavalry, to the amount of 400 men; and two companies of Madras Sappers numbering 200; in all 4,600. With respect to the number of troops which we are prepared to pay out of the Indian revenue, I can only say that this is a question which it is out of my power to answer, inasmuch as it is one which must be determined by a consideration of the number which it may be found necessary to maintain in that country. As to the force which is to be sent to China, I can only add, that it may be increased beyond the amount already ordered. A further number of regiments are to be kept in reserve in case of any demand from China. [General PEEL: How many regiments are ordered home from India?] One Dragoon regiment has sailed from India, but no other has been ordered home from hence, nor can I say what number of men the Government of India may be able to spare. It must be borne in mind that 11,000 or 12,000 of the local European force have taken their discharge, and I cannot exactly inform my right hon. and gallant Friend what amount of Queen's troops may be deemed necessary to provide for the security of our Indian Empire. With regard to the amount of the Indian depôts in this country, I may observe that there are in those depôts 17,500 men, whose maintenance is charged upon the revenues of India. In answer to the Question put by my hon. Friend, the Member for Brighton (Mr. Coningham), I may state that I wrote to the Horse Guards to ascertain what is their mode of action in such cases as my hon. Friend alluded to. I find the rule is this:—Where a demand is made on an officer's pay, it is forwarded to the officer; but the Department do not think themselves bound to enforce payment. If any transaction is alleged which is discreditable or dishonourable to the officer, it became a totally different matter. Then they did interfere. This also is the course we pursue with respect to officers in the Indian army. As at present advised, I am not prepared to extend our action. We cannot put ourselves in the position of a court of law, and enforce demands made on officers' pay. If there be no imputation on the conduct of an officer, we do not think it desirable to interfere.

THE REVOLTED PROVINCES OF THE POPE—QUESTION.

MR. M'EVOY, in rising to put the Question of which he had given notice, in relation to the revolted Provinces of the Pope, said he believed the independency of the States of the Sovereign Pontiff was admitted by every statesman in Europe to be a matter of the very highest importance. As an Irish Representative of a Roman Catholic constituency, he felt he should not be doing his duty if he failed to call attention to the proceedings of the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs in relation to this subject, and to give him as early an opportunity as possible of giving the necessary explanations. There had been great agitation during the last six months in Ireland upon this question. Meetings had been held in every part of the country, and the Parliamentary Representatives who were present were all urged to insist that the Government should in no way interfere with the patrimony of the Holy Father. That this was no exaggeration would appear from a Resolution passed at a meeting attended by sixteen Members of Parliament, very many of whom were regular supporters of the noble Lord's Government. The Resolution was to this effect:—

Sir Charles Wood

“That any Government which should attempt to interfere with or countenance any attack on the temporal sovereignty of the Holy Father is unworthy of the confidence of the Irish people and the support of their Representatives.”

He had endeavoured in every way he could to ascertain the real policy of Her Majesty's Government upon this subject. In this country he found that their friends and supporters were inclined to give them credit for having a cordial feeling with the revolutionary party in Italy, and for exerting themselves in their favour; on the other hand, he found that many of their Irish supporters held quite the opposite language, and denied that the Government had in any way interfered in this matter. He thought it was important to know how the Government really felt in regard to it. The noble Premier, on the vote of want of confidence in the late Government, used these words, “It is, therefore, as much on their foreign as on their domestic policy that I say the Government does not deserve the confidence of the House.” What did he say immediately afterwards, when that vote had placed him in the position he now occupied? The noble Lord said, “Our foreign policy, strictly following that of our predecessors, has been a policy of strict neutrality.” When the noble Lord was in office in 1857 he charged the present Foreign Secretary, the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the head of the Board of Trade with being parties to a corrupt treaty for turning him out of office. On that occasion the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary stated that the charge was both false and calumnious. He should like now to know whether Lord Derby, considering the admission of the present Prime Minister that the policy of the late Government was that of strict neutrality, could not charge the noble Lord with having given utterance previously to a statement which was both false and calumnious. But had the present Government followed in the track carved out for them of strict neutrality? No one who knew anything of the antecedents of the noble Lord could credit the probability of his not intermeddling in every conceivable way in Italy. In proof of the noble Lord's interference he would read an extract from a despatch addressed by the noble Lord to Mr. Fane, Secretary of our Legation in Austria, respecting the Treaty of Villafranca. It is dated the 24th :—

"The other great leading difficulty of the Italian question is the condition of the Roman States. For ten years Austrian troops have occupied Bologna. They have presided over criminal justice; they have ordered and executed capital punishments. But they have neither subdued nor conciliated the people. The moment the Austrian barracks were evacuated the Papal authority was overthrown. In fact, the civil abuses of the Papal Government, joined with the military rule of Austria, the mixture of effete despotism with the discipline of a court-martial, had made, together, an intolerable state of things."

He should like to know whether the noble Lord at the head of the Government could call that maintaining a strict neutrality. He might give many instances in which the noble Secretary had been interfering, meddling, and fraternizing with the revolutionary party in Italy, but he would confine himself to the proposition he made a few days ago. It had been entirely declined by Austria, stating that it was not at all necessary for the noble Lord to interfere, the Austrian Government knowing perfectly well how to defend their own territories. The noble Lord's third proposition was not very flattering to the French Government, for it was at variance with the treaty which that Government had made with Austria. As to the fourth and most important proposition—namely, for a direct interference in the affairs of Italy, if the noble Lord succeeded in inducing Her Majesty's Government to carry it out, those hon. Members who were pledged to resist any interference with the integrity of the Papal States would be bound in consistency to give the Government every opposition in their power. He would conclude by asking the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government has proposed to the French Government that, in the event of the revolted provinces of the Pope declaring their wish to be annexed to Sardinia (in accordance with the plan suggested by Her Majesty's Government), the two Governments in concert should bind themselves to offer no objection to the entrance of Sardinian Troops into those provinces, by which the Holy Father might be despoiled of those portions of his dominions?

CHINA.—LORD ELGIN AND SIR MICHAEL SEYMOUR.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. CUMMING BRUCE said, that the statement made by the hon. and gallant Admiral (Sir M. Seymour) in an earlier part of that evening, reflecting most injuriously on the character and veracity of a noble Lord with whom he was nearly connected, would, he trusted, be a sufficient excuse for his now intruding—which he did with much reluctance—on the attention of the House. He should have immediately followed the gallant Admiral if he had not thought that some of the noble Lord's colleagues would have felt it expedient to offer some explanation upon his statement. He regretted as much as any man that this personal question should have been raised in either House of Parliament. In justification, however, of his noble Friend, he must say that this bringing of the matter under the notice of Parliament did not originate with him. Certain remarks which fell in particular from the late First Lord of the Admiralty (Sir John Pakington) seemed to his noble Friend to cast the imputation upon him of having made to the authorities whom he served in England charges which were not justifiable and which could not be supported by facts against the hon. and gallant Admiral. His noble Friend, therefore, thought it necessary to make a statement "in another place;" and towards the close of that statement he said it had been represented that in his despatches he had conveyed the impression that the gallant Admiral had not given him, as Plenipotentiary in China, all the support he required, or that the gallant Admiral's own communications to him had led him to expect. His noble Friend further said that it had been alleged that he ought to have communicated the despatches which contained those charges to the hon. and gallant Admiral; and he met that allegation by observing that it had never been his practice to do anything of that kind—that he regarded his despatches as confidential communications addressed to the Department which he served; and that it remained with the Secretary of State alone to break their secrecy or make them public. At the same time his noble Friend declared on his honour as a Peer, and avowed his readiness to make the same asseveration on his oath before a court of justice, that he had not only fully stated to the gallant Admiral the substance of the complaints he had sent home to the Secretary of State, but had also told him that if he (the gallant Admiral) had any complaint to make of his proceedings towards him, or any communication to make upon his despatches as Plenipotentiary, he hoped the gallant Admiral would forward to the Board of Admiralty and the Government any statement or any explanation he might think fit to make. The gallant Admiral had risen in the House that night, and declared that the statement made "in another place" by his noble Friend was inaccurate. This purely personal question, therefore, now seemed to have become one between the veracity of our late Plenipotentiary in China and the memory—certainly not the veracity—of the gallant Admiral, who might have forgotten these verbal communications. Every one at all acquainted with the career of his noble Friend for the seventeen or eighteen years during which he had been in the public service, and who knew the zeal and ability with which he had uniformly served his Sovereign and his country, whether in Jamaica, in Canada, or in the far East, must feel convinced that he was utterly incapable of making any statement—not in his place in Parliament or confirmed by his oath, but any statement of any sort or kind and under any circumstances—that was in the slightest degree inconsistent with the strictest truth. The personal question now raised did not in any way involve the real matter at issue, as far as the public interests were concerned—namely, whether the gallant Admiral did give the support that he had promised or might have given to the noble Lord, or whether he had been hindered by circumstances from doing so. That question must be decided when all the papers that had been moved for were before the House. Deploring as he did the bandying about of charges by Members in one House and Members in the other, in his opinion Parliament could not constitute itself a tribunal capable of determining the question which the hon. and gallant Admiral had raised. Either the House or the Government should issue a Commission empowered to take evidence on oath, and inquire into the whole matter as it now stood. He had every reason for believing that his noble Friend would have no difficulty in establishing, by corroborative testimony, every word that he had used, either in his despatches or in his speech "in another place." But nothing could be more detrimental to the public service or more disadvantageous to the character of statesmen than the exchange of contradictions and recriminations between Members in one House of Parliament and Members in the other. His noble Friend had, however, offered no contradiction of anything that had been said by the gallant Admiral. The papers were not yet presented which would enable him to do that; but he had stated what he conceived to be facts; and he trusted the House would give him credit for being utterly incapable, on any private ground, of doing the slightest injury to the gallant Admiral, or of making any statement, however minute, that was not consistent with the truth.

Mr. Cumming Bruce

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: As my hon. Friend behind me has referred to me, perhaps I may be allowed to express what I believe will meet with the general concurrence of the House—a very strong wish that at present, at least, this matter may go no further. A noble Lord, for whom personally we all feel great respect—a man of great distinction and great ability—has made a statement on his honour as a Peer. On that the gallant Admiral has risen in this House to-night and made a directly counter-statement on his honour as an officer. I do not believe there is a Gentleman in this Assembly who will for a moment doubt any statement so made by the noble Earl, or any statement so made by the gallant Admiral. I think the only conclusion at which we can arrive is, that there has been a most unfortunate, but I doubt not, unavoidable, misunderstanding between them. As far as the public question is concerned, the papers have been moved for, and they will very shortly inform us of the merits of that question one way or the other. As far as I am personally concerned in this matter, I am well content to leave it to those papers to show the part the late Government took in relation to it, and the reasons on which the late Board of Admiralty acted. I do not deny that it was a subject of regret to the late Board of Admiralty—and here I think I am right in the fact I now advert to—that lying side by side in the Gulf of Pecheli, as I believe the gallant Admiral and the noble Earl did, the noble Earl should have sent home a despatch seriously criminating the gallant Admiral, not, indeed, without showing him that despatch, but without telling him what were its contents, and what was the nature of his charges; so that it was only through the circuitous mode of receiving a despatch from the Admiralty calling on him for an explanation that the hon. and gallant Admiral was informed of the nature of the charges. It is a subject of regret that the misunderstanding should have occurred; but the noble Earl has declared, and I willingly accept his statement, that he acted from what he believed to be a sense of public duty. Under these circumstances I do hope that this painful question—which I believe can only have arisen from misapprehension between the parties—may, at least for the present, not be allowed to proceed further. When the despatches are on the table, the House will be able to judge of the merits of the question.

THE REFORM BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. STEUART said, he would beg to inquire, Whether it is the intention of the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to bring in the Reform Bill on Thursday next?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: I do not think the statement of the right hon. Gentleman, the late First Lord of the Admiralty, can be very satisfactory to Lord Elgin. There are two questions involved, into one of which I shall not enter—namely, whether Lord Elgin had or had not reasons for making complaints that the gallant Admiral had delayed bringing up the naval force to his assistance. That question was considered and decided by the late Board of Admiralty, according to their views, and if any hon. Member wishes to know more about it he can do so by moving for the papers. The other question is the personal question, which I understand in a somewhat different manner than the right hon. Gentleman. The complaint arose out of a statement in a published work; and I must observe that these difficulties are not unlikely to arise when a person employed in the public service and in the confidence of those performing public duties shortly afterwards publishes an account of differences that may have existed between the officers with whom he was serving. But that work having appeared, I think it was quite natural that the gallant Admiral should make the statement he had made. On the other hand, it was quite impossible, I think, for Lord Elgin not to take notice of the rumours that were spreading as to his conduct, and he states that the impression on his mind is full and clear, that at the time he wrote the despatches to the Foreign Office, he stated to the gallant Admiral what was the nature of the complaints that he had to make, and that although he did not actually show the despatches to the gallant Admiral, he conveyed to him the substance of them. The noble Earl having made that statement upon his honour as a Peer, I cannot doubt for a moment that such is the impression on his mind. The gallant Admiral, on the other hand, says that the statement is incorrect—in other words, that the impression on his mind is, that Lord Elgin made no such communication to him. I have a high respect for the gallant Admiral, and do not doubt that that is his impression. The only conclusion we can arrive at is, that these transactions having occurred in a distant part of the globe nearly a year and a half ago, the impression upon the minds of those concerned in them differ materially; but I do not think that that difference affects the honour either of the noble Earl or of the gallant Admiral. I have perfect confidence in the noble Earl. I have lately recommended to Her Majesty that Lord Elgin should be employed in a position of the greatest confidence, in which much must depend upon his discretion and judgment. After what has passed I should not do my duty, being at this time a colleague of the noble Earl, and at the head of the Foreign Department of this country, and the noble Earl having served the Crown in various capacities with great benefit to the public service, in Jamaica and Canada, as well as in China, if I did not declare that I believe the noble Earl is perfectly worthy of the confidence of Her Majesty, and that he is an honourable and faithful public servant. In reply to the question of the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. MacEvoy), I do not think it necessary to enter now into a discussion of the subject to which he has referred, nor to defer the resumption of the adjourned debate upon the Budget by a conversation upon the affairs of Italy. I stated upon a former occasion what were the facts, and I will repeat them. Many questions relating to the affairs of Italy having been left unsettled, we were invited by Austria and France to join a Congress. The meeting of that Congress being indefinitely adjourned we made certain propositions to the Government of France upon this subject. The proposition as regards Sardinia, was to place a restriction upon the King of Sardinia as to the employment of his forces. We had no right whatever to prevent him from making whatever use he pleased of his forces, but we asked him voluntarily to submit to a restriction, and we purposed that, after a time and in certain contingencies, the restrictions should cease. We did not refer particularly to the territories of the Pope or of the Grand Duke of Tuscany, but our proposition was a general proposition for the re-establishment of peace in Italy. The hon. Member may make what reflections he pleases, but it would certainly be satisfactory to me if I could contribute to the settlement of the affairs of Italy by promoting the peace and welfare of that country.

THE COMMERCIAL TREATY WITH FRANCE.—QUESTION.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he wished to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, what course will be followed to obtain the assent of Parliament to certain Articles of the Commercial Treaty with France; whether by Resolutions and Address to the Crown by the House of Commons, to be communicated in a Conference to the Lords, as appears by the Journals of the House of Commons, on February 23rd, in 1787, or by what other mode of proceeding. In two Articles of the Treaty it was provided that it should not be considered as binding until the assent of Parliament had been obtained. It was remarkable that in all the debates that had taken place the precedent of 1787 had never been correctly stated. In that year the treaty was laid on the table of the House on January 26th; it was considered in Committee of the whole House on the 15th of February, and on the following day twenty-one Resolutions were reported. These were made the foundation of an Address, which was carried after long debate and a division. A Conference with the Lords was obtained, and on the 8th of March a joint Address to the Crown was agreed to. He wished to know whether the Government intended to follow the precedent of 1787, or, if not, in what way they proposed to obtain the sanction of Parliament to the Treaty?

MR. AYRTON said, he wished to appeal to Mr. Speaker on a point of order relevant to the subject which the hon. Baronet had brought under their notice. There seemed to be some misunderstanding in the minds of hon. Members, and of the public, as to the course of proceeding in this House. There were many hon. Members who, approving very much the spirit in which the Treaty with France was negotiated, disapproved certain parts of the Treaty, and desired to submit particular questions for decision which affected the interests of their constituents. The hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Lindsay) put a Notice on the paper of a Motion relative to the shipping interest; but it was not clear how that Motion could be discussed. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Coventry (Mr. Ellice) had given notice of another Motion—"That it is inexpedient to reduce the duty on silk manufactures without making provision for the simultaneous admission of silks and ribands into France upon equal terms." He was under the impression that no such question as that could be raised in Committee, and, under that impression, he felt it his duty to vote against the Government on Monday night. But it now seemed that exactly what he thought could not be done could be done. The right hon. Member had consulted a Gentleman of high authority on the forms of the House, and had been informed that his Motion was consistent with its rules of procedure. He remembered having consulted one of their most eminent and distinguished authorities in points of order, the late Mr. FitzRoy, whose loss they must all deplore, and his reply was that it was essential that in Committee the debate should be strictly confined to the subject-matter of the Committee, and that every Resolution should be strictly within the limits of reference. In this state of uncertainty he was anxious to submit to the Speaker whether in Committee on the Customs Acts it was competent for an hon. Member to submit such a Resolution as that of the right hon. Member for Coventry.

Lord John Russell

MR. SPEAKER: I reminded the House the other evening that the Chairman of the Committees of Ways and Means is the judge of questions of order which may arise in Committee. I cannot say that a reference to myself of this kind is strictly in order. I could hardly, perhaps, with propriety answer the question unless it was the wish of the House that I should do so, and then only in general terms. A Committee can only deal with the matter that is specially referred to it. In a Committee of Customs' Duties any Resolution moved must refer to Customs' duties. If there were any treaty existing which related to such matters, it would, in my opinion, be competent to a Member to argue upon the subject of that treaty. But it would not be competent to the Committee to report to the House upon any provisions relating to the treaty, unless that treaty had been referred to the Committee. Consequently, it would not be competent for any Member to move a Resolution which could not with propriety be reported to the House. The Treaty may be discussed, but a Resolution on the subject would be out of place.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, that in the debate which took place a few evenings since some difference of opinion was expressed as to the extent to which legislative sanction was necessary to the validity of the Treaty with France; but there was no difference of opinion, and he imagined there could be no difference of opinion, as to the indispensable necessity of some Act or Acts of Parliament to give effect to it. They all knew that a Vote taken in Committee on the Customs was immediately operative; all persons engaged in commercial transactions acting on it just as if it had been sanctioned by all the branches of the Legislature. But a treaty with a foreign Power could not be legally sanctioned by a simple Vote in Committee of Customs. The House would probably be called on next Monday to agree to a proposition of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to reduce the duties on foreign wine to (say) 3s. a gallon. As soon as that Resolution should be carried the effect out of doors would be that the dealers would proceed as if the Resolution had already become law—as if the Vote had been an Act of Parliament. But this Vote would go farther; because it was announced that it was not to be merely a reduction of the duty for 1860-61, but that it was to be followed by an Act of Parliament, reducing the duties for ten years to come. But then the House knew well that, although an Act of Parliament might be passed to that effect in the present Session, it might be repealed, or varied, or altered by an Act of Parliament in another. But if the House agreed to a Resolution to reduce the duties with a view to the Treaty, and passed an Act to give effect to the reduction for ten years, the faith of Parliament would be pledged that the Act should not be altered during that period. He wished to avoid the danger of practically determining the question of the Treaty with France by a Resolution in Committee, especially as the Treaty would tie their hands for so long a period as ten years. He, therefore, wished to know what course the Government intended to take with regard to the Resolutions they would propose.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: The course which the Government propose to follow is that which I had the honour to explain upon a former occasion—namely, it is our intention to propose, in Committee on the Customs Acts, Resolutions bearing upon all the Articles of the Treaty which relate to changes in the Customs' laws; and as soon as the House shall have disposed of the Resolutions which, by referring to the Customs laws, have a direct bearing upon some of the engagements of the Treaty, it is our intention, without going further into the financial arrangements proposed, to submit to the consideration of the House an Address to the Crown, approving the Treaty in the aggregate. That will be communicated to the House of Lords, for the purpose of obtaining a joint Address from both Houses of the Legislature to the Crown on the subject of the Treaty.

INTENDED PRIZE FIGHT.

QUESTION.

MR. HADFIELD said, he rose to call attention to the Petition of the Inhabitants of Sudbrook Park, Petersham, and Ham, complaining of a meditated breach of the peace in England by a pugilistic contest between a British subject and an American citizen for the so-called Championship of England, and the consequences likely to arise therefrom; and to inquire of the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the notices of the contemplated proceedings in the public Newspapers, and whether he intends to take measures to put down the intended disturbance of the public peace. He felt confident that the Government would do all that was possible to prevent further proceedings in relation to the disgraceful contest which he saw by the newspapers had been arranged to take place between a British and an American subject. The petitioners deprecated the very vicious consequences that would arise from such an exhibition. It appeared that both the time and place of the contest were tolerably well known, and the petitioners, therefore, looked to the House of Commons to take proper measures for the purpose of preventing an exhibition so contrary to the moral and religious sense of the community at large. While the wreck of the Birkenhead and the defence of Lucknow were remembered, it needed no such brutal exhibitions to prove either the courage or the powers of endurance of our fellow-subjects. He, therefore, wished to know whether the public might rely upon the Home Secretary doing his best to prevent an exhibition so brutal and so demoralizing to the rising generation as this contest between the so-called Champion of England and the "Benicia Boy."

MARRIAGE WITH THE BROTHER OF A DECEASED HUSBAND.—QUESTION.

MR. COLLINS desired to draw the attention of the Home Secretary to a marriage which had recently taken place at the registrar's office, Shrewsbury, between a woman and the brother of her deceased husband. He was not going to waste the time of the House by reviving the controversy with respect to marriages with a deceased wife's sister, although he quite agreed with the noble Lord the Member for the City of London that if the one marriage were allowed, so ought the other. But the circumstances of the case to which he would refer were peculiar. It appeared that the man and the woman were both living at Bishop's Castle, about twenty miles from Shrewsbury; that they went before the clergyman of the parish, expressing a desire to be married, and were by him told that both by the law of God and the law of man such marriages were forbidden. They then went before the registrar of the district; but he declared the law of the land was against marriage with the brother of a deceased husband. Well, not put out by this discourtesy on the part of the clergyman and the registrar, and reckoning, perhaps, that if the marriage took place, one day or other some Member of Parliament would bring in a Bill to legalize it, one of the parties, the man, went to Shrewsbury, where he had never lived an hour nor spent a single night, and gave in his name and that of the person he intended to marry at the registrar's office, stating that there was no bar on the ground of consanguinity or affinity to their marriage, and likewise that they had resided so many days at Shrewsbury, and they were then married. Now, he believed the clergy were bound to ascertain whether the parties desirous of contracting marriage before them did or did not reside in the parish; but the registrar was not bound to make such inquiry.

Mr. Hadfield

What he, therefore, wished to know was, whether the attention of the Home Secretary has been called to the marriage of James Bailes and Anne Bailes, which took place on the 17th of December last, and if he is prepared to institute a prosecution for perjury against the parties under the second section of the 19 & 20 Viot., c. 119; and, likewise, whether he intends to take any steps whereby clandestine marriages before the registrar may be more effectually checked.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: The arguments of those hon. Gentlemen who complain of the miscellaneous character of the debate which takes place on Friday evenings on the Motion for adjournment, might derive some confirmation from what has taken place this evening, when a discussion, commencing on the conduct of Lord Elgin and Sir Michael Seymour in the East, goes on next to the mode of proceeding with regard to the French Treaty, next to the earnest and pathetic appeal of my hon. Friend with respect to an approaching pugilistic encounter, and winds up with a question, preceded by a rather diffuse narrative, from the hon. Member for Knaresborough with respect to the fraudulent marriage of a woman with the brother of her deceased husband. I have only to state shortly, in reference to the question of my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, that my attention was called some time ago to the proposed pugilistic encounter for the honours of the championship. The letter was referred to Sir Richard Mayne, who no doubt will take care to obtain information on the subject, and I daresay he will be able to prevent the occurrence of this encounter within the limits of the metropolitan police. Beyond that assurance, I am afraid I cannot venture to give any positive promise to my hon. Friend, because, as I am informed, no day or place has been fixed for this feat of arms; and, under those circumstances, the parties will probably take measures to defeat the vigilance of the police, and thus place it out of their power to prevent a sudden incursion into the country. With regard to the second Question—that of the hon. Member for Knaresborough—I can only say that application was made to me on the subject some time ago; I was asked to institute a prosecution for perjury; but, on a review of all the circumstances of the case, I came to the conclusion that there was nothing to justify my taking it out of the hands of the proper local authorities.

TREATY WITH FRANCE.—COALS.

QUESTION.

MR. HORSMAN: I have a Question to put to the noble Lord at the head of the Government, with respect to the Treaty of Commerce with France. [Sir GEORGE GREY: He has already spoken.] Well, then, I will give notice of my Question, in order that the noble Lord may be able to answer it on Monday. It is this—We have seen it stated in some of the sources of information, which, though not authoritative, usually supply pretty authentic information, that Her Majesty's Ministers have been in communication with the French Government with respect to a modification of the 11th Article of the Treaty—namely, that relating to coal. I myself brought that article under the notice of the House, and it is my intention to move an Amendment on the Motion for an Address—of course, not an Amendment for the purpose of setting aside the Treaty—but an Amendment praying Her Majesty to request the consent of the Emperor of the French to the omission of the 11th Article of the Treaty. But it would be satisfactory to know whether there is any truth in the report that Her Majesty's Ministers have been in communication with the French Government for the object so stated. I shall therefore put a question to the noble Lord on Monday.

House at rising to adjourn till Monday next.

REVENUE AND EXPENDITURE.—
RESOLUTION.THE COMMERCIAL TREATY WITH FRANCE.—THE BUDGET.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.—THIRD NIGHT.

Order read for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [21st February],—

"That this House, recognizing the necessity of providing for the increased expenditure of the coming financial year, is of opinion that it is not expedient to add to the existing deficiency by diminishing the ordinary revenue, and is not prepared to disappoint the just expectations of the Country by re-imposing the Income-tax at an unnecessarily high rate."

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that he had not moved the adjournment on the previous evening for the sake of merely making a speech, but in order to draw attention to a matter which was well worthy of consideration—namely, to the fact that the Treaty did not coincide with the instructions given by the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs to Lord Cowley and Mr. Cobden. The noble Lord had thus written:—

"Taking these as the respective points of departure on the two sides, Her Majesty's Government are prepared to admit, as appears also to be the opinion of the French Government, that the proper basis for the operation will be, on the side of France, a general transition, so far as British commodities are concerned, from prohibition or high duty to duties at a moderate rate; and, on the side of England, the total abolition of Customs' duties on French productions where fiscal considerations will permit it, and reduction to the lowest practicable point, together with the entire abandonment of any protective impost on behalf of a British and against a French commodity, where fiscal considerations will not allow total abolition."

On turning to the Treaty, and reading over the articles to which the contracting parties respectively bound themselves, he found that on the part of France the contract related only to articles imported from—only to the produce of—this country; but on the part of England it was proposed that Her Majesty and the Houses of Parliament should, under the obligation of a contract made with France only, admit the produce of all countries, of whatever origin those goods might be, free of duty, into the United Kingdom. Article 1, which expressed the obligation of France, stated thus—

"His Majesty the Emperor of the French engages that on the following articles of British production and manufacture imported from the United Kingdom into France, the duties shall in no case exceed thirty per cent ad valorem, the two additional decimes included."

Then follows a list of commodities under forty-three heads, and a general provision to enable the French Government to add to the amount of the French Customs' duties an amount equal to the Inland or Excise taxation charged upon like articles of French production. Article 5 expressed the obligation contracted by Her Majesty with the Emperor of the French, and runs thus—

"Article 5. Her Britannic Majesty engages to recommend to Parliament to enable her to abolish the duties of importation on the following articles."

Then follows a list under forty-two headings, including in the last item all articles charged with a duty of ten per cent, but not enumerated in the tariff, and a general provision against the introduction of articles duty free, into the composition of which articles chargeable with Customs' or Excise duties largely enter. Well may the hon. Member for Birmingham endeavour to excuse such provisions as these—which are the handiwork of his friend Mr. Cobden—on the plea of haste. Let the House consider the position in which these articles place this country with respect to other countries besides France. The hon. Member for Portsmouth, in his admirable speech the previous evening, had well observed,

[Third Night.

“ In the first place, if such great blessings were to be derived from a commercial treaty with France, he felt inclined to ask, ‘ Why don't you enter into commercial treaties with other countries ? ’ If they were to make friends with France at the expense of a million of their revenue—for it came to that—why couldn't they spend a small sum in making other friends on the Continent, where they had not too many ? Let the Government, then, take a lesson from their own book, and apply their principles of friendship to the negotiation of commercial treaties with other States besides France.”

This was a Treaty between the Governments of England and of France, but in what position would it place this country with all the rest of the world ? The Emperor of France was treated in it as the representative of all mankind. He would have the opportunity of going to the Rhenish provinces, the Zollverein, to Switzerland, to Savoy, and to Spain, and saying, “ Do not trouble yourselves to enter into commercial treaties with England. I have managed England. I have obtained conditions in this Treaty under which you will all be able to bring your produce into her ports on better terms even than my immediate subjects, for it will not be necessary for you to render yourselves liable to the engagements which I have contracted, not to charge above 30 per cent.” This country, he maintained, ought not to be placed in such a false position, in such a humiliating relation as respects the Emperor of the French. This was a strong illustration of the imprudent spirit and of the haste with which the Treaty had been negotiated, that Her Majesty was placed at a grievous disadvantage as regarded other Powers. In this respect, moreover, as he had shown, the instrument was directly at variance with the directions given by the Secretary for Foreign Affairs. The safety of this country consisted in its prestige, and some measures ought to be taken for removing the anomalies which this document introduced regarding the interests of England. The hon. Member for Birmingham had undertaken to lecture him (Mr. Newdegate), speaking in the unwonted guise of a Protectionist, in which he said, and truly, that he lost his usual fluency. In the course of a lengthened dissertation he had told the House that France had engaged to concede five times as much as we were doing. It was perfectly true that France was making a great and a wise reduction of duties, and was wisely abandoning prohibition in many cases. She was acting on the principle of the late Sir Robert Peel in reducing Customs' charges, and in removing import duties from raw materials for her manufactures and articles of primary necessity. France was creating, not abandoning revenue ; we, on the contrary, were abandoning revenue, abolishing the means by which we had maintained the establishments of the country, and increasing our deficiency—and for what purpose ? To admit to this country no articles of prime necessity—not raw materials for manufactures, not articles on which the cost of collection was too great to make it worth while to maintain the impost—but duties on articles of luxury—which were to be relinquished with scarcely a pretence of an equivalent in return. If they glanced at the catalogue of the articles on which the duty was to be remitted by England under Article 5, they would find that the production or manufacture of them gave employment to 800,000 of the people of this country. And of those no less than 450,000 were women. It was indeed a woman's question. It did seem to him a bigoted and insane adherence to a system thus to diminish the means of employing so many women, when they knew the difficulty of obtaining employment for the females of this country. This blind adherence to a system that would have such results reminded him of the words—

Mr. Newdegate

“ Man to man so oft unjust,
Is always so to woman.”

They might not protect the labour of men, but by the laws of nature they were bound to protect the women of the land. He must say it did appear to him that a jealous, a bigoted, an insane hatred of protection—knowing as they did that the difficulty in obtaining employment for the females of this country which was leading them to a sacrifice of revenue rather than give protection to the labour of women. He could not conceal his opinion on this subject. The hon. Member for Birmingham had addressed him as a Protectionist. His

(Mr Newdegate's) opinions were modified, but he did not differ with the great body of mankind. Look round the world—in their own colonies, with their progressive legislation—and then say whether the rigid adherence to this system of free imports—for they had degraded their political economy from being a science to a mere system—was not contrary to the common sense of mankind throughout the world? When they propose to carry out that system against the labour of the women of this country, it did grate upon his feelings—and he appealed to the Gentlemen of that House, and especially to the Secretary at War—for no man had done more to promote female employment—he appealed to them upon this subject as gentlemen and as men. He had said that his opinions were modified. He approved of Customs' duties as a means of revenue, and he never would condemn Customs' duties because they might, as a means of revenue, happen to encourage the industry of the country. He attributed an object as yet overlooked to Mr. Cobden's negotiation. They were about to have a Reform Bill. It was his (Mr. Newdegate's) conviction that the Reform Bill would include in the representation of that House a more popular element, and that a House of Commons thus constituted would not be actuated by the stern adherence to this system of free imports under which that House was at present acting. He was convinced that Mr. Cobden and the Member for Birmingham anticipated this, and were determined by this contract with France to chain down a future Parliament to their system. This was not now a party question; if he were asked to vote for a corn law, or to propose a corn law, his answer would be "never." Never, until, and may God forbid that this should ever happen! the people had felt the misery of a dependence upon foreigners for food. And why would he never until then sanction a corn law? Because he had seen the use that had been made of it to destroy the institutions of the country. And that brought him to the question of the duties they were about to retain. What were they? Duties on articles of almost prime necessity to the people. Heavy duty on coffee; upon tea a duty of 100 per cent; a heavy duty on sugar, and a heavy excise on malt. He would ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether in the speech of the hon. Member for Birmingham he did not see a foreshadowing of an agitation for breaking down these duties upon food? The hon. Member for Birmingham was always explicit. He told them plainly what his intentions were. He objected to the expense of our defensive armaments, and therefore he contemplated a deficiency, not of ten millions nor of twelve. His object was to abolish customs and excise. The hon. Member had elsewhere proposed a scheme of his own, and that included the abolition of the duty on coffee, sugar and tea. Of what use was it for the Secretary for Ireland to quote Adam Smith. Why, Adam Smith recommended that we should maintain the navigation laws. Where were they? A difficulty was felt now about manning the navy. Many were not quite clear that we had done wisely in repealing the navigation laws. Adam Smith was of opinion that it was a foolish act. But what was the use of quoting science to a man who dealt in exciting public agitation—who spoke in that House with some moderation and respect, but out of it spared no language to condemn its Members? Who called them a collection of tax-eaters, and said that the Members of that House lived upon the sweat and toil of the people whom they oppressed. And yet that very man was he who was all the while proclaiming the triumph of free trade, and saying, "look at your prosperity." Really to hear these men speak of the success of their system, one would think that it was they and their system which made the sun to shine upon the just and upon the unjust, and sent the dew by which the earth brought forth her increase. Had not other countries prospered under commercial systems very different from this? Was not America successful, and did not her commerce extend? Look at France; the commercial relations of the two countries were all in favour of France, as shown by their own accounts, and by the report of the French Minister to the Emperor. See how the matter stood. The value of the imports of the five years ending with 1858 from France were £55,218,000, and the exports to France £26,700,000; so that, of course, the commercial relations between the two countries were not satisfactory to hon. Gentlemen on the Government side of the House. And why so? Why, because France was drawing our bullion. That was the case of Gentlemen opposite. If they attributed all prosperity to free trade, how could they account for the prosperity of France? Why, France ought to be crippled, according to such teachers, by her commercial system; but she is not. He was free to admit that the French system was in some respects objectionable, and that it was unwise to maintain prohibitions and to tax the raw materials of manufacture. But, spite of that, the revenue of France was elastic, and Gentlemen opposite complained that there must be some change, because France was robbing us of our gold. Take the case of the United States. The hon. Member for Birmingham had pointed to the increase in the trade of the United States. That according to the hon. Member could be accounted for by her protective system of imports. Would the hon. Member have the kindness to consider the element of Californian gold in connection with the trade of America? It was to that powerful element that the prosperity of our trade with America was mainly attributable, and yet that element had been overlooked in this discussion, save by the hon. Member for Leeds. He only had had the honesty to advert to that great circumstance. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, gifted as he was with an eloquence that enabled him to cast a nebulous and prismatic halo around the worst parts of his case, had made historic references to prove what he called the success of free trade, and he began with 1842. Why he (Mr. Newdegate) had had the pleasure of supporting Sir Robert Peel in all his measures up to 1846, and he asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer to remember the effect that was produced on the revenue between 1842 and 1846. Why, at the end of 1844, Sir Robert Peel, instead of a deficit, found himself in possession of a surplus of more than three millions. No parallel elasticity of revenue since that period could be quoted. No period of greater commercial prosperity could be quoted than from 1842 to 1846, and yet England was not then under the system of free imports. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had not referred to that fact at all. Look at the difference between that period and that which extended from 1850 to 1853. In 1850 the country felt the first pinch of free trade under a restricted currency. In 1848 the discovery of gold in California was made, and in 1851 began the working of gold in Australia. In 1853 the product of gold from California amounted to £10,703,000, while the product from Australia had grown up to £9,990,000 in the year, and from that period regularly from year to year there had been added £20,000,000 to the circulation of the world, and half of that amount had come from a colony of England—had come to this country in relief of the pressure from a contracted currency. The year 1853 was marked by something more substantial than the fact that the right hon. Member spoke for five hours in making his financial statement. He remembered conversations he had with the late Sir Robert Peel on this subject and that subsequently he put a question to him—the first he had ever put in that House—in 1844, that statesman fully admitted the importance of this element. Was it, then, worthy of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who called himself a pupil of the late Sir Robert Peel, but was enforcing a policy totally different from that of his master, to omit all notice of that subject, and to attribute all the material progress of this country solely to the system of free trade? The hon. Member for Birmingham spoke of himself, and Mr. Cobden, and the Emperor of the French in the sense nos et rex noster. He said, of the Treaty “this is my accomplishment.” He warned the Government not to depart from his system, or they should be swept from the Government benches. The hon. Member did not stop there; he had publicly proposed entirely to overturn the system of indirect taxation, and place the finances of the country directly upon property. The hon. Gentleman was going to re-establish the feudal system against the proprietors of real property, but without its privileges. He proposed a sort of pole-tax, which it would be impossible to enforce, and property tax. Was that a system that House was likely to sanction? Was that likely to commend itself to the deliberate wisdom of Parliament? Was it likely to commend itself to the holders of property throughout the country? The hon. Member for Birmingham’s scheme was before the country, and he (Mr. Newdegate) fully believed, that the result of the hon. Member’s system would be to impose taxation upon real property and the Funds up to about one-quarter of their value. Experience of the income tax warned them how easily personal property and property invested in trade evaded such an impost. Was the hon. Member’s project that which the House was about to sanction; was it prudent of them to accept the position of either being compelled to restrict their defensive establishments, or to accept as the alternative the ultimate imposition of a confiscatory tax of 20 per cent on property? Was it wise in them to sanction this Treaty, so hastily concluded that it failed to place the two contracting Powers on an equal footing before the world? He should have great pleasure in voting for this Motion of the hon. Member for Essex, and he thanked him for having afforded him the opportunity of warning the House that they were launched upon a course the probable results of which were such as all must deprecate, for in adopting that system they were fearfully crippling their sinews of war, undermining the means of their defences, and doing much to imperil the national greatness and safety of the country.

Mr. Newdegate

MR. BRIGHT said, he wished to say a word in explanation of a point which the hon. Gentleman had referred to with regard to himself. He understood the hon. Gentleman to say that he (Mr. Bright) wished to place so much of taxation as he had described on what he called real property; that was, generally speaking, the land and buildings of the country. That never was his intention. He never made any such proposition; he never proposed any taxation of that description that he did not propose to lay on all other property, whether in connection with land or trade.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he would not willingly misrepresent the hon. Gentleman, but he had judged from the hon. Member's own statement of his own scheme and from his own figures.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE: The hon. Gentleman the Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) has solemnly assured the House that he has modified his opinions, but I am sure, after the speech which we have just heard, hon. Members will have some difficulty in discovering, if they do not absolutely fail to perceive in what that modification consists. I, at all events, can call to mind the fact that the self-same objections have been urged to-night against the Budget of the Chancellor of the Exchequer by the hon. Gentleman which he advanced against free trade in 1847. The hon. Gentleman even then came forward with the cry of "Protection to English women." He then warned the House of what they were about to do, and said, in the same solemn tones, "Remember the women of England." [MR. NEWDEGATE: Hear!] The hon. Gentleman has not forgotten the women of England; he has not modified his opinions with regard to the women of England. He also spoke of the import of gold in this country from California. But, Sir, whatever the opinions of the hon. Gentleman may be, we have no right to be surprised at them; he has always been consistent, true, and outspoken; and, although I differ from him, I have always honoured his consistent, straightforward, and highminded vindication of his own opinions. But I think we are called upon to express some surprise when we hear the sentiments which proceed from those right hon. Gentlemen who have been, not converts, but the first apostles of the free-trade policy. I must say I was surprised and disappointed indeed at the speech of the right hon. Member for Portsmouth. It appeared to me that he certainly has, to use the hon. Gentleman's expression, somewhat modified his opinions. What was his criticism upon this Commercial Treaty? I must say, with regard to this Commercial Treaty, that the more it is criticized the less objection can be made by Free-traders to any of its principles. I can understand an hon. Member when he says he considers the old system of making commercial treaties is obsolete: those treaties are in their nature restrictive; but are there any restrictions in this Treaty? Though this Treaty be made nominally with France, is not the country left at liberty to deal on the same terms with every other country? There are no restrictions whatever in the Treaty, though to hear some hon. Gentlemen speak of it one would suppose all our silks were to come from Lyons and all our wines from Burgundy or Bordeaux. The whole world is open to us. Sir, we sometimes find that a right hon. Gentleman who has formerly filled the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer is led to speak of the Budgets of others in an invidious spirit, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Portsmouth (Sir F. Baring) said, at any rate, whatever the merits of the Treaty, he found that France had the best of the bargain. I deny that there is any bargaining in this case at all. If Mr. Cobden were open to the charge of making any bargaining in this Treaty, I should say it ought to be condemned on every account. We make no bargain with France. But are hon. Gentlemen so fanatical in their adherence to free trade that they will refuse to assist France to take off prohibitory duties from a pedantic affectation of love for the doctrines of free trade? Now, what says Adam Smith, who was sneered at by the hon. Gentleman—[Mr. NEWDEGATE: No, no!]

—well, patronized by the hon. Gentleman; what does Adam Smith say of commercial treaties, and especially commercial treaties with France? I am sorry not to see the right hon. Member for Portsmouth in his place. When he talked of a best bargaining system of free trade he must have had a most imperfect understanding of the doctrines of free trade. What says Adam Smith?—

“The disinclination of foreign Governments to enter into commercial treaties on a footing of reciprocity has been urged as a reason why we should not admit their commodities into our markets. It is true that the French Government have by an unwise regulation prohibited the introduction of English cottons and hardware into France, thus forcing their own subjects to purchase inferior articles at a higher price. This is a line of conduct that ought to be carefully avoided, not followed. Because the French Government makes her subjects pay an artificially-enhanced price for cottons and hardware, there is no reason why the English Government should injure its subjects by making them pay an enhanced price for their wines, brandies, and silks. To act thus is not to retaliate on the French, but ourselves. It is erecting the blind and brutal impulses of revenge into maxims of State policy.”

So much for the best bargain system. I maintain that this Commercial Treaty has been made in conformity with the doctrines of free trade, and that no bargaining has taken place on this question at all. I am very thankful that the prohibitory system in France has been one step removed, and we may hope to see it ultimately altogether removed by the exertions Mr. Cobden has made in this matter. I am very sorry to hear the hon. Member for North Warwickshire, of all people in the world, endeavouring the other night to get up an anti-Gallican feeling on this subject, by talking of this Treaty as a submission to France. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Stroud (Mr. Horsman) has talked somewhat in the same strain. That right hon. Gentleman has come out this Session as a Whig of the year 1787, and talks of our submission to France. Why, Sir, turning to the old debates of that year, I find that a Whig, very much of the same kidney, if I may use that expression, as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Stroud, made almost the same speech. I refer to the suspected author of Junius, Sir Philip Francis,—a remarkably good-natured man: he prophesied that nothing but evil would result if Mr. Pitt carried his treaty—that it was a badge of submission to France; and he declared emphatically that if it were adopted “the English people would be civilized out of their virtues and polished out of their character.” Instead of provoking an anti-Gallican spirit, I would say that this Treaty is twice blessed; it blesses him who gives and him who takes; and I feel satisfied if its provisions are carried out, the good understanding that will spring up between the people of this country and the people of France, will eventually enable you to cut down the monstrous expenditure, especially in our army and navy, which I do not think a great credit to the House or the country. I think the answer to all this rhodomontade of submission to France was well and forcibly put by the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright), when he spoke of the effects of our commerce with America. What did he tell you were the returns for the export to America of our home products? Not less than £22,000,000. If that be so with the Atlantic rolling between the two countries, what may we not expect of our trade with our next-door neighbour, our natural ally, nearer to us than Ireland, with, I may say, but a herring pond between us? Instead of £5,000,000, as at present, there is no reason why our trade with France should not produce as much as our trade with America. Mr. Pitt and Adam Smith were both of that opinion. And yet Her Majesty's Government have been blamed for endeavouring to remove the existing anomaly. Exception has been taken to the 11th Article of the Treaty, relating to the export of coal, and all the dowager sympathies of the country have been evoked by the fear that the supply of coal may only last 300 years. I will not go into that question. I think the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Stroud (Mr. Horsman) is geologically wrong; he was thinking of Newcastle coal alone, and lost sight of that in South Wales. There seems to be a monomania on this subject: the late Mr. Warburton, who was a Member of this House, was so strongly impressed with the opinion that our fields of coal would only last a certain time, that he denied himself the comfort of a fire. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will not adopt such extreme views. It has been said that the French Government wish to lay up enormous stores of steam coal for their fleet. Is the House aware that it would be almost impossible to lay up stores of steam coal in any very great quantity? There would be not only much waste, but the danger of spontaneous combustion would be very great. Is not this, after all, a mere bugbear? Any one who reads the letter of M. Chevalier must be perfectly satisfied of this. Without this Treaty, the Emperor of the French could buy as much coal as he wished. But does the right hon. Gentleman want to have a prohibitory duty put upon all coal? I do not say whether an export duty would in the abstract be a good or a bad thing. That is a question more for Committee than for a debate on the broad features of the Budget. But what would be the effect of striking this Article out of the Treaty? The case is most ably put by a coalowner, who says,—“By keeping up high discriminating duties against English coal the Emperor of the French might force the rate of production in the Belgian and Prussian coal-mines—many of them worked with English capital,—and this in the event of war would make him quite independent of England. But this Treaty will place not only the French Navy, but the steam mercantile marine of France in such a position of dependence on England, that in the case of an interruption of supply, they would experience great embarrassment and distress, as collieries cannot possibly be opened in less than from three to five years. Is not that a sufficient answer to all objections? In 1860 coal is about to play the same part as corn did in the free-trade struggle of 1846. We were told that the time would come when we must be dependent on foreigners for our food. Nobody in the country believes that now. As little, by and by, will any considerable portion of the community believe that this argument about coal is more than a complete bugbear, conjured up to defeat this Budget. I was surprised to hear what fell from the right hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir F. Baring) last night as to the wine duties. The right hon. Gentleman scoffed altogether at the idea of reducing those duties, and said, “Look at your petitions; nobody cares about wine—all the petitions presented are against anybody being allowed to sell wine.” He ought to have recollected that this is a licensed victualler’s cry, and that when you interfere with a large interest like theirs, of course they do not want wine or any other beverage. They wish to stick to their own “black strap” and adulterated beer. The right hon. Gentleman also said the reduction of the wine duties had never led to any sensible increase in the revenue; and he particularly instanced Lord Althorp’s reduction in 1831. How far is he borne out by the facts? I took the opportunity to look for them this morning. I find that in 1831 Lord Althorp lowered the duty on French wine from 7s. 3d. to 5s. 6d. a gallon; and mind, he asked for no concessions from France; he sinned against the best bargain system of the right hon. Gentleman. What, however, was the result of the change? The revenue from wine in 1831, before the duties were reduced, was £77,184. In a cycle of ten years, under the operation of the new scale, the revenue rose to £110,054. That was their amount in 1842. Here, then, is proof positive that a remission of the wine duties imparts elasticity to your revenue. But I maintain that these duties—to use the words of the present Chancellor of the Exchequer—are the scandal of our tariff. They keep our products out of nine tenths of the markets of Europe. They ought to be reduced to the lowest possible amount not only on financial but on sanitary and moral considerations. Hon. Gentlemen opposite say wine is a luxury which may be dispensed with. Why is it a luxury? Because you have made it so by your excessive taxation. The duty on the low class of wines that the poor man would drink is 250 per cent. It is only 25 per cent on the higher class of wines. Yet, when you have yourselves made it impossible for the man to get this beverage, you turn round and say it is a luxury. How well your argument is answered by the Report of Lord Chelsea! And I must say that Report does the noble Lord great honour, and fully justifies the late Chancellor of the Exchequer in sending him to the position which he did; for I think the Report of Lord Chelsea proves that he is a man equal to any situation. [An hon. MEMBER: Your friends removed him.] I think Lord Chelsea was very ill-treated, and if a Motion had been brought forward in his favour I would have supported it. That noble Lord’s elaborate Report shows that it is not so many ages ago that wheaten bread was a luxury; that down to the 17th century meat was a luxury. It also instances tea and sugar, and gives most convincing proof that it is only your enormous duties that have made wine, which is in reality a necessary, a luxury in this country. The hon. mover of the Amendment, in his able speech, said, "Oh, these light wines will never suit the English palate!" and after declaring that they would rather be a curse than a boon, he added that our brewers need be under no apprehension that their articles would be supplanted by them. Now, the House may not be aware that in the year 1689 so great was the taste for French wines in this country that an Act of Parliament was passed for prohibiting all commercial intercourse with France for three years. In that Act it is declared that the demand for French wines had become so great that it injured our public revenue. Of course, if you lay on duties to that extent you may entirely change the taste of the people. A curious article in McCulloch's Dictionary clearly shows the effect of the Methuen Treaty in 1703 in driving trade into new channels and wholly altering the taste of the country. If you reduce the duties, as is now proposed, you will have an enormous commerce in French wines. Nobody who reads the Report of the Committee who inquired in 1852 into the operation of the import duties can rise from its perusal without feeling satisfied of the incalculable benefit to be derived from the reduction of the wine duties. One very celebrated witness gave valuable evidence as to its effect in increasing our shipping trade. Mr. Cyrus Redding says:—

Mr. Bernal Osborne

[Third Night.]

"The present duties on wine are not to be judged solely by their extravagant amount; they lock up and keep idle a large amount of capital and labour which would benefit the public and the revenue if they were in full activity. If the consumption of wines were increased to 30,000,000 gallons, as there is every reason to believe it would be, there would be required no less than 600 vessels of 250 tons each to bring the wine home, instead of 120. These ships must take out freights, so that the advantage to the shipping interests would be considerable."

We are now all deploring the prevalence of an excessive love of spirits and strong drinks. Here is the evidence of one of the largest licensed victuallers in London, Mr. Baker:—

"He sells (he says) over the counter in glasses a pipe and a half of port per week, and finds there is a growing taste for wine, which would increase if the duties were lowered."

His customers, he said, were among the artizan class. I have also in my hand the evidence of two other licensed victuallers, Mr. Pod and Mr. Short, whose customers belong to the same class.

"Mr. Pod draws 160 pipes a year; of this he sells two pipes and a-half per week in draught—

Mr. Bernal Osborne

port, sherry, and bucellas from butt, champagne and claret from bottle. He charges 4d. per glass port, 7d. champagne, 6d. claret; the duty too high on French wines; if the duty were lower the people would prefer them to port. Artisans of all sorts take their glass of wine; Irish labourers frequently carry home a bottle of port to their families."

This witness says the taste for port is increasing, but by your excessive duties you encourage adulteration. It is calculated, I believe, that not less a sum than £400,000 a year is lost to your revenue by this adulteration. And what does the House think is the composition of the port wine that these Irish labourers take home to their families? Here is the testimony given by Mr. Bastick before a Committee of this House as to the effect of your high duties in poisoning the people. Let me read a curious recipe, quoted by Mr. Bastick, for making port wine:—

"Take cider, forty-five gallons; brandy, six; port, eight; ripe sloes, two; stew the latter in two gallons of water, press off the liquor. If colour be not strong enough, add tincture of red sanders. When bottled, put in each bottle a teaspoonful of catechu—it will produce a fine crusty appearance. Soak ends of the corks in a strong decoction of Brazil wood with alum, which will give it a fine appearance of age."

That is the mixture called "publican's port," which the Irish labourer takes home in a bottle, and nobody but an Irish labourer, I should think, could manage to swallow such a vile decoction. I believe you are poisoning the people by your high rates of duty. Then, again, something may be said about the use of wine among the sick poor, and that is an important consideration. Evidence upon that point was taken before the Wine Committee, and a surgeon who was examined was asked—

"What would be the effect of a reduction of the wine duties? I have no doubt that if wine was cheaper I should prescribe it more frequently than I do, in lieu of porter and spirits, as its healing effects are more marked among poor patients than among the rich."

We have plenty of medical evidence upon this point to show the benefit which would arise if the wine duties were reduced to an extent that could bring wine within the reach of the sick poor. I have gone rather fully into this point, because I feel strongly upon it. Instead of being an immaterial point, as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Portsmouth would have us believe, this proposed reduction of duties is a most beneficent plan, and will tend to improve the tastes and morals of the poor. I was astonished to hear the speech of the hon. Member for King's County (Mr. Hennessy), who said he would take an Irish view of the Budget, and a singularly Irish view, indeed, he did take. He said it was the worst Budget for Ireland that he had ever known. I do not understand that, because it seems to me that what is commercially good for England must be commercially good for Ireland. The hon. Member adduced two instances of injury to his countrymen—the alliterative articles of butter and boot fronts. I do not apprehend that the Irish farmers, with their skill in the production of butter, are afraid of the competition of the French farmer. But did the hon. Gentleman forget that Ireland was a great wool-producing country, and that it would be a great advantage to the Irish wool-grower to have the French market thrown open to him? There is also the lucrative frieze manufacture, which is now reviving. Do not talk to me about butter and boot fronts. I do not say that this is a singularly good Budget for Ireland, but I do believe it will promote the comforts of the lower classes in Ireland more than some Gentlemen expect. The next point is the paper duty, but I shall not go much into that. I think the right hon. Member for Bucks (Mr. Disraeli) has made a mistake in opposing this Budget in the first instance. I think he should have accepted the principle, and have opposed the details in Committee. I have no doubt that I could have gone with him in opposing many of those details. I am not prepared to say that taking off the paper duty at this time is exactly prudent. I know my hon. Friend below me (Mr. Bright) thinks otherwise; but I doubt whether this be the right time for removing that tax. However, I like the Budget well enough to swallow the remission of the paper duty. Now, as to the income tax, I am like many other Gentlemen, who like the Budget but do not like to pay for it. I think it was a little unfair in the right hon. Baronet the Member for Portsmouth to twit the Chancellor of the Exchequer for what he said in 1853. In that year the Chancellor of the Exchequer made no promise; he only declared his anticipations. Even if he had made any promise, surely the right hon. Member for Portsmouth, having filled the office himself, is too wise to believe the promise of a Chancellor of the Exchequer in relation to future taxes. Did the right hon. Gentleman himself never make a promise which was not kept? The hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Hubbard) has told the House that we are to pay 2*d.* in the pound to enable Mr. Cobden to give his Imperial pupil a lesson in free trade. That is cleverly put, but it is not the fact. We are to pay an extra 2*d.* in the pound, because since 1858 you have added £8,000,000 to your expenditure for the army and navy. It is not the sacrifice of £650,000 of Customs' and Excise duties that makes a double income tax necessary, it is your expenditure for your army and navy. And I do not agree with the hon. Member for Birmingham that that expenditure is needless and blameable. You have been reorganizing your army and your navy. The country cannot stand still while great improvements in military science are in progress everywhere else. Even the hon. Member for Birmingham himself would not wish us to be without Armstrong guns, or that we should keep to the old paddle steamers when that method of propulsion had been superseded by the screw. It was necessary to reorganize our army and our navy which causes the enormous expenditure; but I do not look forward to paying thirty millions for that purpose every year. I believe that when we have placed the army and navy upon a proper footing, we shall be able to cut down, not the rank and file, but the expenditure, and I feel sure that if you carry out the principles of this Commercial Treaty, the intercourse between the two countries will be such as to render it unnecessary to maintain such large forces. I consider we are paying upon a capital policy of assurance by accepting this Treaty. It is like gilding refined gold to say anything upon the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer; but there is one thing which I regret, and that is, that the right hon. Gentleman postponed to another year all consideration of the incidence of the income tax. I am of opinion that if the income tax is to last for ever, it is a perfectly just tax, because in time all interests adjust themselves to it; but if it is to be shifted from time to time, high one year and low the next, then I say this income tax inflicts great injury and injustice. I do wish the Chancellor of the Exchequer could have settled the question now. He has only the Reform Bill and the Budget on his hands, and the consideration of this subject would have been a trifle to him. But I warn him that it will not do to go on postponing this question from year to year. Tenpence in the pound is a very large sum to pay. The Budget is an excellent one, and, I think, worth the money; but still 10*d.* is a large sum. We ought to know whether the income tax is to be a permanent source of revenue; we must not be always playing fast and loose, putting on the tax for two years, then for three, and then postponing all consideration of its inequalities. I like the Budget well enough to take it as it is. Some hon. Gentlemen opposite do not like the Budget, because they say it is a Manchester Budget. It is 73 years ago since Mr. Pitt's Budget was objected to because it was a French Budget. I certainly was astonished to hear the great Conservative party making such an objection. If there be anything which the Conservative party ought to have inherited it is free-trade principles from Mr. Pitt. Hon. Gentlemen on this side were not always Free-traders, and even in my time there was not one Member now upon that (the Ministerial bench) who was a Free-trader. I am surprised that the great Conservative party are not delighted to seize the great inheritance of Mr. Pitt. I cannot understand how they allowed that inheritance to be taken from them by the Manchester school; and when they oppose it because it is a Manchester Budget, I support it for that very reason, because it is derived from the greatest man in finance the world ever saw—Mr. Pitt. Therefore I call upon all real Conservatives to go with the Government into Committee, and to give their most ardent support to the principles of the Budget.

[Third Night.

MR. T. BARING: For myself I have been too long engaged in trade not to know that trade needs interchange, that interchange produces reciprocity, and that free trade is never adopted without interchange and reciprocity. We have yet to get free trade. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. B. Osborne) says this is no bargain; but if this is not a bargain I should like to hear his definition of a bargain. To my mind a bargain is a contract which imposes conditions on both parties: and I believe the Treaty does that. I am not now considering whether the Treaty is a good one, but I think it is evident that it is a bargain; and, moreover, if it were not a bargain, why did the Government have recourse to a treaty? I do not disapprove reciprocity or commercial treaties.

Mr. Bernal Osborne

I am anxious to obtain free intercourse between countries. It is better if those countries will give free intercourse spontaneously; but if it is not to be obtained in that shape, I have no objection to obtain it by a treaty; but a treaty well timed, well conducted, and carefully digested; and to which the full sanction of both parties is obtained. I was one of those who felt the greatest pleasure on hearing that a Commercial Treaty with France had been concluded. I hoped, in common with all, that such a measure would remove the asperity between the two nations, which unfortunately has been growing up for many months. I trusted it would tranquillize the restlessness of France, and appease the suspicions on the side of England. I looked at it with great hopes that it would have that effect; but to have that effect it must be, to use the eloquent expression of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, a treaty between two nations, not between two Governments; a treaty which inspires both nations with the feeling that it affords fair and mutual advantages, and is likewise one which, when freely discussed, can be altered without giving umbrage, or creating bad feelings. If it were otherwise, and we were to be precluded from canvassing its merits, or making any alterations, Her Majesty's Government ought never to have entered into the negotiation. I therefore heard with some alarm the statement of the hon. Member for Birmingham, that if the Treaty should be altered or refused, it would create an estrangement with France. I trust that in this House, at least, we are still to be allowed to have liberty of discussion. But the feeling of alarm has not been a little strengthened by the publication, in the English newspapers, of a letter from M. Chevalier, who must know that there is the same jealousy of foreign interference in England as in France, and therefore, I presume, will regret that his letter should have been published by injudicious friends. In this letter M. Chevalier proceeds to show that coal is not wanted at all in France; and all I shall say about coal is, that if it is not wanted in France, why was a clause in relation to coal introduced? And if it is wanted in France, why did not our Government ask for a clause preventing a prohibitive duty being placed by the French Government on the exportation of wheat, as is always done whenever there is a prospect of wheat being needed in England and in France? But then M. Chevalier goes on to say:—

“Thus the pretext invented by the English Protectionists is absurd; it is directly contradicted by the facts; they are, in reality, pursuing but one end—that of sowing distrust and irritation between two great nations. This course of the Tories is, in fact, provoking, on the part of England, an unfriendly act towards us. The rejection of the Article of the Treaty would be an unfriendly act, and it would be taken for such in France. The cry would be raised of ‘Perfidious Albion!’ Our great manufacturers would exclaim that they have been duped about the reduction in the export duties on English coal. The moral and political effect expected from the Treaty—the drawing closer together of two great nations, would not be attained. And this would be the case, even were the Article to be struck out from the Treaty, with the consent of the French Government.”

I regret that those sentiments should have been expressed. To my mind, it shows, unfortunately, an attempt to prevent free discussion. I need not remind the House that when, two years ago, interference on the part of France with our laws was suspected, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in eloquent terms, which conduced very much to the result of that debate, claimed the right to discuss English laws upon English grounds, and upon English considerations; and, surely, he would be the first to say he claimed the right to discuss Commercial Treaties upon English grounds, upon English considerations, and for English interests. We are bound, then, to consider what are the advantages of the Treaty to England. If it tends to bind stronger the ties of amity between this country and France, there is nothing I would more willingly support. If, in the first place, the French nation coincide, and, in the next place, the English nation are fairly treated by Her Majesty's Government, it deserves support. But I say that, to make a good treaty, the negotiations ought to be well-timed—that the two contracting parties ought to be able to carry the results into immediate effect. We are called upon, however, immediately to make changes. We find that the other party postpone changes for twelve or eighteen months. I submit, then, whether it would not have been better to wait until the negotiations in that respect could have been carried on upon perfectly fair terms. Again, I do not think that the correspondence is fully satisfactory, or that it shows completely that the interests of this country have been well guarded. We find no correspondence, no written line of instructions given to the negotiators until the 17th of January, and on the 23rd, six days afterwards, the Treaty is concluded. I must say that I should have supposed, in a treaty of commerce which regarded the interests of this great country, that the Board of Trade would be consulted; yet there are no documents to show that the opinion of the Board of Trade was asked, and the want of that consultation is rather obvious in the result of this Treaty. We find no provision that silks which pay a low duty of 15 per cent shall not be increased to 30 per cent, and we find likewise no notice of the question which excites great interest, the differential duties on shipping. I am told that it is a satisfactory answer that this is a treaty of peace and amity, and not of navigation. Why it is not a treaty of navigation? The Foreign Office could not ignore the question entirely, and the President of the Board of Trade must have been fully aware of the grievance of which the shipowners of this country complain. I cannot but think it ought to have been mentioned, if only in a whisper, if only as a suggestion which the negotiators might withdraw if necessary. But we do not know that it was ever put forward. The House will acquit me of any feelings save those of the greatest respect for Mr. Cobden, and admiration for his talents and consistency. I have admired his career, though politically opposed to him. But unless there is an identity of principles between the Government and their negotiator, and an impossibility of any difference of opinion between them, the negotiator ought to be bound by positive instructions. I ask the House to remember what is the principle of Mr. Cobden with regard to free trade with other countries. It is this—that it is to the advantage of England to abolish all indirect taxation. I do not know when it was that the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary said Mr. Cobden called upon him about this Treaty, but I remember that on the 1st of December there was a meeting of the Financial Reform Association at Liverpool, where the hon. Member for Birmingham proposed a budget of his own, to which Mr. Cobden was invited, but did not come. In the letter which he wrote on that occasion he uses these words:—

“There never was a moment when I felt greater interest than at present in the realization of your society's programme for the substitution of direct for indirect taxation.”

Did the noble Lord feel the same desire when he asked Mr. Cobden to undertake the duty of negotiating this Treaty, or did the Government at large feel that desire to substitute direct for indirect taxation? If they did, they ought to tell us so now in bringing in this Budget, which, I fear, will make us drift more and more towards direct taxation; if they did not, they ought to have told Mr. Cobden so. Do I blame Mr. Cobden? Not in the least. He was perfectly justified in carrying out his principles. His opinion is that the sooner he got rid of all indirect taxes the sooner should he achieve the salvation of his country, by bringing it to a system of direct taxation. But we have a right to know whether that is the opinion of the noble Lord and right hon. Gentleman opposite. Looking, then, at the mode in which it has been negotiated, this Treaty appears to me neither likely to insure feelings of amity between the two countries, nor was its negotiation well timed, nor is it drawn up in anything but a loose and careless manner. I am not going to follow the hon. Gentleman (Mr. B. Osborne) into a discussion of the benefits which are likely to be derived from the introduction of French wines. My own belief is that the result will be a much larger introduction of cheap Spanish and Portuguese wines; but still no one can tell the result of the Treaty until it has been tried. We are now in the clouds as to the future effect of it—engaged in a speculative debate on a speculative Budget; but if I might be allowed to hazard a prediction it would be this—when it is apparent that a new market has been opened for English goods we shall see, as we always do see when a new door is opened, that the exports will be greatly increased; the markets will be glutted, Englishmen will lose much, as they can lose much when they are seeking to establish a new trade; and the French manufacturers will be disgusted. We shall then return to what I will call the normal condition of a limited trade with France, for I do not believe, with the hon. Member for Birmingham, that the French nation have the same habits of expenditure as the Americans and our Colonists. They are a frugal people for the most part, living much on what they find around them—not spending their money in trade, like the Americans and our Colonists. Their wants are easily satisfied and readily supplied from their own neighbourhood. We shall have great exports at first, and a song of triumph at the results of the Treaty; but we must look what it settles down to. I should be quite willing and anxious to reduce these duties if I saw we could do it without danger. If we had wished to do a gracious thing, and if we had had the means, we might have said, "We do not want to negotiate a treaty with France; we will reduce the duties on her products, because we have the means, through a surplus in our Exchequer, to do it." But one of my reasons for thinking this an ill-timed negotiation is that we have not a surplus, and, even if we had, there would probably have been other claims for a reduction more urgent still. I looked through the budget of the hon. Member for Birmingham, and I certainly found in it a great many things taken off, all belonging to what he calls, in his usual forcible style, "the crushing system of taxation, which is all for the rich, and all against the poor"—"all on the comforts and necessities of the poor." "Give me," he said, "but 8s. in the £100 on property, and I will take off all your taxes." But he said not a word about wine; and yet he is quite enchanted with this Budget, which gives nothing that he promised! It does not even take off the war duties on tea and sugar; it does not diminish any of the taxes on the comforts and necessities of the poor man, who, the hon. Gentleman says, "with the sweat of his brow labours for the support of a pampered aristocracy." The hon. Gentleman may go down now to his friends and say, "I have not done what I said I would, but I have done a good deal that I did not say. 'Tis true tea and sugar are still taxed, but then you may drown all your cares in copious draughts of cheaper claret; and, if that is not enough, you may dress your wives and children in cheap French silks, and, more than all, there is not a labourer who may not guide the plough and till the soil in cheap foreign gloves." It reminds one of the old story of the monarch who, in answer to the complaint that his people were starving, said, "Why don't they eat piecrust then?" The Chancellor of the Exchequer indulged the other night in a gentle sneer at the friends of the poor. Well, that is a respected and a respectable title, and shared, I trust, alike by all parties. But the friends of the poor will suffer much in public estimation if they are led away by the exaggerated expectations held out by the hon. Member for Birmingham with respect to the results which are to flow from this Treaty of Commerce. I was certainly surprised the other night to hear the hon. Gentleman say that this Treaty realized his warmest hopes, and that it was now the object of his warmest attachment. A treaty with a 30 per cent protective duty the object of his warmest attachment! A few years ago he would have cried out, "30 per cent! why, it is prohibition." But this is only a fresh proof of the natural and amiable partiality of a parent for his own offspring, however deformed it may be. If he will look at some of the clauses of the Treaty he will see that there are reserved articles on which the duty is far higher. For example, one reserved article is railroad iron, and on that the duty is 50 per cent. These reserved articles, with the differential duties on shipping, and the wise policy of the Emperor of the French in admitting raw materials duty free, are the chief reasons why I think we are likely to have but a limited trade with France. I, for one, should have been in favour of reducing our duties on wine, if I had felt that we could do it with safety to our finances, and had had no more urgent claims upon us for relief. But the Chancellor of the Exchequer tells us that this is an epoch so marked in our financial history that the Government think it the duty of Parliament to take a step in advance in the career of commercial freedom, and he proposes to take the £2,000,000 terminable annuities for this purpose. But my answer to him is, that instead of being in position to "utilize" that amount, according to the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for Ireland (Mr. Cardwell), that money has been spent in anticipation, in obedience to the will of the people. You cannot have your money and spend it too, and that is spent long ago. If I were in expectation of having a large fortune left me in some future year, and on the strength of it were to promise relief to a certain number, and when the time came I found that I had been obliged to spend it, should I be justified in saying, "I promised you relief, but I have not got the money; so I will take it from your neighbours?" Yet that is just what the Chancellor of the Exchequer does, except that in this case the neighbours from whom he takes it—the people who pay the income tax—are just the persons to whom he promised relief. To those to whom he promised he gives nothing; and all he gives is to those to whom he made no promise. I am not inclined to reproach the Chancellor of the Exchequer with his failure to carry out the expectations he announced in 1853. But then, if the Chancellor of the Exchequer abandons the idea of doing what he has promised for the payers of income tax, ought he at the same time to state that he has money which he will devote to the relief of others, and speculate with; because, after all, it is a mere speculation whether an increase of revenue will be gained by a remission of taxation. There are one or two points on which, as I entertain opinions that I know to be unpopular, I feel it right to say a word. The first of these is as to the idea that you can dispense with indirect taxation. My belief is, though you may apply a moderate income tax towards your exigencies, that if you depend entirely on that tax you subject yourselves, you subject the Government, the credit, and the establishments of the country, to the change of disposition which may occur at any moment of national suffering or irritation. In my humble opinion, the wise course would have been to keep up a certain amount of direct, coupled with a fair proportion of indirect taxation. I believe that you will lose very much by bringing the indirect taxes to bear upon so few commodities; they will act in this way much more as direct than as indirect taxes—they will weigh on the necessaries and the comforts of life, while you have taken off the duties on a number of articles which did not create distress, did not press on any industry or any class of the community, but were removed merely because they produced such a trifling amount to the revenue. Why, every little they gave was so much gained, and it appears that what we have abandoned in this way amounts to millions. I do not say that we should have retained them all, but many of the smaller items which have been relinquished might have been advantageously applied to other and more important articles; and you have, to a great extent, sacrificed the stability of your Custom-house system. Such a measure as the present can be justified only by one of three reasons—that it will benefit the consumer, that it will facilitate trade, or that it will reduce the cost of collection. I believe it will be found that by many of these articles the consumer will not have benefited to any appreciable extent. Whatever may take place next year, there has been as yet no great reduction in the cost of collecting the revenue; and I am persuaded that as far as trade is concerned, the benefits accorded by the removal of the duties on these smaller articles will be more than purchased by the vexation attendant on the system of penny charges which the right hon. Gentleman proposes to introduce. I agree with the hon. Gentleman the Member for Leeds (Mr. Baines), and I even go further than he does, in thinking that the benefits which this country has enjoyed of late years have arisen from a variety of causes, and are not solely attributable to commercial reforms. Though it is a disputed question, I believe that the discovery and arrival of gold have stimulated production and increased consumption in great commercial countries like England and the United States. I think that emigration and other influences have tended to raise the wages of labourers, and I consider that a great invention which certainly does not owe its success to legislative enactment—I mean the railway system of the country—has tended as much as commercial reforms or any other cause to the increase of your internal and external prosperity, and has especially benefited your labourers, by allowing them to seek employment with increased facility, by cheapening every article of consumption, and bringing within the reach of persons comforts and almost necessities which before were unknown to them. I have seen a calculation which showed that by the introduction of railways the transport of heavy goods for 100 miles has been reduced in cost to less than one-fourth of the former amount, and that the time occupied is as 12 hours to 100. I quite admit that any extension of foreign trade must benefit this country; but it is an error to say we owe that benefit entirely to commercial freedom. It is to improvements such as I have pointed out that our prosperity is mainly due. You are wrong likewise in supposing that this constant reduction of duties will always replenish the Exchequer. You cannot have the virgin soil for ever; you must come on poor ground at last; and it is possible that your present changes may not turn out as well as the right hon. Gentleman expects. The right hon. Gentleman justifies them not only on the ground of cheapness for the poor man and the consumer, but because they will afford employment on more advantageous terms to the labourer. Does the right hon. Gentleman mean to say that there is not a positive injury to the employment of labour in a high income tax? Will he deny that it reduces the means of many a family—that it prevents a man from clothing or feeding his family as well as he otherwise might, and that it lessens his ability to do justice to them in the vital matter of education? Does he not believe that a tenpenny or shilling income tax will in many a house be the cause of absolute and necessary reduction? And does he not believe that such reductions tell, and cannot fail to do so, on the employment and on the comforts of the working classes? If he does, all the authorities are against him. Lord Brougham, at the time when Sir Robert Peel was proposing this tax, said, in the House of Lords, in March, 1842:—

[Third Night.

Mr. T. Baring

[Third Night.]

Mr. T. Baring

“A very great delusion prevailed in the country—at least, among that large class the labouring population—as to the operation of the income tax on them. It was a common thing for them and for those who instructed them, and who should know better, to say that the income tax could in no way affect them. There was no greater delusion than this. It required but little argument to show that the labourer was affected by the diminution of the fund out of which he was paid. When capital accumulated, the fund was increased out of which labour was paid; when it became diminished, the fund to pay the labourer decreased in the same proportion.” [3 Hansard, lxi., 730.]

The noble Lord went on to show that the income tax affected every class, and that annuitants had their means crippled by it, and were in their turn unable to give a similar amount of employment. You cannot tax the rich man without its reaching the poor, and I believe it is a doubtful question whether you are benefiting the labourer by these reductions, if, as a consequence, you must saddle the country with a tenpenny income tax. But more than this, the income tax is a dangerous weapon to rely on; it has been repudiated by every one as an unjust tax, and instances are not wanting where it has been questioned and rejected. I need only refer you to what happened in Lord Liverpool's time, when a strong Administration was, with one common accord, in a moment of irritation displaced, and the tax was swept completely from the register of taxation. It may be safe now, but if you keep on the tax permanently, it may not be always tolerated, and it will be continually subject to the attacks of “ignorant impatience.” My fear is, that at some future period you will find, not merely an ignorant impatience, but an impatient irritation, in the country which will force you either to remove your taxes or to reduce both the national income and expenditure below a rate which—whatever the hon. Member for Birmingham may think—may not be always safe, or else to tamper with the public credit, which, perhaps, would be a course fraught with still more fatal consequences. I contend that you place a most dangerous engine in the hands of a Ministry if you give them the power of taking off all duties, and of making up the deficiency by an increased income tax. I grant to the hon. Member for Birmingham that this is a popular Budget. When you take off taxes such as those now proposed for removal people know they cannot be reimposed, and the measure is popular. When you put on a penny income tax as a substitute for the duties thus relinquished, that also is a popular measure, because people know it is a tax which can be taken off, as, indeed, it was suggested that perhaps it would be. But the effect of such a proceeding is to create a tendency to agitation, and to put machinery in motion for compelling the Government to take off the tax; and that is just the prospect we have before us now. It is the danger of such an impost that it is apt to involve the necessity of pandering to popular demands, which may grow more and more extravagant as they are conceded. Then, I think that the fulfilment of the French Treaty even in its integrity did not necessitate the infliction of this pressure on the country. There is no reason at this juncture for the abolition of the paper duty. You were not called on to do so. The Resolution passed by this House declared that it ought not to be a permanent tax, but no pledge was given that it should be taken off at any particular time. There was no necessity for this supplementary tariff regulation, involving the loss of hundreds of thousands of pounds. All that was wanted was to keep the taxation on the same footing as before. I am not going to make a Budget, but I will offer a few remarks. I find that last year, with the tea and sugar duties at a war rate, and an income tax of 9*d.* in the pound, you had a revenue of £70,578,000. Your expenditure this year is £70,100,000. Therefore, with the same revenue as last year, you would have a surplus of £500,000, which, with £1,400,000 from the hop and malt credits, would enable you to carry out the Treaty with France, and, if necessary, to pay off the million of Exchequer bonds, besides leaving a surplus. Or it would have enabled you, if you chose—although I should have objected to such a course—to reduce the income tax to 8*d.* leaving the Exchequer bonds as they are. My idea, I must confess, is that we ought to pay off our debts as soon as we can, and especially before we reduce taxation. I believe the scheme of taxation for this year to be a very objectionable and dangerous one—improvident for the present, unsafe for the future. I think it unsafe even for a time of peace;—what would it be in a time of war? What resource will you have then? Will you double or treble your income tax? Will you put it at 20*d.* or 3*s.* or 4*s.*? You must do so because you have not only had recourse to high rates in time of peace to effect changes which were required, but persisted in those high rates after the changes were accomplished. The hon. Member for Birmingham reminded the Conservatives that they gave their votes for Sir Robert Peel's 7*d.* duty; but it is clearly a very different thing to support the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gladstone) in a 10*d.* duty. The call is not so urgent, the advantages are neither so obvious nor so important. You are now asked to perpetuate the income tax at a very high rate, and to adopt measures which will render it necessary for the future that that high rate should be continued. The Motion of the hon. Member for Essex has been charged with being a party movement—a mere attempt to turn out one Ministry in order to put in another. I hold that the great question whether we are to have resort merely to direct taxation as a means of revenue ought not to be degraded into a mere party contest. I do not regard the present debate as such; nor shall I look upon the division as any evidence of party spirit. For my own part I can honestly say I should have the greatest repugnance to join in a vote which should have the effect of displacing the Government. The noble Lord the Member for London once said with great truth, that the country could not bear a revolution once a year. I will add that we cannot bear a change of Ministry every year; and, in voting for the Motion, I shall do so not from any party motive against the Ministry. I intend, however, to vote against the Budget as it stands. The hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. B. Osborne) says, "Why do you vote against it now?—let us go into Committee, and then I may support you." But then the hon. Member adds that he is prepared to swallow the paper duties, and all the remissions in the Budget. I feel that those who, like myself, think that the result, if not the motive, of this Budget is gradually to lead the way to a substitution of direct for indirect taxation, must protest against that policy. I shall, therefore record my vote for the Resolution, simply to mark my sense of the danger which exists in relying upon the system which has now been adopted of abandoning revenue when there is a deficiency in the Exchequer, and trusting to direct taxation to replenish the treasury.

[Third Night.

MR. MILNER GIBSON: Sir, I heard with much regret an hon. Gentleman of such high authority in the commercial world as the hon. Member for Huntingdon entirely condemn the policy of the Budget, and invite the House to set aside the financial proposals of the Government. I recollect, however that the hon. Gentleman has been the uniform, persevering, and consistent opponent of all the commercial reforms that have taken place, and I should have preferred it myself, if he had taken his old ground for opposing the Budget, rather than he should have made it manifest that an insuperable objection to a penny more in the income tax induces him to invite the House to reject the whole scheme of the Government. The hon. Gentleman does not propose to get rid of the income tax altogether; and to revert to the figure of the hon. Member for Stamford (Sir S. Northcote), I must say we should purchase a reduction of a penny in the income-tax at a very dear rate if we paid for it by the sacrifice of the French Treaty and all the commercial remissions proposed by Her Majesty's Government. And I regret, also, to find the hon. Member for Essex is supported by the leader of the Opposition. I was in hopes that the Motion of the hon. Gentleman was placed on the paper in order to enable a certain section of the Conservative party to put on record their hostility to free-trade principles. The leader of the Opposition has stated that free-trade principles are good principles. Now I believe it can be shown that a vote in favour of this Resolution will be understood as announcing a belief that free-trade principles are bad principles. There are, however, some Conservatives, among whom I may instance the hon. Member for Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck), who on this point are directly in opposition to their leader the right hon. Member for Bucks.

Mr. T. Baring

I know that the hon. Member for Norfolk will say openly that free trade is a bad principle, and he is right in voting for the Amendment of the hon. Member for Essex. But I own I cannot understand those who admit free-trade principles to be good, yet take a step which at the present time is calculated to prevent those principles from being further carried out. We are invited to take a very strong course. We are invited to refuse to the Crown the means of carrying into effect the Treaty that has been concluded with France. Undoubtedly the House approaches the consideration of the question free and unfettered. We are at liberty to take that course if, from our sense of what is due to the public interest we feel it is advisable; but before this House deliberately refuses to give the legislative powers necessary to enable the Crown to carry the Treaty into effect it ought to be satisfied there is good and sufficient ground for taking so strong a course. What is the history of commercial treaties with France? I do not speak now of Mr. Pitt's Treaty of 1786; but is this present Treaty the first that has been attempted in modern times; have there not been repeated attempts, within a recent period, by Administrations of both parties, to conclude commercial treaties with France? In the years 1838, 1839, and 1840, a joint Commission of Representatives of England and France was engaged in drawing up a project for a commercial convention very similar in its principles to the Treaty lately concluded. But though the Commissioners had agreed on the project, yet from various causes the convention fell through. Soon after, another attempt was made to arrange a commercial treaty with France, I think by the Administration of Sir Robert Peel. I recollect distinctly that when Sir Robert Peel introduced his reform of the tariff in 1842 he said that one reason why he reserved the question of the wine duties was, because he hoped to be able to effect a commercial treaty with France. And I find it stated in the evidence given before a Committee of this House in 1853, on the local and differential Dues on Shipping, by the Registrar of the Board of Trade, that—

“ Under the Derby Administration in 1852 it was proposed again to attempt to obtain a commercial treaty with France. I think what then took place had more especial reference to a commercial treaty as distinguished from the navigation question. The proposal was for a commercial treaty, but France insisted on combining it with a navigation treaty.”

Thus the Government of the Earl of Derby was engaged in 1852 in negotiating a commercial treaty with France, leaving the differential dues on shipping untouched—a treaty very much resembling that now concluded. Again the Earl of Malmesbury occupied himself very earnestly in endeavouring to obtain an increased export of coal to France. Repeated complaints had been made by the coalowners that they were injured by the difficulties they experienced in getting an extension of the coal trade with France. The Earl of Malmesbury, very properly I think, did all he could to induce the French Government to remit the duty for the purpose of increasing the import of coal into France. The French Government asked what we would do in return; it asked if we would reduce the duty on French brandy. The Earl of Malmesbury replied he had no objection, but thought it would be too limited an operation. He would not agree to a limited commercial treaty that would only obtain a reduction of the duty on coal on the one side and that on French brandy on the other; but he was prepared to enter into a commercial treaty with a view to the revision of Customs' duties on both sides. How extraordinary, then, are the objections of the followers of the Earl of Derby and of the Earl of Malmesbury to a commercial treaty founded on the same principles. When the most enlightened statesmen, both Conservative and Liberal, have been trying for years to bring about what they all believed to be a most desirable result, something that would increase our commercial intercourse with France, are we, when such a treaty has been ratified, and the object is within our reach, to refuse the Crown those legislative powers required to enable the Crown to carry the Treaty into effect? That is the position in which we are placed. The hon. Member for Essex (Mr. Du Cane) fairly says he objects to the Treaty because he is a Protectionist; he objects to the remission of duties by this country; therefore he very consistently opposes the Treaty; but I cannot understand how the hon. Gentlemen I see opposite, who have adopted, and I believe sincerely adopted, the principles of free trade, can be acting on this occasion with the hon. Member for Essex. Before I go further I will allude to one or two representations that have been made, and that are rather calculated to mislead. The hon. Baronet the Member for Stamford (Sir S. Northcote) made a statement which, if it were accurate, would be a very serious objection to the Treaty—namely, that we have by the Treaty bound ourselves to France to establish a protective duty in favour of French and against Spanish and Portuguese wines. The hon. Baronet said we had, in fact, “reversed the Methuen Treaty.” I think he has fallen into an error herein. He imagines, because he sees a certain scale of duties depending upon the amount of proof spirit in these different kinds of wine, that we are bound by treaty to these particular amounts, and bound to give this supposed protection to French against Spanish and Portuguese wines. The effect of the Treaty will be nothing of the kind. The hon. Baronet will find that by the 6th Article all that Her Majesty engages herself to recommend her Parliament to do is to impose a duty upon wine containing a certain proportion of proof spirit not exceeding 1s. per gallon, and on wine containing 36 degrees of spirit a duty not exceeding 1s. 6d. per gallon. The duties specified are the maximum. If Parliament should please it may reduce these duties to as low an amount as it shall think fit. It may abolish them altogether, and Her Majesty is not bound by this Treaty to establish a differential duty in favour of the wines of France against those of Spain and Portugal. The arrangement is, in fact, merely made for your own domestic convenience. France would, no doubt, be glad to hear that the duty on wine was to be abolished altogether, and that French wine was to enter upon an equality in this respect with that of other countries. I therefore think that the hon. Baronet has fallen into an error when he says we have reversed the Methuen Treaty, and by treaty have given a protection to France against Spain and Portugal. The hon. Member who just sat down does not object to a commercial treaty with France, but he says he would rather not have entered upon one unless we had also concluded a commercial treaty with Spain and other countries. That reminds me of an old doctrine of the Protectionists of former days. They used to say you ought not to reduce duties upon the produce of another country until you got a reciprocity treaty with it, and obtain an equivalent reduction of duties on English productions in the other country. Now it is said it was better not to make a commercial treaty with one country until you could make them with all. We say, on the other hand, that this Commercial Treaty with France is to be taken on its own merits. We believe it will be attended by great and important political and commercial advantages to this country. Glad should I be to conclude a similar commercial treaty with any other country, but I will not be deterred from making such a treaty with France because I may not be able to conclude one with Spain, Portugal, and other countries. The hon. Baronet the Member for Portsmouth also stated that, with regard to the reduction of duties, the right articles had not been selected. He says that instead of selecting spirits and wine we should have taken tea and sugar, because experience has proved that by reducing those duties you may hope, by increased consumption, to recover your revenue. The hon. Baronet contends that you cannot hope for such a result in reducing the duties on spirits and wine. But is that so? When Sir Robert Peel reduced the duty on French brandy from 22s. to 15s., what was the consequence? Why there was an immediate increase of consumption of sixty per cent, and in the three following years the revenue completely recovered itself. The reason why the experiments of reducing the duty on wine have not been successful is, that you have not gone low enough—because you have never reduced it to that point when the reduction has been sufficient to introduce it into a new field of consumption. It has never gone beyond the wealthy classes, who were as ready to give one sum as another. But you will now find consumers of wine among those classes of the people who have not hitherto drunk wine. The hon. Member for North Essex as a Protectionist thought that beer, as a national beverage, ought to be protected as against wine. But when the plan of the Government is adopted, as I believe it will be, I say that beer will continue to have a very sufficient protection against wine. A gentleman of my acquaintance had a small transaction in the purchase of wine a little while ago. He bought a kind of wine which, it is said, will be brought to this country, will supersede the national beverage, and injure the British farmer. He bought a cask of wine in France containing forty gallons for sixty-four francs. The present duty on that wine is £11 11s., so that upon 53s. worth of wine he had to pay a duty of £11 11s. Under the new scheme if the duty of 1s. per gallon were in operation, the forty gallons, worth

[Third Night.

Mr. Milner Gibson

53s., would pay a duty of £2. Now, how much would he have to pay in malt-tax upon 53s. worth of beer? Why, the duty would not be more than 13s. I have calculated it exactly; so that 53s. worth of wine will pay a duty of £2, and 53s. worth of beer will only pay a duty of 13s. It is not so much even as that, but I wish to be on the safe side. The national beverage of the people is therefore amply protected. There is one point upon which I shall be glad to say a word or two, because very considerable misapprehension exists as to the 3rd Article of the French Treaty relative to the differential duties on French shipping. It is supposed by many that this Article has given some sanction or some fresh vitality to a system of restriction in France that is very injurious to British shipping. Now the 3rd Article merely relates to the two preceding Articles. It says:—

“It is understood that the rates of duty mentioned in the preceding Articles are independent of the differential duties in favour of French shipping, with which they shall not interfere.”

That means that these differential duties are not to be interfered with by the effect of the two preceding Articles, and the whole has merely relation to the trade that may grow up between England and France from the effect of these mutual reductions of duty. The 3rd Article only has reference to the direct trade between England and France. Now, there are no differential duties upon English shipping engaged in the trade between England and France. English ships that go to France from England, carrying British produce and manufactures, stand on precisely the same footing as French ships. But if a Dutch or American ship should go from England to France, the Dutch or American ship, carrying British produce and manufactures, would be subject to differential duties to which French and British ships are not liable. Hon. Members opposite ought to like these differential duties, for they are really a protection to British and French shipping in the trade between the two countries. I confess I do not like them, and I wish they were abolished. But the effect of this abolition, in regard to the direct trade of the two countries, would be that when British manufactures are sent to France they could be sent in Dutch and American ships and by the ships of all nations. I approve of such a principle, but I cannot understand the anxiety of hon. Gentlemen opposite for the removal of these differential duties so far as the trade of this country is concerned, for this Article has the effect of securing to British and French ships the carrying trade that arises under this Treaty between France and England. The two contracting parties do not wish that any misunderstanding should arise, and some question might have arisen but for this Article in case of American and Dutch ships carrying British produce to France. The Governments of France and England thought fit, as they did not intend to interfere with the existing navigation laws between the two countries, to insert this Article to prevent future misunderstanding. They have left the navigation laws open to be dealt with by future arrangement, and I hope the day will come when we shall see a liberal Navigation Treaty as well as a liberal Commercial Treaty. The hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Horsfall) is mistaken in supposing that the differential duties I have alluded to have a reference to anything but what I have stated. He will be gratified to hear, from an announcement in the Moniteur, that the differential duties paid by a British ship going from America to Havre with a cargo of cotton, though not abolished, are likely to be reduced. The announcement in the Moniteur forms no part of the Treaty, but, as I read it, the duty will in future be as follows:—Cotton imported from America to France in English ships will pay five francs per 100 kilogrammes, or about $\frac{1}{4}$ d. per pound—the present differential duty on British ships going from America to France being $1\frac{1}{2}$ d. per pound in excess of what is paid by American or French ships; so that the differential duty paid by English shipping as against American shipping will be reduced from $1\frac{1}{2}$ d. to $\frac{1}{4}$ d. I state this to show the hon. Member for Liverpool that the 3rd Article has no bearing whatever on the question of differential duties.

MR. HORSFALL: I gave no opinion as to the 3rd Article, I only said there existed considerable difference of opinion as to the interpretation of it.

MR. MILNER GIBSON: Well, at any rate, I believe the view I have expressed is the right one, that nothing in the Article can be construed to mean that the present differential duties affecting the indirect trade with France will be maintained. I must now make an appeal to those hon. Gentlemen who are connected with the agricultural interest. This Budget has been called a commercial Budget, a concession made to a section of the Liberal party, and in which the interests of those connected with land has been overlooked. On the contrary, I believe it to be an agricultural Budget. I know what the British farmers have often felt in reference to free trade. They have felt and said that if the other classes go to foreign countries for their food, the agricultural class should be allowed to buy their manufactures and the articles which they consume in the cheapest market also. It is, they say, a demand based upon obvious justice that if the British farmer is exposed to competition in the articles of corn and flour, he should be permitted also to go to the foreign market for the goods he consumes, and at any rate that he should not have the price of those articles raised upon him by the operation of protective duties. Now, I find that the British farmer has a very strong case in favour of this French Treaty. According to the returns of the imports of wheat into this country, it appears that in 1859 the value imported amounted to £8,713,532, and that 28 per cent of that, or £2,420,224, came from France. Of wheat flour imported the value was £2,392,295, of which 82 per cent, or £1,944,247 came from France; making a total of wheat and flour imported from France in 1859 of £4,374,471. Now, the British farmer may say with justice that if people are permitted to go to France for wheat and flour they should be permitted to go to France for their silk manufactures and their brandy; and I believe that if you were to call a meeting of the agricultural population in any county in England, and put the question to them, you would find them voting unanimously that, as we have got free trade in corn, we ought logically to carry out the principle and give free trade in everything else. I believe this argument to be a sound one; and that the agricultural classes will derive no inconsiderable advantage from this Treaty. There are a variety of articles which they are in the habit of consuming which they will now be able to import at a lower rate. There is a party in the county of Essex, which the hon. Mover of the Amendment represents, who are very much against this Treaty; but their opposition is based on a very small ground. There is a good deal of this sort of opposition, and I am sorry to find that the right hon. Baronet, the late First Lord of the Admiralty, because he dislikes a little portion of the scheme connected with hops, has condemned the whole of it. [Sir J. PAKINGTON: I dislike it all.] You dislike it all. Well, there is a small party who are much offended with the plan in Essex. I have been in correspondence with them, and I find their objection is to the permission to import carraway and coriander seeds. Specially alive to their own interests they would throw out the French Treaty and the reform of the tariff because carraway and coriander seeds, which are produced in Essex, are to be admitted. They attach more importance to that than to anything else, and therefore, on account of it, they disapprove the whole financial scheme of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. There is a great deal of this in the country. The whole scheme is condemned because objections are entertained to a portion of it. I have no doubt, though I do not know the fact, that the hon. Member for Essex (Mr. Du Cane) has been urged by the producers of carraway and coriander seeds to use his utmost energy to destroy the Budget. Now, in what are the agricultural interests more concerned than in the diminution of the poor-rates? It has often been said that Imperial taxation ought not to be taken as the measure of the real burdens which the possessors of real property bear, and I admit that people often overlook the fact that lands and houses are heavily taxed to pay the local rates and support the destitute poor. I believe nothing will more effectually lessen the poor-rates than an increase of the field of employment for the poorer classes; and what has been the effect in this respect of our commercial policy since 1842? I believe that had the poor-rates gone on increasing in proportion to your population from 1842 till the present moment they would have been upwards of £1,000,000 greater than they are now; so that, though you may object to the direct taxation of the income tax, you have saved a large amount of direct taxation by the diminution of the poor-rate, which has been the consequence of your commercial changes, and which will be the consequence of the scheme propounded by the Government. Take the case of the wine duties. Is there anything likely to give greater employment for labour, as the mere consequence of extended consumption, than the reduction of these duties? There was a witness before the Wine Duty Committee who gave this evidence:—

“There is no article of commerce the increase of which would give so much employment to labour

Mr. Milner Gibson

as the increased importation of wine. In the first place, it is a very bulky article, and, being brought in casks, would require a great number of ships to bring it to this country. When here it requires a great deal of labour to land it, to store it up on the quays for the purpose of gauging, to convey it afterwards to the cellars of the wine merchants, the fining and bottling it afterwards in those cellars, and when bottled the conveyance to the houses of the respective consumers. It would lead to a very large increase in the importation of corkwood, which would employ many ships; an immense increase in the manufacture and consumption of bottles, causing a most beneficial effect on the demand for labour.”

This is all true, and though it may appear trivial, I contend it is of the utmost importance to the agricultural interest. I live in a parish in which the resident population has not increased for a great number of years, notwithstanding, of course, that it ought to have done so from natural causes; and this circumstance I attribute to the fact that the inhabitants of the parish have found occupation elsewhere, for, otherwise, we should have an excess of labour in the particular locality to which I refer, and, no doubt, that excess of labour would have resulted in an increased poor-rate and increased destitution. I maintain, therefore, that no class in this country is so directly interested in everything that may lead to the extension of the field of employment as are the owners of land and houses, and I fairly believe the best policy which they can pursue is to encourage every measure of commercial freedom—every measure which tends to unloose the springs of industry, even though they should be actuated by no higher motive than their own pecuniary advantage. I shall now proceed to advert to the question of the income tax against which there is so strong a feeling. Hon. Members opposite define it as a war tax, and say it is a tax of which they wish in time of peace to get rid. But why, let me ask, is it called a war tax? Because it is a charge which is imposed on the country when a large expenditure for military and naval purposes is required. Well, you have at the present moment such an expenditure to meet, and it must be perfectly clear to you that it is not an actual state of war, but the necessity to keep up large warlike establishments that justifies the definition of the tax which you employ. When you are voting £30,000,000 for naval and military purposes, it is quite obvious that your policy involves the payment of a high rate of income tax. An income tax at the rate of 10*d.* in the pound is not, then, I maintain, at all out of proportion to your necessities for warlike expenditure at the present moment, especially when you consider that the total expenditure for which we have to make provision amounts to about £70,000,000. Hon. Gentlemen opposite, however, say that 10*d.* is too much. They are of opinion that the just proportion which the tax ought to bear to our requirements is the rate of 9*d.* in the pound. I hope you have too much confidence in the good sense of the people of England to suppose that they would advocate that reckless onslaught which the hon. Member for Stamford (Sir S. Northcote) seemed to think would some day be made on the establishments of the country merely because the income tax is rather too high. I do not believe in this doctrine of reckless onslaught myself. I have a firm confidence in the good sense of the great body of the people, and I am persuaded that they always bear what they think necessary to support the establishments of the country. The hon. Member, however, pointed out to us how we might do with a 7*d.* income tax; but upon looking at his figures, it appears to me that he is a great deal too sanguine in that respect. Be that, however, as it may, I, for one, would not accept his 7*d.* income tax at the cost of rejecting the Treaty with France. The income tax, you admit, is a tax connected with warlike expenditure. Well, the estimated expenditure for your army, navy, and ordnance—excluding the packet service—for the year 1860-61 is £29,200,000, and I find that an income tax at the rate of 10*d.* in the pound amounts but to 36 per cent on that expenditure, which was the exact percentage on expenditure for army, navy, and ordnance at which it stood when the tax was first imposed by Sir R. Peel in 1843. Yet, notwithstanding this fact, the great Conservative party, which is so anxious to support a war establishment, and to place on an efficient footing the defences of the country, object to the rate at which the tax is now proposed to be levied. But the hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. T. Baring) goes further, and draws a frightful picture of the consequences which must ensue if this dangerous Budget be adopted. He says we are going to get rid of all indirect taxation, and that our object is to pay all the expenditure of the country by means of the income tax. He drew, in fact, so gloomy a picture of the effects of our policy, and raised up such frightful spectres, that some hon. Members stood quite aghast.

He, moreover, addressed himself to a speech which was said to have been delivered at Liverpool, and argued with great effect against the scheme which was there proposed, when, in my opinion, his time would have been much better employed in pointing out the badness of the particular propositions which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has submitted to our consideration. But in what, let me ask, consists the disproportion between the proposed amount of the income tax and that of the indirect taxation of the country? Including under the head of direct taxation the succession duty and the income tax, and everything that can be designated as a direct tax, I find that for the year 1860-61, out of every £100, £78 will be paid by means of indirect, and £22 only by means of direct taxation. Now what, let me ask, is alarming in that proportion? What is there in it to frighten the most ardent admirer of indirect taxation? I am, of course, prepared to admit that of late years the proportion of direct to indirect taxation has been on the increase; but I am also aware that great benefit has been the result of the change of policy so far as it has proceeded. There is, however, now before the House no question of converting all your direct into indirect taxation. The plain and definite proposition which we make to you is that you should provide for the expenditure of the coming year in the mode suggested by Her Majesty's Government, and also that you should assent to the Commercial Treaty with France. I should regard it as a most unfortunate circumstance if the House were to reject that Treaty, and to put its veto upon the remission of duties which we ask you to make, because you happened to think that the income tax was fixed at a rate a little too high. I do trust that hon. Members will bear in mind that we have under our consideration, not the mere question of adding an additional penny to a particular impost, but a question of the adoption of a broad and enlightened policy. It has been frequently argued in this House that in providing for the expenditure of the year no considerations are to actuate a Government but the simple one, of merely getting a particular amount of money? But I hold that there is something more than this to be considered—there is the broader question of a fiscal policy, which, with a country like England, and taking into account the growing population, the Chancellor is bound to have in view, he must consider what is the least injurious mode of raising the money which the maintenance of the establishments of the country may require. I shall not say more than a word or two with respect to the remission of the paper duty, because hon. Members already know the opinions which I entertain on the subject. You may give your assent to the Resolution of the hon. Member for Essex, which says that you ought not to diminish the ordinary sources of revenue, and yet support this particular remission, inasmuch as the House of Commons has solemnly declared it to be its opinion that the paper duty ought no longer to be regarded as a permanent source of your ordinary revenue. Hon. Members might talk of that Resolution as something shadowy and indefinite, but if they meant nothing when they voted for it I meant something when I drew it, and feel assured the great body of hon. Members will never assent to the doctrine that such a Resolution ought to be treated as so much waste paper, and never be acted upon by the Executive. And had this opportunity for acting upon it been passed over, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bucks, who formerly voted with me for the repeal of the tax, might have fairly complained that the Government had neglected to proceed upon that which this House had declared to be its deliberate opinion. I thank the House for having listened to me with so much patience under circumstances that perhaps made my utterance somewhat unintelligible. I have endeavoured to explain the views I entertain; occupying the position I do, and feeling the deep respect and gratitude I owe to Mr. Cobden for his successful exertions in the cause of commercial freedom between this country and France, I felt I was bound to state my opinions on this subject, and I again thank the House for the indulgence they have extended to me.

MR. WALPOLE: Sir, I assure the House that I will not trespass long on their attention, but the magnitude, variety, and importance of the subjects brought before us, unless, as I think it may be, the question could be now reduced to a narrow issue, might and would justify more lengthened observations than I shall address to the House this evening. At the same time, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer will pardon me for saying that, in my opinion, he has placed us in a position of considerable embarrassment by bringing before us at one time, and in one

Mr. Milner Gibson

debate, on a financial statement, so many questions that it is hardly possible to arrive at a distinct and definite issue upon any one of them; and I think it would be much preferable to follow the old and salutary custom of confining the financial statement to the year for which it is intended, without mixing up with it other questions of high State policy, rather than that which my right hon. Friend has followed, and which it seems, unless it is checked, we shall be likely to pursue in future. The Chancellor of the Exchequer will now see that he has, in fact, broken through this old custom twice—once in 1853, and again in 1860. In 1853 he brought upon us, partly at least, the emergency in which we are now placed, because in 1853, instead of simply meeting the obligations which he had to provide for in the year, he based his arrangements on future hopes and on expectations which no human foresight could fully anticipate and which no human wisdom could adequately provide for. In 1860 a similar course has been pursued by my right hon. Friend, because he has mixed up a question of great State policy—namely, a treaty with France—with the financial statement of the year, instead of taking these two questions at distinct times, by distinct Motions, and on distinct principles. Well, now, I think my hon. Friend the Member for Essex deserves the thanks of the House for bringing this matter to a definite issue, and moreover to one issue only, as I think I can show. That does not appear to be the opinion of many gentlemen who have spoken in this debate. The hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) says this Motion means increased expenditure. If he had looked at the Motion more attentively, he might have seen that there is no more of increased expenditure in the proposition of the hon. Member for Essex than in the mind of the hon. Member for Birmingham himself. The proposition of the hon. Member for Essex simply recognizes the increased expenditure, the high expenditure of the present year, and the hon. Member for Birmingham, with all his desire to reduce that high expenditure, has not ventured to say you can reduce it below the point which the Government have fixed. My right hon. Friend the Secretary for Ireland treats this Motion as if it were one for what he calls a stationary policy in finance. But it does not mean a stationary policy in finance, except in this point of view—that when you have a great deficit before you it is better to remain stationary and where you are than to sink down an inclined plane into a greater deficit hereafter. My hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool (Mr. Horsfall) said that if this Motion were simply confined to the re-imposition of the income tax at the high rate at which it is proposed, he would have voted for it, but he takes exception to the Motion upon the ground that it is intended to defeat the Budget. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: Hear, hear!] My right hon. Friend cheers that, recognizing thereby the statement I have made as a correct description of what my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool intended. Then let me at once repeat to my right hon. Friend what I said the very day after I heard, in common with all the House, that splendid speech of his. I was asked the question, "What do you think of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's financial statement?" My answer was that its main provisions I believed to be right, but in point of time exception may be taken to it, and also to the mode in which the thing is to be done. I have listened to this debate from the beginning to the end, and the impression on my mind is just what it then was—namely, that I believe the main provisions of the Budget are right, and I should be sorry to see them defeated. But I do say that exception may be taken, both as to the time and, in some respects, as to the mode in which the provisions of it are intended to be carried out. The right hon. the President of the Board of Trade treats the Motion as being mainly an attack on the French Treaty. Well, then, again I must make a confession, contrary, I fear, to the opinion of many of those who now sit about me—that if I thought this Motion would defeat the French Treaty, I would not vote for it. Then it may be asked, why are you going to support this Motion? Now, I ask you to follow me for a few moments, and, if you will only treat me as candidly as I am treating you, I will venture to say that you cannot, either on sound reason or in point of principle, resist this Motion, at least in your hearts, whatever you may do by your votes. What does the Motion pledge you to? It recognizes, as do the hon. Member for Birmingham and, indeed, every other Gentleman who has spoken, that the expenditure of the year must unfortunately be taken at the enormous figure of £70,000,000; but it goes on to ask whether, with a deficiency staring you in the face, you are to increase that deficiency by trenching on the ordinary revenue of the country, particularly at a time when that process will lead to this result, that you must reimpose an income tax, in the very year you intended to take it off, at a higher rate than it was ever imposed during a time of peace. I take this Motion, according to the words in which it is proposed, to be this—Will you diminish the ordinary revenue with this deficit before you? What is the ordinary revenue you are about to diminish? Part of it comes from a remission of Customs' duties in pursuance of the Treaty, part from remission of Customs' duties independent of the Treaty, and part of it comes from the remission of the Excise on paper. These are the three sources of ordinary revenue which the arrangements proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer would trench upon. Now, with regard to the first of these, I am free to admit that, in point of fact, the duties which you are about to remit in pursuance or in consequence of this Treaty must be remitted, if you are to adopt the Treaty; and I, for one, am in favour of its adoption. With regard to the £1,100,000 you propose to remit on this account, I do not think after all that has happened, that you can deal with it in the way this Motion would imply—namely, by retaining it so as to prevent the imposition of the income tax at its proposed high rate. If the Treaty is to be maintained, that revenue must go, and therefore perhaps I may be allowed in a very few words to state my reasons for giving it my support. Possibly in point of time exception might be taken to it, because, in point of fact, the more deliberate negotiation of parts of that Treaty might probably have led to better provisions in some of its Articles; and I also believe that it would have done no harm to the Government or to the country if, upon deliberation, you could have made the Treaty more concurrent as regards time, and more reciprocal as regards its operation, so that the remission of duties on the part of England might be made more to tally with the remission of duties on the part of France. But the main reason why I am in favour of the Treaty is this—I cannot understand the jealous policy of two great kingdoms like France and England keeping themselves, as it were, at arms' length, when they can interchange their products with each other, one of them having a great superiority in soil and climate, the other having what I believe to be an equally great superiority in some of its natural productions, in its mechanical skill, in its immense capital, and its manufacturing energy. Believing that, I cannot conceive how any jealousy on the part of England should induce statesmen on either side of the House to refrain from lending a helping hand to break down those barriers which subsist between the two countries. Nay, more; when you are acting on the principle of commercial freedom, I cannot conceive anything more unwise than that you should not endeavour to obtain as much as you can from others, merely because you cannot acquire exactly as much as you wish to have. But as I am now on that part of the subject, perhaps the Government will permit me to say that the two Articles—3 and 11—which have been so much objected to, are not Articles which I can approve of, and they will, in my opinion, require reconsideration. And why? Because, in one word, it is most impolitic to tie up the Crown, acting under the responsible advice of the Government, from exercising a most important power which Parliament has intrusted to it. Parliament has intrusted to the Crown the power of prohibiting the export of coal when it may come under the category of munitions of war, and it has also reserved the power to the Crown of imposing restrictions upon other countries when those countries do not reciprocate with you in the freedom of navigation which you grant to them. If you give up that power—if you give up the means of inducing other countries to enter into a free navigation with yourselves, the observations which the noble Lord the Member for London (Lord John Russell) made the other night, convinced me at once how dangerous it would be to adopt such a course. I remember when the navigation laws were discussed, I said we were acting on a principle the reverse of that on which we ought to act—that, instead of repealing our navigation laws, without reciprocity on the part of others, we ought to have repealed them when that reciprocity was offered to us. The noble Lord the other night said, in reply to a Question—

[Third Night.]

“The hon. Gentleman would recollect the professions of the American Minister in 1849, when we proposed to repeal the navigation laws. Mr. Bancroft, who was then the American Minister in this country, stated to Mr. Labouchere, the President of the Board of Trade, ‘If you are liberal, we shall be liberal; if you give much, we shall give much; if you give all, we shall give all.’ It was only just to say that the American Government did give equivalent advantages on passing the Navigation Act; but, although in 1854 we threw open the coasting trade, what had been done by them in that respect was still very unsatisfactory.”

Mr. Walpole

Now this convinces me that the power of imposing restrictions on others when they will not give up their restrictions upon us, is not a power which we ought to abandon. So much for the first source of ordinary revenue you propose to relinquish. I admit that you cannot make use of that for the purpose of preventing the high rate of the income tax, because I think you must remit those duties if you do not intend to abandon the Treaty. I come now to the second source of revenue which you are about to diminish. What is that? It is about £1,000,000 of Customs’ duties. The House was not so full as it is now when my hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon (Mr. T. Baring) addressed it. With his observations on that part of the subject I entirely concurred. When I think of the little obstruction offered to trade by the restriction of these duties, when I think of the great loss which has resulted to the revenue, not from the reduction but from the abolition of Customs’ dues, I must hold that when you have a deficiency, however advantageous free trade may be, one of the last things you ought to do is to aggravate that deficiency by giving up duties which do not materially obstruct trade, which do not obstruct it nearly so much as the equivalent taxation you are going to impose, as was so well exposed the other night by my hon. Friend, the Member for Buckingham (Mr. Hubbard). If I am right in this, I at once get rid of the extra 1*d.* on the income tax. Retain these Customs’ duties for a short time longer, and that 1*d.* of the income tax may at once be get rid of. But now I come to that which I conceive to be an unanswerable part of the subject. Upon what principle can you relinquish £1,000,000 of paper duty, when you know that the effect of that remission is the imposition of an extra 1*d.* in the pound of the property and income tax? My right hon. Friend, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, really made me smile when he came to that part of his speech in which he recommended the remission of the Excise duty on paper. My right hon. Friend, forgetting all that he told us in 1858, said, "We have £2,000,000 of long annuities falling in. We have made use of £1,000,000 of those annuities to effect a great Commercial Treaty with France, and the Government consider that they have now another £1,000,000 which they may apply for the benefit of trade and industry." Why that was a portion of the fund on which my right hon. Friend relied for getting rid of the income tax. Then what are the reasons why you now give up for one purpose that which you had intended to appropriate to a totally different purpose, contrary to the expectations of the country, and greatly to the aggravations of the burdens of the people? My right hon. Friend gave four reasons for the remission of the paper duty, and to them I beg the attention of the House. He alluded first to a pledge, embodied in a Resolution of this House, that the paper duty was not to be a permanent source of revenue; secondly, to the obstructions it placed in the way of skill and enterprise; thirdly, to the untenable character of the tax; and, lastly, to its greater pressure on the poor, as compared with the rich, especially in the matter of cheap literature. I will venture to say that every one of those reasons, urged as arguments against the continuance of the excise on paper, may be urged with tenfold force against the continuance of any unnecessary part of the enormous burden which the income tax imposes. As to the pledge, it is said by the President of the Board of Trade, that my right hon. Friend the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli), supported the Resolution in which it was embodied. But what was the nature of that pledge? Why, it was general; whereas the pledge given with reference to the income tax was not general, but specific; and the specific pledge was that, at a given time, if you had the means by which you could reduce that tax, or get rid of it, you would then avail yourselves of those means. But that is not all. The pledge with reference to the excise on paper, was contained in a Resolution of this House only. The pledge with regard to the income tax was embodied in an Act of Parliament; and in proposing that Act my right hon. Friend said he put this mark upon the tax that it was a temporary tax, namely, that it should cease at a stated period. The House of Commons, the House of Lords, and the Queen, by the Royal Assent, were equally pledged, therefore, to get rid of the tax; for it was stated in the Act of Parliament that it should continue until 1860, and no longer. But this is not all; the pledge with respect to the excise upon paper, was a pledge accompanied by no other obligation of any sort or kind; but the pledge, with respect to the reduction or remission of the income tax, was accompanied by the imposition of other taxes, which would not have been imposed except on the condition that the income tax should come off. I say then, after such a pledge, you are not for a single moment justified in laying on a penny more of income tax than you need impose in 1860, or in any subsequent year, if you do that merely to get rid of a part of the ordinary revenue. So much for the pledge; and now for the obstructions which the collection of the revenue is said to place in the way of the trade in paper. My hon. Friend the Member for Leeds (Mr. Baines) has spoken of the obstructions which the paper duty, like any other excise, presented to the exercise of skill and industry. I hold in my hand extracts from two Reports from the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, which are worthy the attention of the House. Do they say that any obstruction to trade is now referable to the collection of the paper duty? Quite the reverse. They say:—

"So far, indeed, have our regulations been modified to meet the wishes of the papermakers, that we are able to state that the duty is now charged and collected without any appreciable restriction on their trade, and that their complaints, at one time frequent, have entirely ceased."

Mr. Phillips, of the Laboratory Department, confirms this in stronger language.

"It may be observed that the regulations under which the Excise duty is charged upon paper, do not offer the slightest impediment to the manufacturer in the introduction of new materials, or in the alteration or improvement of his processes, as paper, unlike all other exciseable articles, is perfectly free from fiscal interference during its manufacture, and it is only when the article is finished and ready for the market, that an account is taken of it, and the duty charged."

The Commissioners say, in another Report:—

"If the objections so constantly urged against the paper duty were such as we are accustomed to hear most insisted on in the case of Excise duties generally—namely, their restrictive and oppressive incidence on the manufacturer—the advocates for the abolition of the tax would find it difficult to make out their case. There is scarcely any duty in the collection of which our interference is so little felt, and in which we are so continually adapting our regulations to the wants and wishes of the trade."

[Third Night.

Has the House read the remarkable report of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue with reference to the income tax? Are they aware of what these Commissioners said of the tax as recently as the year 1858? I own I was more startled by it than by anything that has lately come before my eyes. The passage to which I more particularly allude, is to the effect, that "it would be almost impossible to give any person, unacquainted with the practical working of the income tax, a notion of the labour it entails on this office, of the great variety and complexity of the questions daily brought before us, or of the powerful appeals which are made to our compassion or forbearance."

"To those who are aware of the numerous and troublesome inquiries necessary in the case of each application for exemption or repayment, the fact that upwards of 250,000 such claims are annually disposed of, will convey some impression of the difficulties that have to be encountered."

Talk of oppressive taxation, talk of interfering with skill, enterprise, and the hard industry of the people! I declare to you that I never read anything so alarming as that paragraph, if we are indeed to continue an impost attended with such a fearful concomitant. But is this all? I am sorry the hon. Member for Birmingham is not in his place. Where is the pressure greatest? It is not upon the rich. If any one will look at the returns he will find specified the number of persons in different classes who contribute to the income tax. Take Schedule D, and then see how you are interfering with trade. In Schedule D, according to the last return, there were 258,000 persons who contributed to this tax. How many of these persons, think you, are assessed under £300 a year? More than 200,000 out of the whole 258,000! These are the persons on whom this tax is weighing so heavily. It is not your landed proprietor—it is not your rich manufacturer—it is not your opulent and powerful merchant. No; it is your hard-worn tradesman, the poorer shop-keeper, the struggling clerk. And yet you tell me that, as compared with the paper duty, this is a tax which ought to be retained! [Cheers, followed by some laughter on the Ministerial side.] I hope hon. Gentlemen opposite who are smiling at the cheer which has accompanied that statement will allow that it is one deserving their attention. I am dealing with the question fairly. I have taken every objection that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has urged so powerfully in respect to the paper duty, and I am contrasting those objections, and showing that there is a weight of disadvantage operating quite as strongly against the income tax as can be found against the paper duty. Remember, that is the argument. What was the third point on which the right hon. Gentleman relied? He said, the paper duty is daily becoming more untenable. What is the criterion of the untenableness of a tax? That it is falling off. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER dissented.] My right hon. Friend shakes his head; but, if that is not the only test, it is surely one test. I will make another comparison, which I think will startle you quite as much as the statement I have already adduced. Since the year 1842 the quantity of paper manufactured, notwithstanding the duty upon it, has increased from 96,000,000 lbs. to 187,000,000 lbs. in the year 1858; and within the same period the duty has increased from £634,000 to £1,281,000. This shows how the manufacture of paper has flourished in spite of every hindrance. Now for your income tax. I hold in my hand the Returns of the income tax from the year 1843 to 1853. I take those years for my comparison because the tax then remained at 7d. in the pound continuously, and we have not the same facilities for comparison afterwards. Was there an equal increase of revenue from the income tax? There ought to have been, if the prosperity of the country was as great as you say it was, and as I believe it to have been. The whole amount of the income tax levied in 1843 was £5,336,000. In 1853 it was £5,598,000; so that ten years of prosperity only produced you between £200,000 and £300,000 increase in this impost. My right hon. Friend paraded the figures before us to show the immense amount of income tax derived under Schedules A and D. Now, it is true that the gross amount of the incomes assessed under Schedule D was in England in the year 1857, £69,110,922, and in 1858 the amount rose to £73,106,000. But in those years incomes between £100 and £150 a year were brought under charge. The gross amount of the incomes assessed between £100 and £150 in 1857 was £11,880,000, and in 1858 £12,843,000. If, therefore, you deduct the £11,880,000 assessed on the lower class of incomes under Schedule D in 1857, you will find the total amount of income subjected to charge under that schedule was about £57,230,000. But the income charged under Schedule D in 1843 was £63,000,000, showing that there was less income under charge in 1857 as compared with 1843. In 1858, again, the incomes charged under Schedule D amounted only to £33,106,832, as against £63,000,000 in 1843. But you must deduct from this sum the incomes charged upon £100 and £152 a year, i.e. £12,843,000. Thus, while your exports have increased threefold and your manufactures have been prospering, your incomes assessed under Schedule D, being incomes derived from trades and professions, were less in 1857 and 1858 than in 1843. Do I say that you have not had, in reality, any increase in those incomes? Far from it. I only give these statistics to show the enormous frauds that are being practised on the revenue; and, that being so, I say it well becomes the Chancellor of the Exchequer to see whether a tax leading to such results had not much better be taken off. But then my right hon. Friend refers to the inequality and the pressure of the paper duty, as between the rich and poor. I think I have shown you by the enormous number of claims for exemption under the income tax, that there are ten—aye, twenty times more inequality in the pressure of that tax. These are reasons which strongly induce me to vote for the Motion of the hon. Member (Mr. Du Cane). If, however, I wanted another reason, it would be that urged by my hon. Friend the Member for Stamford (Sir Stafford Northcote), in a speech which proves that he is likely to aid us with his financial ability and knowledge as much, perhaps, as any man in this House. He showed you that, while you are taking off the paper duty and at the same time raising the income tax, you will in another year, having forfeited that ordinary revenue, be in a deficiency at least as great, if not greater, than now. My right hon. Friend is only postponing, he is not satisfying his obligations. But I ask the House whether it is wise to postpone your obligations for another twelve months, and to throw either upon yourselves or your successors the difficulty of determining that which ought to be determined now—namely, whether any and how much of the income and property tax shall continue as a permanent part of your fiscal system? I for one am opposed to this. If you want to deal with the deficiency which yawns before you, you can only do so by reducing expenditure, by loans, or by a reimposition of the income tax at a still higher rate. A reduction of expenditure it would be difficult to accomplish, though I think much may be done in that direction, not that I wish our armaments to be made inefficient, but because I believe you do not get money's worth for money spent. You cannot have recourse to loans. That is only the improvident scheme which a gambler would have recourse to; it is discounting the future at a price which, in the end, will only increase your embarrassments. Then, if a loan is not to be thought of, and if any considerable reduction of expenditure is impracticable, Parliament will next year see the same question before it awaiting discussion and unsettled. You will have the hon. Member (Mr. Bright) coming down to the House, and saying you ought to increase rather than diminish direct taxation, at the same time altering the mode in which it is levied. You will have, too, the Chancellor of the Exchequer telling you that this is a powerful weapon, which you must keep ready for great emergencies, but that the mode of levying it ought not to be altered; and you will find the utter impossibility of settling that question a bit more effectually than now. These, Sir, are the reasons which induce me to vote for the Resolution. I will only add another word, though I hardly need do so after the speech of the hon. Baronet (Sir F. Baring). He told you, and truly, that a question of imports and exports was not a party question. I can assure the Government that they are entirely mistaken if they suppose that the vote I am going to give is meant to disturb or to displace them in their seat. No, Sir, I think the circumstances of the time are far too important, far too grave, to justify endeavours, year after year, made with a view of disturbing the Administration. If in their conduct the Government are moderate, as I trust they will be; if they consider reasonable objections which are urged against parts of their measure without any intention of breaking that measure down; if they will meet the objections of those who criticise fairly without condemning unjustly; if they will not stop their ears when Motions are made from this side of the House, their financial arrangements will then be in a much better

Mr. Walpole

[Third Night.

when I opened the newspapers next morning, for I found there that a right hon. Gentleman had committed himself in the manner I am now going to describe. That right hon. Gentleman attended a meeting of an alarmed and timorous interest, which, fearful of the withdrawal of the protection they enjoyed, might be acted upon, it was hoped, to oppose a great national measure on account of their own narrow interests. There is one valuable principle of free trade which appears to be well understood by the hon. Gentlemen opposite, and that is the division of labour. While the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire was announcing in sounding periods the high ground on which he took his stand, another right hon. Gentleman was holding different language in a different place—I mean the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich (Sir J. Pakington). The right hon. Baronet attended a meeting of a set of gentlemen who are well known, almost every man of them, to every successive Chancellor of the Exchequer—namely, those who are called the growers of hops. The county to which the right hon. Baronet is an ornament is not a great hop-growing county; it produces $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent of the total consumption, and consequently—I believe I am correct in the statement—until the eventful week in which we now are the right hon. Baronet had never thought it worth his while to attend a meeting of hop-growers. But on this particular occasion, when the financial scheme and a chance of intercepting the Treaty with France were in question, my right hon. Friend the Member for Droitwich, his bowels with mercy and sympathy moved towards the hop-growers, appeared for the first time at a meeting among the champions of that suffering interest. And what was the advice given by my right hon. Friend within twenty-four hours of the time when the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire had—if I may thus express myself—so surreptitiously excited our admiration and almost enthusiasm by the enunciation of lofty principles. I have made inquiry about the accuracy of the report, and therefore I have less hesitation in quoting a few words from it. My right hon. Friend spoke among hop-growers, and said that he was not connected with a great hop-growing county. I suppose his audience knew that as well as he; but he went on to observe that his county had a good deal of land planted with hops, and he thought it right to attend the meeting. My right hon. Friend then entered on hops, but very slightly, and did not show that acquaintance with the manipulation of details which no one knew better how to employ when a master of details; but it was a resistless impulse which brought him among those unfortunate people in order to point out the way of salvation to them, and he said, “I would suggest as a matter of business”—the House will see that, unlike the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire, who spoke in a tone of high feeling and romance, the right hon. Baronet, observing the division of labour agreed on, applied himself rigidly and without any chivalrous feeling to the part allotted to him. He said, “I would suggest, as a matter of business, that instead of their going to the Chancellor of the Exchequer they should instruct their Members to go at once to the House of Commons, and say, ‘This Budget does not suit us, and we will oppose it.’” As for the Budget itself, the right hon. Baronet said he looked on it as “a rash, meddling, and unsatisfactory scheme.” That is all very well. Regarding the Budget in that light, it is doubtless the right hon. Baronet’s duty to oppose it, but he never thought it at all necessary to understand whether the hop-growers he was addressing partook of his opinion. He did not go to them and ask, “Do you think the Budget bad?” but he said “Your particular interests are attacked, and therefore turn against the whole Budget.” The right hon. Gentleman went on:—

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

“And if all the interests injuriously affected by it could combine together, giving up their immediate views with regard to their own individual interests, the result would very soon be to get rid of it altogether. He therefore counselled them to unite with other interests and bring such a pressure to bear upon Parliament as would put an end to the Budget at a blow.”

That is the disappointment which I for one have undergone in comparing a declaration in full of the highest mediæval spirit made by the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire with the more practical proceedings of the right hon. Member for Droitwich as a matter of business. But, however that may be, and whatever may be the proceedings that may be taken by those who sit on the same bench with the right hon. Baronet at the meeting of hop-growers or others, whether reported or not reported, having availed myself of the little light that was thrown on them through the medium of the daily journals, let me

tax that we shall have to discuss. It is at the outside only a question between the paper duty and one-tenth portion of the income tax. But I pass on from that subject, because I think we have an issue before us in a far broader form, and I shall endeavour to come as soon as I can to that issue. I will not, therefore, follow the right hon. and learned Gentleman who spoke on a former night (Mr. White-side) into the discussion on the alcoholic test on wines, or the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Hubbard) into the question of contract notes and dock warrants. The contract note stamp is 1*d.*, and that moves his indignation, because it is so small, and he says, "Will you obstruct trade by this paltry tax?" But the dock warrant is 3*d.*, and that moves his indignation because it is so great, and he says, "Will you overwhelm trade by this great duty?" The hon. Member has the direst views for the future in consequence of these painful measures, but we shall have ample opportunities of discussing them also. When, however, I see men of the ability, position, and character of my hon. Friend (Mr. Hubbard) and of my hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon (Mr. T. Baring) in a state of feverish apprehension and foretelling the direst results from the measures proposed, I naturally seek for consolation under circumstances so discouraging, and if I find that those hon. Gentlemen viewed on former occasions with the same and even more painful anxiety public measures which afterwards were adopted, approved, and vindicated to the satisfaction of the whole country, then I confess that I live in hopes that that which has happened before may happen again, and that, their gloomy views of the future turning out incorrect, I may count on their admitting hereafter, and at no distant period, the merits of the measures they now denounce. The hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Hubbard) has certainly not had the same opportunities as the hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. T. Baring) has had, but on great occasions we have found the hon. Member for Huntingdon among the most resolute and distinguished opponents of those great measures which have fundamentally reformed your commercial system. Nevertheless, while I listened to the vaticinations of the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Hubbard) my memory ran back to the time where I heard him—not in this House, for we then had not the pleasure of enjoying his company here—uttering the same dismal prophecies on an occasion when it was proposed to do justice to British trade as compared with foreign trade by imposing a stamp on foreign bills of exchange. Upon that occasion the hon. Gentleman was a distinguished member of a deputation from the port of London, and he assured me that if we ventured to impose a stamp duty on foreign bills we should drive the trade from the market of London, and London would no longer be the centre of money operations. That gave me uncomfortable sensations at the time, I must confess; but we persevered with the plan, the House adopted it, the stamp was imposed, it has contributed for six years to the revenue of the country, and London is still the centre of the money operations of the world. But I have now done, as I promised, with questions of this kind, which, however important, will be more conveniently discussed on another opportunity, and I come to the general issue before us. On Monday night I heard the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) explain to the House the dignified course which his party had adopted. The right hon. Gentleman said—and I, for one, and I believe the generality of the House, went along with him in what he said—"We have scorned to raise a partial issue; we have rejected the hands that might be held out to us from this and that alarmed and timorous interest; we have rested our cause on the broad ground of general merits, and on that ground alone we seek to take issue." Upon that declaration of the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire, I bethought me of the language of Burke, who lamented that the age of chivalry had gone; and for a moment—aye, for a whole evening—I was in hopes that the age of chivalry had come back again; for I heard it declared that it was intolerable to meet a great measure of this kind—a national and international measure—by petty and paltry combinations of A and B and C, who object to this and to that, and by putting together their separate units endeavour to obtain a mass of force sufficient to overturn the whole scheme. Those were the sentiments expressed on Monday night; but it is a bad world we live in, and if any man suffers himself to be deluded for a moment with the notion that high ideals govern the conduct of persons and parties, there is a great chance that in a very short time he will be painfully undeceived. For my part, I was undeceived

[Third Night.

when I opened the newspapers next morning, for I found there that a right hon. Gentleman had committed himself in the manner I am now going to describe. That right hon. Gentleman attended a meeting of an alarmed and timorous interest, which, fearful of the withdrawal of the protection they enjoyed, might be acted upon, it was hoped, to oppose a great national measure on account of their own narrow interests. There is one valuable principle of free trade which appears to be well understood by the hon. Gentlemen opposite, and that is the division of labour. While the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire was announcing in sounding periods the high ground on which he took his stand, another right hon. Gentleman was holding different language in a different place—I mean the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich (Sir J. Pakington). The right hon. Baronet attended a meeting of a set of gentlemen who are well known, almost every man of them, to every successive Chancellor of the Exchequer—namely, those who are called the growers of hops. The county to which the right hon. Baronet is an ornament is not a great hop-growing county; it produces $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent of the total consumption, and consequently—I believe I am correct in the statement—until the eventful week in which we now are the right hon. Baronet had never thought it worth his while to attend a meeting of hop-growers. But on this particular occasion, when the financial scheme and a chance of intercepting the Treaty with France were in question, my right hon. Friend the Member for Droitwich, his bowels with mercy and sympathy moved towards the hop-growers, appeared for the first time at a meeting among the champions of that suffering interest. And what was the advice given by my right hon. Friend within twenty-four hours of the time when the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire had—if I may thus express myself—so surreptitiously excited our admiration and almost enthusiasm by the enunciation of lofty principles. I have made inquiry about the accuracy of the report, and therefore I have less hesitation in quoting a few words from it. My right hon. Friend spoke among hop-growers, and said that he was not connected with a great hop-growing county. I suppose his audience knew that as well as he; but he went on to observe that his county had a good deal of land planted with hops, and he thought it right to attend the meeting. My right hon. Friend then entered on hops, but very slightly, and did not show that acquaintance with the manipulation of details which no one knew better how to employ when a master of details; but it was a resistless impulse which brought him among those unfortunate people in order to point out the way of salvation to them, and he said, “I would suggest as a matter of business”—the House will see that, unlike the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire, who spoke in a tone of high feeling and romance, the right hon. Baronet, observing the division of labour agreed on, applied himself rigidly and without any chivalrous feeling to the part allotted to him. He said, “I would suggest, as a matter of business, that instead of their going to the Chancellor of the Exchequer they should instruct their Members to go at once to the House of Commons, and say, ‘This Budget does not suit us, and we will oppose it.’” As for the Budget itself, the right hon. Baronet said he looked on it as “a rash, meddlesome, and unsatisfactory scheme.” That is all very well. Regarding the Budget in that light, it is doubtless the right hon. Baronet’s duty to oppose it, but he never thought it at all necessary to understand whether the hop-growers he was addressing partook of his opinion. He did not go to them and ask, “Do you think the Budget bad?” but he said “Your particular interests are attacked, and therefore turn against the whole Budget.” The right hon. Gentleman went on:—

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

“And if all the interests injuriously affected by it could combine together, giving up their immediate views with regard to their own individual interests, the result would very soon be to get rid of it altogether. He therefore counselled them to unite with other interests and bring such a pressure to bear upon Parliament as would put an end to the Budget at a blow.”

That is the disappointment which I for one have undergone in comparing a declaration in full of the highest mediæval spirit made by the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire with the more practical proceedings of the right hon. Member for Droitwich as a matter of business. But, however that may be, and whatever may be the proceedings that may be taken by those who sit on the same bench with the right hon. Baronet at the meeting of hop-growers or others, whether reported or not reported, having availed myself of the little light that was thrown on them through the medium of the daily journals, let me

now endeavour to deal with the Motion as it stands on our books, and apart altogether from the question of what interests can be got to support it. But this I am bound to say, after the challenge given by the right hon. Gentleman—the invitation given by him to those parties—that I am deeply convinced that all such invitations in a country like England will miserably fail. Those who think that this Budget does them injustice will use their best exertions to defend themselves upon their own ground and with their own legitimate weapons, but they will not, from fear of losing their own legal privilege, be deluded and seduced into an error so grave as that of absorbing the greatest national interests in their own individual and particular convenience as a class, and they will give, I am convinced, an impartial judgment upon the main issue which is brought before them. The right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Whiteside), who spoke last night, described the Budget, and referred to the descriptions that had been given of it. He said my right hon. Friend the Member for Coventry (Mr. Ellice) had characterized it as an ambitious Budget. I know the position of my right hon. Friend, and I cannot in the slightest degree quarrel with him for the use of that epithet, but I am sure he will admit to me that if it shall be found that the people of England receive these financial plans with approval it is not because they are fond of ambitious Budgets, but because they wish for measures which they think will contribute to the extension of trade and the prosperity of the nation. Some one else went far beyond my right hon. Friend, and said it was an audacious Budget. The right hon. and learned Gentleman himself would not go as far as that, but said it was a bold experiment upon the country. I am desirous that the House should come to a clear and conclusive view of the question who it is that is treading the safe paths of experience, and who it is that is chargeable to-night with objections and propositions that are ambitious, that are audacious, or that are bold experiments upon the country. My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) gave a different description of the financial scheme. He gave a description which was not the most complimentary to the author of an ambitious Budget. He said, looking at it from a directly opposite point of view, “the Chancellor of the Exchequer can lay no claim to the merit of originality, he is simply walking in the footsteps of those who have gone before him, and because those footsteps have led us to safety in other times therefore he walks in them now.” I affirm that that is the true description of the Budget. It does not lay claim to the merit of originality—if originality be a merit—but, at any rate, such have been the providence and sagacity of those who have gone before us that there is no need of originality. They have laid down the pattern of wise and prudent conduct in respect of public finance, and all we have to do is to follow in the course they have indicated. I must be permitted to say that I really pass by the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman who last addressed us, who conceives that this Motion, which was born at the meeting of a great party, and has been adopted in consequence of the determination of a distinguished nobleman to come forth from almost monastic seclusion to which he had retired, in order to rescue his country from danger—I cannot conceive that such a Motion is to be regarded in such a light. [Cries of “Who!”] I mean the Earl of Derby. I speak from what I have seen reported, distinctly and without contradiction, as having been the language of the noble Earl. That noble Earl said that he had determined not to become a candidate for the resumption of his office as Prime Minister, after having twice held and lost it in a manner not satisfactory to himself, unless under circumstances of some rash and dangerous scheme vitally assailing the best interests of the country. Under these circumstances he would come forth from his retirement and again be at the command of his Sovereign. [“No, no!”] I apprehend I am right in supposing that Lord Derby is at the command of his Sovereign. I do not wish to detain the House by a verbal contest, but I imagine the right hon. Gentleman who last spoke treated this as a Motion which did not disturb the Treaty, and was not intended, if carried, to disturb the Government. As to disturbing the Treaty, it is well known the Treaty parts with £1,200,000 of the ordinary revenue of the year, and the Motion declares that it is not expedient to add to the existing deficiency by diminishing the ordinary revenue, and that I understand to be a plain and flat contradiction of our scheme. In the same manner I am right in supposing there is no hon. Gentleman who sits opposite, or at least upon the bench immediately before me, who does not frankly regard this Motion as one.

[Third Night.]

which, if carried, would render it impossible for any Government to continue to hold office. I have no doubt my right hon. Friend who spoke last is the only hon. Member here who holds that peculiar form of opinion he has expressed. ["No, no!"] Let us, then, understand what the Motion is. Is it aimed at the Treaty with France or is it not? Is it possible to hold that a Motion which denounces any addition to an existing deficiency by parting with revenue can be thought compatible with a Treaty which does add to the deficiency by parting with considerable revenue? It is a Motion aimed in terms—and I interpret its spirit solely from its terms—it is aimed in its terms and spirit at the life and substance of the Treaty. But more than that, I will endeavour to point out why I also say the Motion repudiates and condemns in the mass the commercial legislation of the last eighteen years. ["No!"] Hon. Gentlemen say "no." Permit me respectfully to suggest that I am to be followed in the debate by their leader, and he will have an opportunity of conveying the "No" to which they wish to give utterance in a manner quite as effective for their purpose, and much more agreeable to the House generally. The doctrine laid down is that it is not expedient to add to existing deficiencies by diminishing the ordinary revenue. That is the doctrine laid down in the Motion, and that doctrine, I say, is fatal to every great and beneficial change that has been made in this country in connection with the revenue for the last eighteen years. ["No, no!"] I understand hon. Gentlemen to dissent. Let us go to the proof. I will endeavour to prove that in a short and simple manner, and, without referring to all operations during a number of years, will refer only to three great crises. Putting aside the greatest of those events—the corn law and the navigation laws, which had no perceptible connection with finance—I will refer to those great occasions when we dealt largely with the finances of the country in the sense of propositions of commercial reform—1842, 1845, and 1853. I was glad to hear, when, the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) last night said we were treading in the footsteps of Sir Robert Peel, that some hon. Members opposite cried "No." It showed that we have arrived at last at a time when it is admitted that those principles and that policy constitute not the mere decoration of a name or of a party,

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

but a great national inheritance for which contending parties may honourably strive. That is a great mark of progress, when we recollect what has taken place within the memory of us all, when we remember that the changes of 1842 and those which followed led the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bucks to denounce a Conservative Government as an "organized hypocrisy." Take that as a starting point, and then realize the fact that the two sides of the House are now contesting who shall be the exponents, who shall be the champions, of those principles. It is a proof of the great progress that has been made, and the only question remaining now is which of the two sides of this House is endeavouring to continue that progress, and which to resist it. I will refer to each of those three years—1842, 1845, and 1853—in order to show that in every substantial and important financial change you will find the principles to be precisely the same as those upon which the present Government has founded the scheme which is now before the House and the country. I shall place them in the sharpest contrast with the Motion which you are invited to adopt to-night, which my right hon. Friend who spoke last is about to support by his vote, and which declares that it is "not expedient to add to the existing deficiency, by diminishing the ordinary revenue." In 1842 there was, as there is now, an existing deficiency. It amounted to £2,570,000. Sir Robert Peel added to that existing deficiency by diminishing the ordinary revenue. He took from the ordinary revenue, by the remissions he made, a sum of £1,210,000. He thereby swelled the deficiency to £3,780,000, and he then laid on new taxes, of which the income tax was nine-tenths, to the amount of £4,380,000; thus obtaining a surplus of £600,000. I think that is rather like the operation which you are now asked to sanction. In 1845 there was one point of difference, and you will yourselves judge whether it is vital, or whether, as I think, it is comparatively unimportant, if it does not make out a stronger case. In that year Sir Robert Peel did not add to an existing deficiency, but he created a deficiency, by converting a surplus into a deficit. He had, in 1845, a surplus of £1,420,000. He converted it into a deficit by large remissions, which involved a loss to the revenue of more than £3,502,000. In that way he created a deficiency of £2,082,000. By renewing the income tax, he obtained Ways and Means to the extent of £2,600,000, and so secured a surplus of £518,000. I think that, again, was rather like the operation of 1842. In 1853, when substantially, though in less arduous circumstances, most of us who are here present heard all these dismal prophecies, there was again an existing deficiency of £1,968,000. We again added to the existing deficiency, by diminishing the ordinary sources of revenue to the extent of £1,656,000. In that way we increased the deficiency to no less a sum than £3,624,000. We supplied that deficiency by new charges, that were estimated to yield—but, in point of fact, they yielded more—£4,090,000., and so obtained a surplus within a few thousands, the same as that which is now proposed—a surplus of £466,000. In each and all of these cases you pursued precisely for every substantial and practical purpose the same course. You either found or you created a deficiency; you aggravated when you did not create it; you had it to deal with in each case; you dealt with it after diminishing the ordinary revenue, by the imposition of new taxes; and that is the essence and foundation of the scheme now before you, as compared and contrasted with those rival schemes, of which some faint glimmerings have been obtained from one or two of the less cautious of the speeches which have been delivered in the course of the present debate. I may observe that 1853 was so far distinguished from the other cases, that in that year not only did we add to an existing deficiency, and impose new taxes, but the House of Commons, by so strong and so prevalent a feeling, both in the House and in the country, that no one ventured to raise a general issue, effected the operation by means of some indirect taxes laid upon spirits, but mainly by direct taxation, and in no inconsiderable degree by an extension of the income tax itself. I contend, therefore, that by demonstration, and not merely by loose assertion, it is clear beyond all doubt or argument, and in the rigid logic of figures themselves, that the plan we are now proposing, not as we describe it, but as described in a hostile Motion, corresponds in every point with the measures of 1842, 1845, and 1853. If that be so, the issue is a very short and simple one, because the question is, will the House stand by those measures,—will it endeavour to develop by further application the principles upon which they were founded, or will it, on the contrary, at this time of day, declare that it sees cause to renounce those doctrines, and to adopt, instead of them, the opposite principle, that it is “not expedient to add to the existing deficiency, by diminishing the ordinary revenue?” So far I have quoted the words of the Motion, but I will add on my own account “for the purpose of making those investments on the part of the public, which a long, a sure, and now an unquestioned experience has proved to be almost beyond all other investments fruitful, wholesome, and reproductive.” It may be said that there is one important point of difference between the circumstances of the present year, and those of the years to which I have referred, and that is that the deficiency with which we have to deal, is much larger than it was upon any of those occasions. That is perfectly true; but, on the other hand, let the House reflect whether there are not special circumstances of the most cogent character which almost compel Parliament, by the force of equity and justice, to recognize the claims of trade, of industry, and of the population at large to remissions of taxation. I shall mention two. One of them is the falling in of £2,000,000, and more of annuities, with respect to which I think it will be admitted that some question at least arises whether they are merely to be added to the means of meeting an enormous and constantly growing expenditure, or whether they mark an epoch at which we ought to endeavour to apply afresh the principles which we applied with such good effect before. The other relates to the extraordinary resources which we shall derive during the present year from what may be called casual receipts, that cannot recur. Take the single case of the sums we are going to obtain from the malt and hop credits. I have no difficulty in justifying the application of those sums under the circumstances to the services of the year, partly because they may in some sense be set against the really extraordinary expenditure to which we are liable on account of the military expedition to China, but mainly because we intend to make a reproductive use of the money. And though we begin by remitting taxes we are going to create funds, which as time goes on, will from year to year be constantly adding to your resources. Just look how the case stands. We are going to apply from extraordinary sources to the services of the year a sum of £1,400,000. That is only £700,000 less than the whole amount we are to lose by remissions of taxation; in other words, £700,000 is the whole extent for the services of the present year to which the ordinary revenue is really to be a loser on account of the remissions we are making, and that £700,000 represents three-fourths of a penny, or the difference between 9d. and 10d. in the income tax. But I must object altogether to the assumptions of these who exclaim against the reduction of indirect taxes as an irretrievable loss to the revenue. The receipts from indirect taxes constantly increase, and they increase the faster, and mainly, because we reduce. The receipts from indirect taxes will be larger in the present year, apart from the operation of the Treaty with France, than they have been, I believe, in any past year within our recollection,—certainly in any year since the imposition of the income tax. The difference is enormous between the amount at which they stood when the income tax was first imposed and the amount to which they have been raised by judicious remissions. But it does not follow that because we propose an operation of this kind in the present year it is therefore to be repeated every year. You commenced these reforms practically in 1842. You went on in 1842, in 1845, in 1846, which was, perhaps, the greatest year of the whole. In 1849 you repealed the navigation laws. In 1850 and 1851 you returned to the repeal of taxation, chiefly indirect. In 1853 you made another large remission of taxation. Between 1842 and 1853 there were not less than seven or eight years in which you made these operations; and what has happened since? For seven years, owing to the circumstances, we will suppose, of the time, the application of the principle has been intermitted altogether; and then comes a year when you have an extraordinary relief from the public debt, and when you are going to apply extraordinary means to the services of the year. With an interval of seven years since you have done anything for the further application of your principle, is it strange that you should be asked to recur to a beneficial practice? You may tell me that this is a year of great expenditure, and that therefore it is an unfit year; but do you who say that promise me that there will be great relief from that expenditure next year? If it were in a year of great expenditure, with the prospect of immediate relief, I grant you it might be better to undergo the inconvenience and forego the benefit, and wait for a year or a couple of years before proposing what we propose to do now. But what is the spirit shown on the other side, not by all hon. Gentlemen opposite, but by the Mover of this Motion, whom I take as an excellent specimen of the distinguished class to which he belongs? What is the spirit which he shows, and what is the spirit of the Motion with regard to expenditure? Does this Motion condemn our great expenditure? Does this recognize it, as I believe it is generally recognized on this side of the House—as far as it is approved—as a necessity, but a painful necessity, to which we submit because we think high interests require it, but from which we are desirous to escape—from which we hope to escape, and from which we are determined to keep in our own hands the means of escaping? That is the spirit in which the expenditure is supported on this side of the House; but is that the spirit of the hon. Mover? On the contrary, he pours contempt on times of economy—he fears we shall get back to those times to which he applies the miserable epithet of “cheeseparings”—he seems to give countenance to the discrediting assertion that the Ministers and the Parliament of England have given way to this cheeseparings economy. Why, who have been the Ministers during whose time economy has been most in vogue? I do not speak of those who live and sit on this bench. I speak only of the dead. The Duke of Wellington—than whose Administration none did more, according to its time and circumstances, for economy—Lord Grey, Lord Melbourne, Sir Robert Peel. Those are the men under whom, by whose countenance, and by whose labour rules of thrift were applied to the expenditure of the State; and those are the men upon whom the Mover of this Motion, partly by its terms, and partly by the language by which he expounds them, thinks fit to throw a slur as cheeseparings economists. Sir, I have admitted that it is impossible to expect a rapid return for this benefit; that we have entered—though I trust the Estimates for the present year are exceptional—on a high level of expenditure. But, being on that high level of expenditure, and having heavy burdens to bear, can we not strengthen ourselves for the task by means which in former years were found so efficacious, and again apply the principles which were applied in 1842, in 1845, and in 1853? Sir, there is another view of this case, to which no allusion has been made by hon. Gentlemen who have spoken on the other side of the House, but which I must confess impresses itself very forcibly upon my mind, and it is this:—I heard with pain the speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth (Sir F. Baring) which gave the weight of his authority, not so far, as I could understand, in support of the Motion, but, at any rate, in disapproval of the financial proposals of the Government. My right hon. Friend referred, and my hon. Friend the Member for Stamford (Sir Stafford Northcote) referred, to a political reason for the recommendation of schemes different from those of the Government. My hon. Friend the Member for Stamford gave us a glimpse of finance to which he would gladly have been a party, and he said that, instead of an income tax of 10*d.* in the pound, we ought to have an income tax of 7*d.* in the pound. My first objection to that agreeable suggestion is, that he proposed entirely to abolish the very small and modest surplus which I asked the House to provide, and that entire abolition of surplus is not, as I understand, a condition or characteristic of safe or prudent finance. My hon. Friend proposed to restore to the revenue what we take away. He proposed to take away 3-10ths of the income tax, or about £3,550,000, and the difference between those sums swallowed up the modest surplus which I have asked. That is my first objection to the suggestion of my hon. Friend. "Aye, but," says my hon. Friend, "you have always an increase from indirect taxes." Yes, Sir, but it happens that we have reckoned that increase already; we have taken it at as high an amount as the opinion of the official persons who are entitled to the greatest consideration warrants us in taking it, and I need not tell my hon. Friend we cannot eat the cake and have it too—we cannot reckon a sum twice on the same side of the account. But then my hon. Friend said he would provide a surplus by new taxes. By what new taxes? By taxes on the trade and industry of the country. Depend upon it if ever you adopt a stationary finance—stationary in fact, but retrogressive in spirit—you will not simply stand still; you will lose those continual supplies welling forth year by year from the fountains which prudent legislation has opened, and you will be obliged to make provision by new taxes, to which my hon. Friend so very mildly glanced. My hon. Friend said, and my right hon. Friend also (Sir F. Baring) also said, we do not make proper provision for 1861. Supposing hon. Gentlemen opposite had attained a Spartan heroism, and were as rigid financiers as they are Puritanical Free-traders when it suits them, and they had said, "It is intolerable that this £1,400,000 should be applied to the purposes you propose; take £1,000,000 of it and apply it to the payment of Exchequer bonds;" I am not sure that they would have made a good party Motion or that they would have had the hop-growers to assist them; but they would have acted on those high principles of finance which I must say have for many years been the peculiar characteristic of the party which they claim to represent. But it is not so. They ask you to give the utmost possible relief to the class which chiefly returns Members to Parliament,—nothing to any other class,—and to apply the malt and hop credits, not with a view to reproduction, but as an expedient to meet expenditure in a dead season, in accordance with a policy which provides from hand to mouth, looks not to the future, and contains within it no germ of vigour or possible improvement. My hon. Friend said, "Take care what you are doing," and he was echoed by my right hon. Friend. What are we doing? We leave to the Parliament of 1861 to make provision for 1861, as we are making provisions for 1860; and the reason of that proceeding is not concealed. It is a very plain reason,—that we do not recognize the expenditure now going on as fixed and immutable. We wish it to be watched by the people of England, to be controlled by Parliament, and therefore it is well that the Government should be dependent on Parliament for a portion of the revenue, instead of its being absolutely fixed in all its parts, in order that Parliament shall have control over the taxes. Here I think I am entitled to make a strong appeal to my right hon. Friend. He did not speak of great expenditure as desirable, or to be looked on with indifference. He, I thought, from the tone of his speech, looked with anxiety, which in my idea every prudent statesman must feel, to see the expenditure increased. I have no article of faith more cardinal than that large expenditure is not only an evil in itself, but constitutes a social and political danger to the country. But my right hon. Friend said, "You will never get down the expenditure until you refuse some of the taxes," and yet he objects to us when the course which we take is to leave in the Parliament of next year the power of employing that lever, if it thinks fit, for the purpose of acting on the expenditure of the country. I must say we are acting on the principle of my right hon. Friend, and I shall be very sorry if we have not his aid to give it effect. But here he and my hon. Friend came in and intimated that there is a peculiar danger in leaving to the Parliament of next year to make provisions for the exigencies of next year, because it is likely to be a Reformed Parliament; and so, because it is likely to be a Reformed Parliament, you are to tie up its hands, as a man who holds an estate in fee simple, and has got a disreputable son, entails and hampers it in every way he can, for fear his son will abuse his power. That is the spirit in which we are to act towards the Reformed Parliament. We are to go and say to an additional portion of the people, "We hold you worthy to be associated with your fellow-citizens in the great and noble office of choosing your representatives in Parliament, but when those representatives come and take their seats in the old British House of Commons they shall find the House denuded, as far as we can effect it, of some of its powers. They shall find that we have done for them something we thought dangerous to allow them to do for themselves." If there is to be a reform of Parliament—if masses of our fellow-countrymen now excluded, be they great or small, are to be admitted to the franchise—let those who are returned to the new House, when they assemble, be heirs to every power, to every privilege, and to all the liberty of the old; and do not let us presume to lay the foundations of jealousy—perhaps of disloyalty and disorder—by promulgating the doctrine that in proportion to the larger number of the people responsible for the election and conduct of Parliament, the powers of that Parliament are to be limited. That is one way of guarding against the dangers of a reformed Parliament, and it is a way which, under pretence of guarding against them, in fact, aggravates their dangers. There is another method of proceeding, which I hope this House will pursue. We are at present returned by undoubtedly a most intelligent portion of the population, but a portion more limited in its numbers than we think desirable. We are about to admit new classes to the exercise of the franchise. I have got the specific of my right hon. Friend (Sir F. Baring) for making the new Parliament innocuous, and I am not able to adopt it. I will give him mine, and leave the House to judge between us. It is a very simple one. When the new class sends to Parliament representatives who will be more peculiarly its own; when these newly-elected stewards enter upon the discharge of their functions; when they come to review the actions of their predecessors, let them find that, though we represented but a part of the people, yet to the best of our opinions and the best of our judgment, we held fairly the scales of justice between class and class, and studied the interests of all alike. And now I make my second appeal to the House of Commons. I ask you, which of the two plans before you best corresponds to the description I have given? You know well that the interests of different classes are materially affected by different kinds of taxation. Hear my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (Mr. Hubbard). How eloquent he is on the sufferings of the long annuitants. I am very glad that the long annuitants should have a representative in this House; but there are classes which are not represented, and I want to know what sort of justice it is proposed to do them by the plan of the Government and the plan of the party opposite respectively? Here, again, I must resort for a few minutes to figures to prove my case, and they shall be the last. I apprehend it is an admitted proposition that in a certain relative manner, but with much of substantial truth, we may say that indirect taxes upon commodities are paid in a large proportion on a number of articles of consumption by the unrepresented classes, whereas the income tax is paid almost entirely by the represented classes, and in a great degree by the wealthy classes of the country. These are the terms in which I would state the incidence of the two kinds of taxation; and bearing these terms in mind, I beg the House to observe what has happened. Six years ago came the Russian war, and we had to make great additions to the taxation of the country. The House thought fit to make those additions in certain proportions between what was direct and what was indirect taxation. I put out of view now—what if not put out of view would make for my own side—the additional taxes laid on spirits, because I conceive they were permanent additions to the revenue which we gladly adopted, irrespective of the question of what class they favoured, and I look only to the temporary additions which the House of Commons made to the taxation for the purposes of the war. They were these—In 1854 and 1855, we laid on for the purposes of the war £8,557,000 of direct taxes; and in the same years, also for the purposes of the war, putting aside the spirit duties, £5,450,000 of indirect taxes. The House will see that this is in the proportion very nearly of eight to five; eight representing the direct, and five the indirect taxes. That was the measure and the mode of the deviation which we made at that period from our old system of taxation, and I think the House will go with me when I say that it was desirable when peace returned, and we began to remit those taxes, that we should not remit exclusively or mainly the taxes paid by the classes that returned us to Parliament; but that we should have observed the same proportion, or at least a proportion equally favourable to the classes not directly represented here. What have we done? Have we conformed to that law? Does the plan of Her Majesty's Government conform to it? Does the plan of right hon. Gentlemen opposite conform to it or reverse it? Here are the figures, and I must say they are more curious than satisfactory. In 1857-8 we retained of direct taxes, above the standard provided for peace—nearly £2,000,000. We retained of indirect taxes £3,000,000—those on tea and sugar. In 1858-9, when the right hon. Gentleman opposite was in office, we retained of direct taxes of the war—none at all of indirect taxes—£3,000,000. In 1859-60 we put on of income tax £4,000,000, not done by the right hon. Gentleman opposite, but done by the present Government, in order to meet the charge of the Estimates in the main prepared by their predecessors, and we still retained £3,000,000 indirect taxes on tea and sugar. In point of fact, if we take the totals of 1857 and 1858, we levied of the direct taxes of the war £2,000,000 and of the indirect taxes of the war £6,000,000, and whereas they have been laid on in the proportion of 8 to 5, not much short of double, they were retained in the proportion of 1 to 3. The proceedings of last year somewhat rectified this, because then we should have paid up to April £6,000,000 of the direct taxes of the war, and £9,000,000 of indirect taxes—the proportion still standing at 2 to 3, instead of, as it ought, at 3 to 2. If the House has followed me in these figures, I think it is clearly demonstrable that, if this House really wishes to show the reformed Parliament which is to follow us that we have done justice as between class and class, something is due from us to the consumers of the great commodities in which the people take an interest, and to the relief which is afforded to those classes by the remission of duties affecting trade. And here let me say this—that if an hon. Gentleman opposite says we have made a great mistake in selecting the paper duty for remission instead of the tea and sugar duties—though I may differ from him, though I may enter into an argument to show that it would be better for the masses that the paper duties should be repealed, still we stand, at any rate, upon common ground; and I am ready to admit that, as far as principle is concerned, the reduction of the duties on tea and sugar would be as just in intention towards the masses of the people as the repeal of the duty on paper. But that is not the fact. Every proposal that has proceeded from the opposite side of the House goes on the principle of maintaining not only every farthing affecting the trading interest, but every farthing of the duties in which the masses of the people are directly concerned as consumers. If I were to take it as a sum in arithmetic, the real state of the case is this:—In proportion to the nine millions that we have levied of indirect war taxation since the war, if we had observed the same rule which we observed in laying it on, we should have levied £14,000,000 of direct taxation. Instead of that we have levied £6,000,000, and the balance of £8,000,000, according to the principle adopted by Parliament, is still due to those classes whose demands we ought first to have relieved. It is under these circumstances, when we have kept up heavy charges on articles consumed by the people, in which the labouring man takes a great interest, that we are again asked to administer relief; for I admit that a penny in the pound is a great relief to the classes which have so long been subject to the burden of the income tax. I am quite satisfied with the issues which have been raised. I do not think it is necessary longer to detain the House. When hon. Gentlemen opposite regret that an unnecessarily high income tax should be levied, I certainly agree with them. I am sorry that any high income tax should be levied, whether necessary or unnecessary. We will debate on the meaning of these terms when the proper time comes. For the present, I have endeavoured to direct your attention to this fact, that the main proposition of the hon. Gentleman the Member for North Essex is a proposal which attacks the whole of the past course of commercial legislation since 1842, and which stigmatizes it for the past, and which renounces it for the future. I have also shown that, if Parliament is to be reformed, the best security we can take for the institutions of the country, for the loyalty of the people under the action of the new system, is to show that we have done justice to all classes while the old one was in existence. Upon these two issues jointly and without fear I commit the Motion to the decision of the House, and I am convinced both that their decision will be conclusively favourable to the scheme of the Government, and likewise that in delivering it the House of Commons will do no more than echo back the voice which has sounded throughout the nation from one extremity to the other.

[Third Night.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

MR. DISRAELI: I rise, Sir, to answer the challenge of the right hon. Gentleman, and to interpret that indignant negative which he heard from my hon. Friends behind me. The right hon. Gentleman has stated that the Motion made by my hon. Friend the Member for Essex is one that impugns the whole policy of commercial legislation for the last eighteen years. He says that the measures which he has introduced and the policy which he recommends are precisely the same as those which on preceding occasions have received the sanction of Parliament, and the approbation of the nation. He says, that if the House accedes to this Motion we are declaring that we entirely disapprove all that has been done in those eighteen years to revise our Commercial Code. But I join issue at once with the right hon. Gentleman. I deny the similarity between the measures which he introduces and those to which he refers. Sir Robert Peel, in 1842, in 1845, and the right hon. Gentleman himself, in 1853, certainly found or made deficits, but when they proposed a tax like the income tax it was for a period which covered the interval during which the experiment might have fair play. What we charge against the measures of the right hon. Gentleman is this,—that he has found a deficit and made a deficit, and has not proposed measures which will secure fair play to any experiment by which that deficit can be supplied. The whole speech of the right hon. Gentleman depended on this point. If the position of the right hon. Gentleman is not sound—as I hope I shall succeed in showing to the House—the whole of his conclusions fall to the ground. The House, I am sure, will generously remember, though the hour is late, that this is not an occasion on which I could shrink from expressing my opinions. I will therefore consider, as briefly as I possibly can, and for the moment in a merely financial point of view, the plan of the right hon. Gentleman, and I will see how it agrees with the position he has laid down, and how you can reconcile it with the character he has given of the Motion of my hon. Friend. Of this Budget of the right hon. Gentleman I would say this—that it aims at too much and provides too little. The right hon. Gentleman finds a deficit: he increases that deficit, and he closes his proposition with introducing a tax of a very extensive character and which is to exist only for a short term. The right hon. Gentleman has, I think, estimated his deficiency at nearly nine millions and a half—£9,400,000. When the right hon. Gentleman made his financial statement the Army Estimates were not on the table, at least few Gentlemen had enjoyed the opportunity of studying them; I, at least, had not been able to examine them. But I think no one can deny, who has since looked over these Estimates, that it would be a moderate calculation to assume that the army expenditure will not be less than a million beyond what appears in these accounts. We have heard to-night that regiments have been sent to China from the Indian establishments, and that the moment they arrive in China they will be on the British establishment. We have also heard to-night of regiments from India which are expected in England, and which the moment they arrive will be on the British establishment. In the Estimates we found one Vote of half a million for the Chinese war, which every one felt at the moment was a ludicrous amount.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: You are not to suppose that the Vote of credit represents the whole charge of the Chinese war. It only represents certain extraordinary charges which could not be stated in the ordinary Estimates.

MR. DISRAELI: Certainly the sum of £500,000 would appear at the first blush very unequal to the occasion. The Estimate has already assumed the dimensions of £850,000.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER was understood to dissent.

MR. DISRAELI: Without at this hour dwelling too much on the Estimates, it would be a very sanguine anticipation on the part of the House to suppose that the deficit assumed by the right hon. Gentleman would not be exceeded. The right hon. Gentleman, with this deficit of £9,400,000, will next year find wanting those malt and hop credits for £1,400,000, of which we have heard so much, and against the appropriation of which I enter my protest as a measure utterly unsound in finance, and of which I am quite surprised that the right hon. Gentleman should ever have proposed to avail himself. I remember that in 1852 I proposed, as a measure of reform, the extinction of a very small office connected with the Treasury which had a comparatively small sum of public money intrusted to its administration; I believe not more than £350,000. I proposed that that sum should be taken in the revenue of the year, and I did so only in order to secure a surplus, so that the amount would almost certainly have been found in the balances of the Exchequer, to which it belonged. The right hon. Gentleman denounced that project as one which could be justified on no ground whatever, and called for the reprobation of Parliament upon it; but what he is now doing is just the same thing, only upon a much greater scale, and under circumstances much less justifiable. Then we have in addition the question of the million of Exchequer bonds. We are told, Sir, that the country is in a position of unexampled prosperity. If we cannot pay our debts at such a time, when can we? When I asked, the other night, the Secretary to the Treasury, in the absence of the right hon. Gentleman, how and when he proposed to pay that million of Exchequer bonds, the reply I received was a courteous reminder that I had in 1858 postponed the payment of £2,000,000 of Exchequer bonds. Surely he recollected the circumstances under which I took that step? That was not a time of unexampled prosperity. The country was still staggering under a great commercial panic. The month before Parliament met, at the beginning of the year, the minimum rate of discount was 10 per cent, and it was felt by everybody that it was totally impossible under those circumstances to propose taxes which would press especially on the commercial classes, then suffering from such startling and fatal depression. The proposition I made was unanimously adopted by the House, and no one, under the circumstances, raised the slightest protest against it; but I see no similarity between the circumstances of that year and those of this year of unrivalled prosperity with which we are now dealing. What we object to in the scheme of the Chancellor of the Exchequer is, that it does not resemble the transactions of 1842 or of 1845. It does not resemble the operations of Sir Robert Peel, or even those operations of 1853 which the right hon. Gentleman himself introduced in this House. It is because the right hon. Gentleman has neglected to take the same security for the future, because we find his plan is improvident, and consequently, under the circumstances, extremely dangerous, that we ask the House to interpose and express its opinion upon the propositions submitted to them. What will be our situation a year hence? It may not, under ordinary circumstances be discreet to indulge in very prospective finance; but it appears to me it would be perfect madness, in our present situation, not to contemplate what will be our position in 1861. The right hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir Francis Baring), who has some experience on such subjects, has calculated the amount of probable deficit. I confess I shall be surprised, I need hardly say pleased, to find it does not exceed that amount; but if the possible deficit in 1861 be merely £12,000,000, surely the House should pause before it sanctions the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman, and should hesitate, with such a prospect in view, before it accedes to measures which must necessarily, according to the right hon. Gentleman's own account, increase the deficit and augment the pressure of 1861. The right hon. Gentleman seems to be disappointed that more than one speaker in this debate has contemplated the dangerous and inevitable consequences, in such a state of affairs, of attempting to fasten the expenditure of the country upon direct taxation; and he has brought forward a paper—and it is not the first time that he has had recourse to documents of that kind—to show how, in all recent impositions of taxation, there has not been that fair proportion between direct and indirect taxation imposed which he feels to be just and believes to be highly politic. But there is this fallacy in the paper which the right hon. Gentleman read, and the inferences which he draws from it. We do not object to a fair proportion of direct taxation in our financial system. What we do object to is that direct taxation should take the form of an income tax on this large scale. It is not fair in the right hon. Gentleman always to state the question as one of competition between direct and indirect taxation, and describe this side of the House as being always the advocates of the indirect against the direct system. The question is not as to which system is superior. There are but few in this House who contemplate a time when a considerable amount of indirect taxation must not form part of our financial system. But the question is whether that form of direct taxation, which no one has denounced in more unsparing language than the right hon. Gentleman, the national evils of which he has proclaimed, the demoralizing influence of which on the people he has described in glowing terms, shall continue to exist, and not only exist, but be increased under his administration, and go on increasing in a ratio that none can contemplate without apprehension. That is the question. More than one hon. Gentleman has addressed us in this way. We who object to this form, I will say to this excess of direct taxation, are told we are advocating the interests of a class, and that we do not consider sufficiently the interests of the masses, that we now learn from the Chancellor of the Exchequer will probably elect the new Parliament. I deny the justice of this observation. There is a class of political philosophers, certainly represented in the present House of Commons, who think that they can elevate a nation by degrading it into a mob. Sir, I do not share their opinion. The contributors to the income tax are of various classes in the state, numerous, of very different degrees of wealth, cultivation, and position. But it is no doubt true that those who pay the income tax are, generally speaking, the flower of the nation. They represent the traditions, the experience, the domestic integrity, and the moral qualities of the nation; and it is to their high spirit and constancy, from the highest to the humblest, that the State must look in the hour of exigency. It is not true that the contributors to the income tax are a class apart from the great body of the nation; though divided into many degrees they are an important portion of that body. I will not go into the subject of the comparative pressure of taxation, or inquire whether those who fall under the imposition of the income tax do not suffer more severely than any of the working classes of this country. I acknowledge how important it is to consider the condition of the working classes; I know how much depends on their ample and remunerative employment; and knowing how they contribute to the wealth of the country I feel their condition ought, by all means, to be elevated and improved. And I know that you cannot accomplish such a result better than by extending the commercial relations of this country with others, and putting an end to those remaining burdens, that press on trade and industry. All these are high objects of policy that the vast majority of this House are prepared by great efforts to accomplish. But you can accomplish this result on certain conditions—namely, that they are practicable, and consistent with our financial position. Sir, I would now say a word on this Commercial Treaty with France. I entirely approve any means that will increase our commercial relations with that country. That has been for many years—at least a quarter of a century—the object of constant solicitude on the part of many successive Governments. In 1840 we were informed—not officially, but it was well known—that a commercial treaty with France was negotiated. I am not aware of the real reason why that treaty was not ratified, but I believe that the difficulty did not come from the French Government. I should not have alluded to the subject if it had not been mentioned by a Member of the Cabinet, nor should I have felt at liberty to state what I am about to say but for what has fallen to-night from a servant of the Crown. Sir, in 1852, when I was Chancellor of the Exchequer, I was not in office a month before I made an attempt to establish increased commercial relations with France. When the Secretary of State (the Earl of Malmesbury) had opened the more formal business of the negotiation he requested me to place myself in communication with Earl Cowley, and to enter into correspondence with him on the subject, which I did. I do not say that the result of our labours would have taken the form of a treaty. Perhaps the alterations would not have been so extensive as those contemplated by the present Government, but at any rate they would not have been of a despicable character in a commercial point of view, and they would have been arranged by the mutual operation of our respective tariffs. What, Sir, was it that unfortunately prevented those arrangements? Towards the end of the autumn circumstances occurred that rendered it our duty when Parliament assembled to propose a great increase of our armaments. I found it impossible to have a peace Budget and a war expenditure. I was the victim, and my Budget never recovered that fatal blow. I mention this to show that we have none of those prejudices which the right hon. Gentleman imputes to us against increasing our commercial relations with the French Government. On the contrary, I think that, if the condition of affairs permitted, there is nothing more desirable than that those relations should be enlarged, and even if they took the form of a treaty I think I could endure it. What I object to in this Treaty is, that irrespective of the financial considerations involved, it is a very bad Treaty. I do not think there ever was a treaty drawn up apparently with less forethought or less knowledge of the circumstances with which the negotiators had to deal, which altogether contains so many arrangements injurious not only to the trade of England, but also inferentially and ultimately to that of France, or which is better calculated to sow the seeds of discord and dissension between the two countries. It would not be convenient now, at this hour, to go into the details of the Treaty, which would of itself require rather an elaborate speech; but I think that famous clause relating to coal, for example, is a very great mistake, and, if it is acceded to, ought to be accompanied by a reciprocal engagement on the part of France that all corn coming to this country should be exported free of duty. Then the arrangement about silk in the Treaty is extremely imperfect. Some silk manufactures enter France at a duty of fifteen per cent, which will now be charged thirty per cent. It is a great error that France should be permitted by this Treaty to levy an export duty on raw silk, when her manufactured articles of silk are to be admitted to our markets duty free. There are many other details, some of which are important, but which I will not weary the House with at this hour. I object, however, to the Treaty as an ill-drawn instrument, and one which, under any circumstances, ought not to be allowed to pass without criticism and opposition. But what I particularly object to is, that by entering on this Treaty the Government have increased that deficiency of the revenue under which the right hon. Gentleman is suffering. I will say this of the Treaty, that it adds certainly to our deficit a sum of £1,200,000 immediately; but it is so drawn that in respect to wine, when the right hon. Gentleman brings his new duties into full operation, his tests, I feel persuaded, will desert him. I do not understand how he will put his machinery into such order that his wines can be entered without a much greater sacrifice of revenue than he contemplates. If that be so, his loss of revenue will be much more considerable, perhaps £500,000 more than he contemplated in the statement he made when he opened his Budget to the House. As regards commercial intercourse with France, there is on this side of the House no political opposition to such a course, but, on the contrary, the greatest readiness to enter into arrangements for that object. But we object to the Treaty as a Treaty not skilfully negotiated, and as one that occasions a considerable deficiency in our revenue, probably a much more considerable deficiency than the Chancellor of the Exchequer estimates. We object also to the time at which it is brought forward, because the Chancellor of the Exchequer himself has confessed that the French Government were prepared to postpone the Treaty till 1861. [Mr. GLADSTONE: The operation of the Treaty]. There were secret negotiations, and there is not the slightest reason why the Treaty should not have been ratified, and remained a secret Treaty, till it was carried into operation. But we must consider the Budget of this year combined with the Budget of 1853, for this is a complement of that Budget, and they are in fact inseparably united. What has been the effect of the financial propositions of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1853, and cannot we draw some warning from their fate as to the probable result of the financial arrangements of 1860? There are four great features of the financial scheme of 1853—that famous scheme, the praises of which have been so much celebrated, and on the credit of which the Chancellor of the Exchequer flourished till he made his financial statement for 1860. The first feature of that celebrated Budget was, I will not say one to pay off the national debt, but to reduce the interest paid to public creditors. We afterwards had an ambiguous apology from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, from which it appeared that when he embarked in that enterprise he was not aware that it was necessary to give a notice of six months to the holders of £500,000,000 of stock before they could be paid off—a circumstance which, of course, somewhat interfered with the operation. The right hon. Gentleman himself acknowledged that his scheme was an abortion. I may say, in passing, what is perhaps not known to the House, that it was an abortion which cost us the whole of the balances in the Exchequer, and when we entered on the Russian war our balance in the Treasury was little more than £1,000,000. Well, so much for the first great feature, and first great failure of the Budget of 1853. The second feature of that financial scheme was the reduction of the tea duties to 1s. a pound. I think I may say, in passing, that that was a measure which had been adopted from his predecessor. I had the honour, on the part of the Earl of Derby's Government, to propose that the tea duties should be reduced to 1s. a pound; and had the proposition then been carried into law a duty of 1s. only would now have been paid. The right hon. Gentleman adopted generally the plan I proposed, but with his eager mind he proposed what he thought a more rapid and less methodical arrangement. He wished to do it quicker than I suggested; and what has been the result? The duty on tea is not 1s. a pound; it is much more; and I observed, from what passed at a meeting of the tea trade the other day, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer received, apparently with no disrelish, a suggestion from some gentlemen present that the duty at the present exigency should be made one penny a pound more. [Mr. GLADSTONE: I did not approve of, but dissented from that suggestion]. One great advantage of this debate is that we are favoured with a running commentary by the right hon. Gentleman. [A laugh]. I never object to being interrupted, and I hope that the Chancellor of the Exchequer will in future bear interruptions with as much patience as I do. This, then, was the second great feature, and the second great failure, of the Budget of 1853. On the third feature of that Budget—the Succession-Tax—I need say little. This is the great measure which and for the right hon. Gentleman the sympathy of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright). Here was a tax directed against the landed interest—a circumstance which recommended itself very much to that hon. Gentleman's favour, and which in 1860 was to produce two millions of money. The Chancellor of the Exchequer told us then that with those £2,000,000, and the £2,000,000 which we should acquire by the falling in of the terminable annuities he should have a pretty good sum in hand to assist him in putting an end to the income tax. Well, the year 1860 has arrived, in which this succession tax was to produce £2,000,000 per annum, and the result, we find, is that it has actually produced about one-third that sum. This was the third great feature of the Budget of 1853, and the third great failure. The fourth great feature, and one much larger in its proportions, is now under the consideration of the House—that which relates to the income tax, which, in a manner which gained for him the applause of all parties and the assent of a grateful country, he told us—masterpiece of statesmanship!—was at the commencement of 1860 to terminate altogether. Yet, notwithstanding that promise, we find that the income tax of 1853 is, unfortunately, still alive; nay, more, that it is a child which has greatly grown. The income tax of 1853, in short, which year after year was to diminish, and which in the present year was entirely to cease, has now increased to more than 4 per cent, or at the rate of 10d. in the pound. This, Sir, was the fourth great feature of the famous Budget of 1853, and the fourth great failure. Such, then, was the scheme of the right hon. Gentleman, and it is in consequence of that great financial success that we are asked to place confidence in the wild and improvident propositions to which our assent is now invited. But I will not state the case unfairly to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He has reminded the House that causes have intervened to prevent the realization of calculations which no one could control, and to those causes it is that he attributes the utter failure of his arrangements. The Russian war broke out contrary to his expectation. Now, before I touch briefly on that war, let me remind the right hon. Gentleman that the plea put forward because of it has no validity whatever, so far as regards his attempts to account for not keeping his engagement with respect to the termination of the income tax. Did he not, let me ask, ratify that policy and repeat those engagements in 1857, when he criticised the Budget of the right hon. Baronet the Member for Radnor (Sir G. Lewis), long, be it recollected, after peace had been proclaimed? Why, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman was then the apostle of the same policy as in 1853, and, so far as speeches can bind him, he must admit that he recommended the same policy and contemplated the same results. Nay, more; at a still more recent period, when I, in 1858, occupied the position which he now holds, when by course of law the income tax was to have lapsed to 5*d.*—half its proposed amount—he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer), still faithful to his old views, sanctioned the measures which I proposed, and bound himself to the accomplishment of the same compact to which in 1853 he stood pledged. But now, what, let me ask, is the plea which he puts forward for the abandonment of the policy to which I have referred? We now, instead of witnessing the termination of the income tax, are called upon to assent not only to its great increase, but to sanction an arrangement by which, in all probability, another appeal in the same shape will next year be rendered necessary, when we shall be asked to continue this tax in an aggravated form. The right hon. Gentleman, however, tells us that to the Russian war we are to attribute the utter failure of the Budget of 1853; but let me remind the House, in dealing with that plea, that we now know much more with respect to that war than we did seven years ago. We have had since laid on this table the secret correspondence which took place between Her Majesty's Minister at St. Petersburg and the Members of the present Government, the noble Lord opposite (Lord John Russell) being then, as at present, Secretary for Foreign Affairs. That correspondence was laid on the table in the spring of 1854. From the circumstance of my receiving authentic information which led me to infer its existence, the noble Lord was obliged ultimately to produce it. What appeared by that correspondence? Why, this—that no sooner had Lord Derby's Government been expelled from office than the Emperor of Russia disclosed to their successors his designs on Turkey. Am I using an exaggerated phrase in saying that immediately the Earl of Derby's Government left office this disclosure was made? I have a very good witness, formerly a great commercial authority, now a great diplomatic one, the secret negotiator at Paris—Mr. Cobden. I saw him rise in this House, and heard him say that there never was a vote in his life he regretted more than the one which expelled the Earl of Derby from office in 1852, because he said I have not the slightest doubt, from the information we possess, that that vote produced the Russian war. On the 1st of January the despatch was dated which informed Her Majesty's Ministers that it was the intention of the Emperor of Russia to invade Turkey. The Menschikoff mission, which hon. Gentlemen recollect, followed in due course, and yet it was with all this knowledge—unless the right hon. Gentleman, with his eager nature, was so absorbed in his office that he had no acquaintance with public affairs generally—that he brought forward his famous Budget of 1853 with all those arrangements which only a state of continuous peace could justify. He held out to a Parliament that had repudiated the income tax, that had insisted that it should be referred to a Select Committee, this mode as the satisfactory one of settling those long differences, while the right hon. Gentleman must have been aware that Europe was on the eve of a great convulsion, and of a war into which England would not be inferentially and indirectly drawn, but one in which she must have been the prime actor, for her interests were about to be assailed. But is that all? We know that the Emperor of Russia acted with great hesitation, with great doubt and perplexity, watching with keenness the conduct and temper of the British Government; and if it had appeared to possess any energy or real decision, would he not have been arrested in his fatal course? But we know from the personal confessions of that Government itself, that their Cabinet was the scene of internal dissension—we know that there were two parties in it, and if the present Prime Minister had been Prime Minister then, the war would not have taken place. There was a party over which the Earl of Aberdeen presided, which exercised an influence greater than that of the present Premier and the Foreign Secretary; and that was the party that produced peace Budgets when they ought to have been preparing war armaments. And what was the consequence? Has the House forgotten—England, I am sure, has not forgotten that famous Vote in 1854, in Supply, when the Chancellor of the Exchequer—determined, forced at last

[Third Night.

[Third Night.]

Disraeli

[Third Night.

to take a new course, which would arrest that of the Emperor, and show him that England was not to be trifled with—proposed that a few battalions of Guards should be sent to Malta, and proposed also the Vote that should pay for their passage back. Who can be surprised at what took place? Three months after such feeble conduct on the part of the Government, the war was begun; and what were the consequences of that war? An addition to your debt of £40,000,000—an annual charge of £1,180,000, exactly the sum you are going to pay annually for the French Treaty of Commerce. And now we are told we have great and successful financiers—statesmen who produce the great budgets of 1853 and 1860—men who think only of the incidence of taxation on the working classes—who shrink from expenditure, who call for retrenchment, who make every possible effort to lighten the burden of taxation on the people. Why, if these great statesmen had only shown a little more foresight and firmness, and prevented that Russian war which they precipitated by their feebleness, the incidence of taxation would have been very considerably lightened. Does not this prove that other qualities than mere political economy are necessary for the government of a nation? I told you that this Budget of 1853 was inseparably connected with that of 1860. You see how completely the Budget of 1853 has failed in all its four features. You see why it failed—because external circumstances, that were not foreseen by one who ought to have been prescient, interfered in a great degree with their consummation. What is the state of affairs now? Is the aspect more serene than it was in the spring of 1853? No man can suppose that the right hon. Gentleman is now ignorant of the state of external politics. If the Budget of 1860 ends in that confusion which I believe awaits it, and must await all schemes so utterly improvident, the right hon. Gentleman will not be able to tell us next year that his plans have been frustrated by external causes which he could not foresee. The right hon. Gentleman takes a great interest in the affairs of Italy. He has quarrelled with his old friend the Pope, as he has quarrelled with many others of his old friends. That Christian charity he grudged me a share of the other night, he now derives, I believe, from the Greek Church. But I think it would be well for this House, when we have a scheme of finance

Mr. Disraeli

of this improvident description placed before us—when, with a deficit existing, a further deficiency is created, and that tax increased which in the moment of emergency should be the source on which we ought most to rely, I think it would be well for us to consider what is the state of our Foreign affairs, and what is really contained under that phrase which so glibly runs through the mouths of men—the affairs of Italy. Sir, the affairs of Italy at this moment involve the greatest causes which can possibly impel men to action, or which can influence the destinies of empires. Totally irrespective of many causes of comparative insignificance, all of which in old days might have produced war, you have in Italy now three matters alone, any one of which is enough to convulse the world. You have the question of Papal supremacy, you have the question of the natural boundaries of empires, you have the question of the nationality of races; each of the first two have before this time produced the longest and most sanguinary struggle in the memory of man. The question of Papal supremacy gave you once the thirty years' war. The question of the natural boundaries of empires gave you the long war of the French Revolution. Those questions are still in existence; and, in addition, you have a new one, the solution of which cannot be ultimately avoided, perhaps cannot be long delayed—the question of the nationality of races. Are we to be told, in such circumstances as these, that all a Statesman should do is to simplify a tariff? Was there ever a moment in the history of this country, when we ought more to husband our resources? Is this a time wantonly to put an end to the sources of your ordinary revenue? Is this the time you should fix upon to anticipate the resources of your direct taxation? There is not a man out of this House, if there be any man in it, who doubts the propriety of the course we ought to pursue. I think the course recommended by the Government is the most improvident—I could use, but I will not, a much stronger phrase—that ever yet was counselled to Parliament. I should, under ordinary circumstances, hesitate to support it; but in a moment like this I feel it my duty utterly and emphatically to protest against it. The hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. B. Osborne) spoke with great friendliness to me this evening, and told me aloud, though, of course, in confidence, that I had recommended a very unwise course to my hon. Friend, the Member for Essex, in advising him to propose that Motion, which he did with so much spirit and promise. The hon. Member for Liskeard asked why we proposed such a Resolution, why we did not admit the principle of the Budget—that is to say, the principle of the policy—and worry the Government in Committee. We should then have got a great deal of assistance; the hon. Member would have helped us himself; and we might have beat the Government in detail. I have no doubt the hon. Member would make a much more adroit leader of a party than I can pretend to be; and, indeed, it is only with the assistance and constant indulgence of my friends, that I can for a moment undertake the cares and duties of the post I now occupy. But I must tell the hon. Member for Liskeard he has totally mistaken the motives which influence us on this occasion, and which are totally different from those which would regulate his conduct. The Chancellor of the Exchequer seemed to deride the speech of the right hon. Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Walpole)—a speech inspired, I believe, by as true a sense of patriotism, and characterized by as becoming an eloquence as any speech ever made in this House. The Chancellor of the Exchequer seemed to deride the possibility that we had any object in the course we have taken but to embarrass and subvert the Government. “If those are your views of finance and policy,” said the right hon. Gentleman, “it is your duty to terminate our Ministerial career, and if you are not prepared to do that, you ought not wantonly to embarrass us.” That was the argument he used. But, Sir, I remember the Parliament I am now addressing. I remember it is a Parliament summoned by the Queen under the advice of counsellors, of whom I formed one myself; and that Parliament, on its meeting, though by a very narrow majority, declared that they had no confidence in the then Government of Her Majesty. They had no confidence in our Foreign policy; they had no confidence in our Reform principles. What confidence the present Parliament has in the Foreign policy of the present Government, I will not pretend to decide. All I know is, that, so far as I can form an opinion, the affairs of Italy are in exactly the same position as when Parliament was prorogued in August last. So far as the Reform Bill is concerned, I confess, after the announcement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that the franchise is to be given to the masses, I admit that no Reform Bill we could bring forward could vie with the coming measure of Her Majesty's Government. But I think I have a right, under these circumstances, to say that neither I, nor my Colleagues, after that vote, are at all anxious to attempt to re-occupy the places we then filled. I may, at least, say for myself, that having for more than two years led this House in a minority, I shrink from the renewed anxiety and responsibility of such a post; and I would recommend no Gentleman ever to accept such a position who has any regard for his nervous system. The important office which the Chancellor of the Exchequer fills gives ample opportunity to his eager mind and his impetuous rhetoric. Perhaps in moments of solitary aspiration he may have wished to occupy the proud post of leader of the House of Commons, which no doubt he could fill efficiently. But from what I have observed of the right hon. Gentleman's temperament, I think I may tell him that it is well for him, however eminent his position, that he reposes at least for a time beneath the mitis sapientia of the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary and the calm patience of the noble Premier. Although, however, we are neither anxious, nor, perhaps, able, to disturb you in your seats, are we to forget our duties as Members of this House? Are we to forget that there is such a thing as the English nation, and that there is such a thing to fulfil as public duty? No, Sir! We are conscious of that duty. We will not enter into combinations and cabals to embarrass the Government. I have heard in this debate a great deal about what are called party questions, and there is nothing upon which there appears to me such confusion in the minds of men, and, of all men in the world, in the minds of Members of Parliament, as upon this subject. Sir, when a great political party chooses on on some technical ground and narrow issue to join with a section of their opponents and upset a Government, their conduct may be liable to great public reproach. I say “may be liable” because even in such a case combination might be an act of duty, if they thought that the general conduct of the Government was pernicious and they had the means and opportunity of rectifying it. But when a great party, on a question of policy, financial, commercial, or diplomatic, come forward to assert distinct principles, and to advocate an intelligible course, which none can misapprehend, and with which I believe a great portion of the nation sympathizes, to hold up such a party movement as liable to reproach is to confound the nature of things, and not to comprehend the scope and spirit of our Constitution. It is the duty, the noblest duty that can fall to Members of this House, to fulfil such a task. It must always be the lot of only the minority to be Ministers of State, but it is the privilege of all to have views upon political affairs, to support those views with eloquence in this House if they desire it and have the gift, but, at all events, in honourable combination with those with whom they have community of sentiment to assert with their votes their influence and their opinions. Sir, such is now the course which we are about to take. It is our opinion that the proposition of the Government is one pernicious, improvident in finance, not to say profligate—one that may lead this country to an extremity of circumstances this time next year which few can contemplate without the utmost alarm. I wish to see such a course arrested. I do not know what prolonged discussions in this House may not effect. I have little hope or supposition that by asserting our policy in this straightforward manner we can accomplish that object at present. But, in affirming the Resolution of my hon. Friend the Member for Essex, which declares that to add to a deficiency in finance is a proceeding to be deprecated, and that we ought not to disappoint the just expectations of the country by largely increasing the income tax, we assert a principle which we believe in and will maintain. Those just expectations I for one will not deceive, and to that country I ultimately appeal.

[Third Night.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, I am not about to follow the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli) either in discussing the details of the Budget of 1853, the causes and events of the Russian war, the affairs of Italy, or the nervous system of the right hon. Gentleman, which, however, I may be allowed in passing to say I feel great and unfeigned pleasure in finding to be in so good a condition. But I wish, even at this late hour, in a few brief sentences to recall the House to the subject which has really now to be decided. And I will venture to say that a more important question never was comprised within the six short lines of a Resolution, ample enough in itself for the decision of Parliament without mixing it up with the various topics, some personal, and some of a more general character, in which the right hon. Gentleman has thought fit to indulge in his speech. The Resolution moved is one of the most important that in so short a compass has ever been submitted to Parliament. It contains a decided opinion on two great questions—one relating to our commercial relations with foreign countries, the other to the development of our own internal resources. Either one or the other would have been a fit subject for separate discussion. The hon. Member for Essex has judged fit to put both together; and the result he hopes to accomplish is nothing more nor less than the rejection by anticipation, without any detailed discussion, the Treaty with France and the Budget of my right hon. Friend. That intention may be sufficiently gleaned from the words of the Resolution; and, if any doubt of it has existed, it has been dispelled by the frank avowal of the right hon. Gentleman. I shall not go into any details either of the Treaty or the Budget. The Government is about to invite the House to a discussion in which all the provisions of the Treaty may be considered; and we have to propose Resolutions in all the other parts of our financial arrangement. I now only wish to recall the House to the subject in debate, and to entreat it to consider well what will be the effect of its Vote. By the Treaty with France we have accomplished, in regard to our commercial relations with that country, what has been the object of many successive Governments and Ministries, what was the object of the Government of which the right hon. Gentleman himself was a Member. He has even stated that he should not have objected to put into the shape of a treaty the arrangements negotiated by that Government with the Government of France. The Resolution, nevertheless, which he supports calls on the House to do what will be equivalent to the entire rejection of the present Treaty. With regard to the Budget, and that part of the Resolution that deals with the income tax, if the House agrees to it, it will set aside summarily all the financial arrangements proposed by the Government. I will not deal with that part of the Resolution that refers to the additional penny on the income tax. I presume the framers of the Resolution do not wish to abolish the income tax altogether. But the latter part of the Resolution does dispose of the Budget, as the former part disposes of the Treaty with France. This part of the Amendment is advocated on the ground of the increased naval and military expenditure of the country. That augmentation neither the right hon. Gentleman nor the country has found fault with. Indeed, it has rather been forced on the Government by public opinion. I fear that no great diminution of that expenditure can be expected within any short period of time. Then to meet it I say it is the duty of Parliament to endeavour to increase the resources of the country by all the means by which they can intelligently be increased. And one mode of improving those resources is to increase our commercial transactions with that great country that lies at your doors. Those increased commercial transactions must necessarily add to the wealth and resources of this country. We are told, indeed, that this Treaty ought not to come into operation at once, because it was secretly concluded, and pledges the sources of the revenue of the country for a year to come. I have no hesitation in saying that a Government who could keep secret a treaty of that sort would deserve the highest censure of Parliament and the country. It is ridiculous to suppose that a treaty of that kind could be kept secret. I say that, if we are in a position in which we have to face a large expenditure, it behoves us to do all we possibly can to increase the national resources; and the treaty we have concluded with France has that direct tendency, having regard to the friendly and commercial relations in which it will place us with our great neighbour. But, more than that, the example which has been set by France and England will be followed by other countries, and the principle of free trade being thus laid as the foundation of the intercourse between those two great countries, will necessarily draw by its example the other nations of Europe into the same course. This Treaty will not only lay the foundation of a great increase in the intercourse between England and France, but will have the effect of spreading over the other countries of Europe those great principles of commercial intercourse which will lead to the prosperity and augment the resources and happiness of all. And when we are increasing our commercial relations with other countries, it would be unwise not to free the industry and develop the resources of our own. Surely, when we are pursuing that course which was followed with such signal success in 1842, 1845, and 1853, we are but doing that which it is our duty to do—namely, setting free the springs of industry at home, and by that means augmenting the resources of the country. I entreat the House not to be led away by any of the extraneous topics which the right hon. Gentleman has imported into this debate. I entreat you to consider the deep importance of the vote you are now about to give; for, by putting a stop to those beneficent measures by which we hope to lay the foundations of a great intercourse between two powerful countries, and to develop still more the internal prosperity of our own, the House, I think, will incur a responsibility which, upon reflection, every man who is a party to such a result will afterwards deplore.

Mr. Disraeli

Question put,

The House divided—Ayes 223; Noes 339: Majority 116.

List of the AYES.

Annesley, hon. Capt. H.	Codrington, Sir W.
Arbuthnott, hon. Gen.	Cole, hon. H.
Archdall, Capt. M.	Collins, T.
Astell, J. H.	Cooper, C. W.
Bailey, C.	Corry, rt. hon. H. L.
Baillie, H. J.	Cross, R. A.
Ball, E.	Curzon, Visct.
Baring, A. H.	Dalkeith, Earl of
Baring, rt. hon. Sir F. T.	Damer, S. D.
Baring, T.	Dawson, R. P.
Barrow, W. H.	Dickson, Col.
Bathurst, A. A.	Disraeli, Rt. hon. B.
Beach, W. W. B.	Drax, J. S. W. S. E. D.
Bective, Earl of	Du Cane, C.
Beecroft, G. S.	Duncombe, hon. A.
Bentinck, G. W. P.	Duncombe, hon. W. E.
Bentinck, G. C.	Dunn, J.
Beresford, rt. hon. W.	Dunne, Col.
Bernard, T. T.	Du Pre, C. G.
Blackburn, P.	East, Sir J. B.
Bond, J. W. M'G.	Edwards, Major
Bovill, W.	Egerton, Sir P. G.
Bowyer, G.	Egerton, hon. W.
Boyd, J.	Elmley, Visct.
Bridges, Sir B. W.	Elphinstone, Sir J. D.
Brooks, R.	Farquhar, Sir M.
Bruce, Major C.	Farrer, J.
Bruen, H.	Fellowes, E.
Bunbury, Cap. W. B. M'C.	Fergusson, Sir J.
Burghley, Lord	Filmer, Sir E.
Burrell, Sir C. M.	FitzGerald, W. R. S.
Carnac, Sir J. R.	Forester, rt. hon. Col.
Cartwright, Col.	Forster, Sir G.
Cave, S.	Franklin, G. W.
Closo, M. C.	Galway, Visct.
Cobbold, J. C.	Gard, R. S.
Cochrane, A. D. R. W. B.	George, J.

[Third Night.]

Gilpin, Col.
 Gladstone, Capt.
 Goddard, A. L.
 Goff, T. W.
 Gere, J. R. O.
 Gore, W. R. O.
 Graham, Lord W.
 Greaves, E.
 Greene, J.
 Grey de Wilton, V. set.
 Grogan, Sir E.
 Haliburton, T. C.
 Hamilton, Lord C.
 Hamilton, J. H.
 Hamilton, Major
 Hanbury, hon. Capt.
 Hardy, G.
 Hartopp, E. B.
 Hassard, M.
 Henley, rt. hon. J. W.
 Hennessy, J. P.
 Henniker, Lord
 Herbert, Col. P.
 Heygate, Sir F. W.
 Hill, Lord E.
 Hill, hon. R. C.
 Holford, R. S.
 Holmesdale, Visct.
 Hood, Sir A. A.
 Howes, E.
 Hubbard, J. G.
 Hunt, G. W.
 Ingestre, Visct.
 Jervis, Capt.
 Johnstone, hon. H. B.
 Jolliffe, H. H.
 Jones, D.
 Kekewich, S. T.
 Kelly, Sir F.
 Kennard, R. W.
 Kerrison, Sir E. C.
 King, J. K.
 Knatchbull, W. F.
 Knight, F. W.
 Knightley, R.
 Knox, Col.
 Knox, hon. Major S.
 Lacon, Sir E.
 Leeke, Sir H.
 Lefroy, A.
 Legh, W. J.
 Leighton, Sir B.
 Leslie, C. P.
 Lever, J. O.
 Lindsay, hon. Col.
 Long, R. P.
 Long, W.
 Longfield, R.
 Lopes, Sir M.
 Lowther, hon. Col.
 Lowther, Capt.
 Lyall, G.
 Lygon, hon. F.
 Lytton, rt. hon. Sir G.
 E. L. B.
 Macaulay, K.
 MacEvoy, E.
 Malins, R.
 Manners, rt. hn. Lord J.
 March, Earl of Maxwell, hon. Col.
 Miles, Sir W.
 Miller, T. J.

Mitford, W. T.
 Montagu, Lord R.
 Mordaunt, Sir C.
 Morgan, hon. Major
 Mowbray, rt. hon. J. R.
 Murray, W.
 Naas, Lord
 Newdegate, C. N.
 Newport, Visct.
 Nicol, W.
 Noel, hon. G. J.
 North, Col.
 Northcote, Sir S. II.
 O'Donoghue, The Packe, C. W.
 Pakenham, Col.
 Pakington, rt. hn. Sir J.
 Palk, L.
 Papillon, P. O.
 Parker, Major W.
 Paull, H.
 Peacocke, G. M. W.
 Peel, rt. hon. Gen.
 Pevensey, Visct.
 Powys, P. L.
 Quinn, P.
 Repton, G. W. J.
 Ridley, Sir M. W.
 Rogers, J. J.
 Rolt, J.
 Salt, Thomas
 Solater-Booth, G.
 Selwyn, C. J.
 Seymour, H. K.
 Shirley, E. P.
 Sibthorp, Major
 Smith, Montagu
 Smith, S. G.
 Somes, J.
 Stanhope, J. B.
 Stirling, W.
 Steuart, A.
 Sturt, H. G.
 Sturt, N.
 Talbot, hon. W. O.
 Thynne, Lord E.
 Thynne, Lord H.
 Tollemache, J.
 Tomline, G.
 Torrens, R.
 Trefusis, hon. C. II. R.
 Trollope, rt. hon. Sir J.
 Upton, hon. Gon.
 Valletort, Visct.
 Vance, J.
 Vansittart, W.
 Verner, Sir W.
 Vernon, L. V.
 Walcott, Adm.
 Walker, J. R.
 Walpole, rt. hon. S. H.
 Walsh, Sir J.
 Watlington, J. W. P.
 Way, A. E.
 Wolby, W. E.
 Whiteside, rt. hon. J.
 Whitmore, H.
 Williams, Col.
 Willoughby, Sir H.
 Woodd, B. T.
 Wyndham, Sir H.
 Wyndham, hon. H.
 Wynn, Col.

Wynn, Sir W. W.
 Wynne, C. G.
 Wynne, W. W. E.
 Yorke, hon. E. T.

TELLERS.

Jolliffe, Sir W.
 Taylor, Col.

List of the NOES.

Acton, Sir J. D.
 Adair, H. E.
 Adam, W. P.
 Adeane, H. J.
 Agar-Ellis, hon. L. G. F.
 Alcock, T.
 Andover, Visct.
 Angerstein, W.
 Antrobus, E.
 Arnott, Sir J.
 Ashley, Lord.
 Atherton, Sir W.
 Ayrton, A. S.
 Bagwell, J.
 Baines, E.
 Baring, H. B.
 Baring, T. G.
 Bass, M. T.
 Baxter, W. E.
 Bazley, T.
 Beale, S.
 Beamish, F. B.
 Beaumont, W. B.
 Bellew, R. M.
 Berkeley, hon. H. F.
 Berkeley, Col. F. W. F.
 Bethell, Sir R.
 Biddulph, Col.
 Biggs, J.
 Black, A.
 Blake, J.
 Blencowe, J. G.
 Bonham-Carter, J.
 Botfield, B.
 Bouverie, rt. hon. E. P.
 Bouverie, hon. P. P.
 Bramston, T. W.
 Bright, J.
 Briscoe, J. I.
 Bristow, A. R.
 Brocklehurst, J.
 Brown, J.
 Browne, Lord J. T.
 Bruce, H. A.
 Bulkeley, Sir R.
 Buller, J. W.
 Buller, Sir A. W.
 Burke, Sir T. J.
 Butler, C. S.
 Butt, I.
 Buxton, C.
 Byng, hon. G.
 Caird, J.
 Calthorpe, hon. Fred.
 H. W. G.
 Campbell, hon. W. F.
 Cardwell, rt. hon. E.
 Carnegie, hon. C.
 Castlerosse, Visct.
 Cavendish, hon. W.
 Cavendish, Lord G.
 Cayley, E. S.
 Childers, H. C. E.
 Cholmeley, Sir M. J.
 Churchill, Lord A. S.
 Clay, J.
 Clifford, C. C.
 Clinton, Lord R.
 Clive, G.
 Cogan, W. H. F.
 Colebrooke, Sir T. E.
 Collier, R. P.
 Coningham, W.
 Cowper, rt. hon. W. F.
 Craufurd, E. H. J.
 Crawford, R. W.
 Crook, J.
 Crossley, F.
 Dalglish, R.
 Dashwood, Sir G. H.
 Davey, R.
 Davie, Sir H. R. F.
 Davie, Col. F.
 Deedes, W.
 Denman, hon. G.
 Dent, J. D.
 Divett, E.
 Dodson, J. G.
 Douglas, Sir C.
 Duff, M. E. G.
 Duff, Major L. D. G.
 Duke, Sir J.
 Dunbar, Sir W.
 Duncombe, T.
 Dundas, F.
 Dunkellin, Lord
 Dunlop, A. M.
 Dutton, hon. R. H.
 Egerton, hon. A. F.
 Egerton, E. C.
 Ellice, rt. hon. E.
 Emlyn, Visct.
 Ennis, J.
 Esmonde, J.
 Euston, Earl of
 Evans, T. W.
 Ewart, W.
 Ewart, J. C.
 Ewing, H. E. C.
 Fenwick, H.
 Ferguson, Col.
 Fermoy, Lord
 Finlay, A. S.
 Fitzwilliam, hn. O. W. W.
 Foley, J. H.
 Foley, H. W.
 Foljambe, F. J. S.
 Forster, C.
 Foster, W. O.
 Fortescue, hon. F. D.
 Fortescue, C. S.
 Freeland, H. W.
 Garnett, W. J.
 Gaskell, J. M.
 Gavin, Major
 Gibson, rt. hon. T. M.
 Gifford, Earl of Gilpin, C.
 Gladstone, rt. hon. W.
 Glyn, G. C.
 Glyn, G. G.
 Goldamid, Sir. F. II.

Gordon, C. W.
Gower, hon. F. L.
Graham, rt. hon. Sir J.
Greenall, G.
Greenwood, J.
Gregory, W. H.
Gregson, S.
Grenfell, C. P.
Greville, Col. F.
Gray, Capt.
Grey, rt. hon. Sir G.
Grosvenor, Earl
Gurdon, B.
Gurney, J. H.
Gurney, S.
Hadfield, G.
Hanbury, R.
Handley, J.
Hankey, T.
Hanmer, Sir J.
Harcourt, G. G.
Harcastle, J. A.
Hartington, Marq. of Hayter, rt. hon. Sir W. G.
Headlam, rt. hon. T. E.
Heathcote, hon. G. H.
Heneage, G. F.
Henley, Lord
Herbert, rt. hon. H. A.
Herbert, rt. hon. S.
Hervey, Lord A.
Hodgkinson, G.
Hodgson, K. D.
Holland, E.
Hope, G. W.
Hornby, W. H.
Horsfall, T. B.
Howard, hon. C. W. G.
Howard, Lord E.
Humberston, P. S.
Hutt, rt. hon. W.
Ingham, R.
Ingram, H.
Jackson, W.
James, E.
Jermyn, Earl
Jervoise, Sir J. C.
Johnstone, Sir J.
Kendall, N.
Kershaw, J.
King, hon. P. J. L.
Kingleake, J. A.
Kingscote, Col.
Kinnaird, hon. A. F.
Laing, S.
Langston, J. H.
Langton, W. H. G.
Lanigan, J.
Lawson, W.
Leatham, E. A.
Legh, Major C.
Levinge, Sir R.
Lewis, right hon. Sir
G. C.
Liddell, hon. H. G.
Lindsay, W. S.
Locke, Joseph
Locke, John
Lockhart, A. E.
Lowe, rt. hon. R.
Lysley, W. J.
M'Cann, J.
Mackie, J.

Mackinnon, Wm. Alex.
(Lymington)
Mackinnon, Wm. Alex.
(Rye)
Maguire, J. F.
Mainwaring, T.
Marjoribanks, D. C.
Marsh, M. H.
Marshall, W.
Martin, P. W.
Martia, J.
Massey, W. N.
Matheson, A.
Matheson, Sir J.
Mellor, J.
Merry, J.
Mildmay, H. F.
Miller, W.
Mills, T.
Milnes, R. M.
Mitchell, T. A.
Moncreiff, rt. hon. J.
Monsell, rt. hon. W.
Monson, hon. W. J.
Montgomery, Sir G.
Moody, C. A.
Morris, D.
Mostyn, hon. T. E. M. L.
Napier, Sir C.
Newark, Visct.
Noble, J. W.
Norris, J. T.
North, F.
O'Brien, P.
O'Ferrall, rt. hon. R. M.
Ogilvy, Sir J.
Onslow, G.
Osborne, R. B.
Owen, Sir J.
Packer, G. H.
Paget, C.
Paget, Lord A.
Paget, Lord C.
Palmerston, Visct.
Patten, Col. W.
Paxton, Sir J.
Pease, H.
Peel, Sir R.
Peel, rt. hon. F.
Peto, Sir S. M.
Pigott, F.
Pilkington, J.
Pinney, Col.
Pollard-Urquhart, W.
Ponsonby, hon. A.
Portman, hon. W. H. B.
Pryse, E. L.
Pritchard, J.
Proby, Lord Pugh, D. (Carmarthenshire)
Puller, C. W. G.
Ramsden, Sir J. W.
Raynham, Visct.
Ricardo, J. L.
Ricardo, O.
Rich, H.
Ridley, G.
Robartes, T. J. A.
Robertson, D.
Roebuck, J. A.
Rothschild, Baron L. de Rothschild, Baron M. de

Roupell, W.
Russell, Lord J.
Russell, H.
Russell, A.
Russell, F. W.
St. Aubyn, J.
Salomons, Mr. Ald.
Salt, Titus
Scholefield, W.
Scott, Sir W.
Scrope, G. P.
Scully, V.
Seymour, Sir M.
Seymour, H. D.
Seymour, W. D.
Shafto, R. D.
Shelley, Sir J. V.
Sheridan, R. B.
Sheridan, H. B.
Slaney, R. A.
Smith, J. B.
Smith, M. T.
Smith, Augustus
Smith, Sir F.
Smith, Abel
Somerville, rt. hon. Sir
W. M.
Stafford, Marquess of Staniland, M.
Stansfeld, J.
Steel, J.
Stewart, Sir M. R. S.
Stuart, Col.
Stuart, Major W.
Sykes, Col. W. H.
Talbot, C. R. M.

Taylor, H.
Tempest, Lord A. V.
Thompson, H. S.
Tite, W.
Tollemache, hon. F. J.
Traill, G.
Turner, J. A.
Tynte, Col. K.
Vane, Lord H.
Verney, Sir H.
Villiers, rt. hon. C. P.
Vivian, H. H.
Walter, J.
Watkins, Col. L.
Weymss, J. H. E.
Western, S.
Westhead, J. P. B.
Whalley, G. H.
Whitbread, S.
White, Col. L.
Wickham, H. W.
Willcox, B. M'G.
Williams, W.
Winnington, Sir T. E.
Wise, J. A.
Wood, rt. hon. Sir C.
Woods, H.
Worsley, Lord
Wrightson, W. B.
Wyld, J.
Wyvill, M.

TELLERS.

Brand, hon. H. B.
Knatchbull-Hugessen, E.

House adjourned at half after Two o'clock till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, February 27, 1860.

MINUTES.] Took the Oath.—The Bishop of Bangor.
PUBLIC BILLS.—1. Dwellings for Labouring Classes (Ireland); Attorneys and Solicitors.

LABOUR IN BLEACHING AND DYEING
WORKS.—OBSERVATIONS.

LORD BROUGHAM said, he wished to bring under the notice of the Government a subject of great importance to the working classes of this country—the employment of women and children of tender age in the dyeing and bleaching works. He had scarcely ever read anything equal to the disclosures made in the Report of the Committee of the other House of Parliament, and in tracts which had been recently issued, having reference to this matter.
For hours after he had read the particulars contained in these documents he had been unable to get the subject discharged from his mind. He thought it monstrous that children of seven and eight years of age should be kept eighteen hours at work, sometimes for three or four days together, so that they could not be kept awake without resort being had to violent means; added to which they endured constant suffering in the limbs from excoriation, which it was frightful to read of, and too painful to relate. The Factories Act of 1844 had done great good, though all the benefits which his noble Friend (the Earl of Shaftesbury) had desired had not been obtained. He wished to ask his noble Friend, the President of the Council, whether any steps would be taken to extend the benefits of the Factories Act to persons engaged in bleaching and dyeing works?

EARL GRANVILLE assured the noble and learned Lord that due inquiry would be made by the Government into the subject which he had brought under their notice.

LAW OF MARRIAGE.—MARRIAGE WITH A DECEASED WIFE'S SISTER.

PETITIONS.

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON presented Petitions from the Women of Aylesbury and Inhabitants of Droitwich against any measure for legalizing marriage with a deceased wife's sister. He assured their Lordships that the strongest repugnance prevailed among the women of England to any change in the law; and the present petition was only one of many hundreds with which their table would be inundated should any such measure be again proposed. He believed the tendency of any such measure would be to destroy the peace and the comfort of the domestic hearths of England. The passing into law of such a provision would annihilate much social intercourse and domestic happiness, and would harbour jealousy and kindle suspicion, while it would be productive of no essential good to the community; and if it benefited a few persons it would be to the great injury of the many. He trusted that any measure which might be introduced into their Lordships' House for effecting a change in the law would meet with the same fate as its predecessors.

LORD WODEHOUSE said, that if the noble Viscount could produce no better proof of his assertion than the petition he had presented it would not go for much. That petition was signed by 300 women of Aylesbury and the neighbourhood. Now, he had a petition signed by 428 women of Aylesbury in favour of legalizing marriage with a deceased wife's sister; and they expressed an opinion directly contrary to that of the other ladies, for they believed that such marriages would have a beneficial effect, and were especially adapted to promote the happiness of families. He had also a petition signed by 145 ladies of Cheltenham to the same effect. If the result of such a measure depended on the verdict of the ladies of England he was confident that it would be carried.

Lord Brougham

THE LORD CHANCELLOR expressed his great satisfaction at the prospect of the ladies of England expressing their opinions on this subject, for it really was a woman's question. He believed that they would be against it by an immense majority, and his own opinion of the impropriety of any alteration in the law remained unchanged.

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON also thought it desirable that the opinion of the women of England should be expressed. He must own that the noble Lord (Lord Wodehouse) had aimed a very fair shot at him; but at the same time he could not help mentioning that last year he presented a petition with the same object as the present from nearly 500 women in the neighbourhood of the metropolis; and he thought this Session would not pass without their Lordships' table being inundated with petitions to the same effect.

NAVAL RESERVES.

OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE rose, pursuant to notice, to call the attention of the Government to the question of Naval Reserves, which, he said, their Lordships would acknowledge to be one of the greatest importance. He did not rise so much for the purpose of expressing any opinion on the subject as for the purpose of calling attention to the present state and condition of that force, and also from a strong desire to give to the noble Duke at the head of the Admiralty any aid in his power to carry out the necessary and important work in which he was engaged. Although this was not a question upon which their Lordships would feel any great degree of excitement, yet no one would deny that it was one of extreme importance, both as regarded the defences of the country and in other respects, especially at a time when the country was called upon to spend an enormous sum of money in time of peace, owing to the unsettled state of Europe. He thought it would be highly satisfactory to the country and of great service to the State if we had a force of seamen upon whom we could thoroughly rely in a sudden emergency for the defence of the nation. In the present state of Europe we were compelled to keep afloat an armament equal to the carrying on of a considerable war, and this too at a moment when our relations with our allies were of the most friendly character. It was well known to their Lordships that we had always possessed a Naval Reserve—that was to say, the whole merchant service, the seamen of which were liable by Acts of Parliament to serve the Crown in case of any emergency. These statutes were still in force? but public opinion had so anxiously pressed upon the Government the impossibility of raising a force by compulsion, and the facilities of locomotion both by sea and land were so rapid and extended, that the hope of raising seamen by impressment was almost universally abandoned; and although there was no intention of repealing the statutes, yet it was felt that they could not be carried out until too late, and until an enemy was thundering at our doors. Under these considerations his noble Friend behind him (the Earl of Derby) appointed a Commission to consider the best mode of Manning the Navy. The Commissioners made several recommendations, and in August last an Act was passed empowering the Crown to raise a volunteer reserve of seamen. This year a Vote had been taken on the Navy Estimates for paying this volunteer force, and the present was therefore a fitting time to inquire into the prospects and present condition of our Naval Reserve. He would not go into the question of matériel—that was to say, of steam ships and other appliances—but would confine himself to the question of our ability to man those ships on any sudden emergency. We had for some years possessed a valuable reserve in the Coastguard; and he would call their Lordships' particular attention to them in connection with a body to whom he would presently allude—the Naval Coast Volunteers. Those men had all served the Crown at sea for ten years; they were thorough seamen, trained to the use of all descriptions of arms, and in the highest vigour of life. They consisted of between 7,000 and 8,000, but not more than about 4,000 were now seamen, the rest having served in the Revenue service on shore. The Commissioners hoped that the Revenue service would employ more seamen, and that a larger number would be available for the Royal Navy in case of need. The next portion of the Naval Reserve were called Coast Volunteers. They were constituted by Act of Parliament; but they were very inadequate in numbers, and, although they might be valuable along the coast at the commencement of a war, yet being only bound to serve one year, they could never be depended on as an efficient body for all the requirements of military service afloat, and to the extent of 100 leagues from the land. The Commissioners then recommended that a force of Volunteer Reserve of 30,000 seamen should be formed, and held together by a retaining fee. They recommended that their retaining fee should be £6, but that £1 of this amount should be carried to a pension fund, to be paid after a certain period of service. The object was to renew, if possible, that Mercantile Marine Fund which was of so much value and importance in connecting the whole of the seamen of England together by a common bond to the service of their country. It was formed by a small contribution from their wages, so that at a certain age they could have a claim upon the fund to support them during the later years of life. Unfortunately, however, partly from mismanagement and partly from the small control over the seamen themselves, that fund had gone to ruin; but it would be a great object if the present scheme could be connected with a Mercantile Marine Fund, the idea being that £1 of the retainer should go to a fund enabling the Volunteer Reserve to receive £12, £18, or £20, a year, according to length of service. It was hoped also that the public would liberally aid a fund which was known to be established for so praiseworthy an object as the pensioning old seamen. The Commissioners also recommended that naval schools should be established at the different ports for the instruction of boys, and that one portion of the boys should be draughted off to the Royal Navy, and another to the mercantile marine. He earnestly called the attention of the noble Duke to these recommendations of the Commissioners. He wished to make an observation or two on the operation of the third article of the rules issued by the Admiralty regulating the admission of Volunteers, by which candidates were required to have served five years at sea, to be certified as A.B. The object of this, of course, was to get AB seamen. Now, there was no term so vague as that of AB seamen. One man might be good for one purpose and another for another, but all received general certificates after service. By proceeding on this principle of selection the probability was that when they got their 30,000 men they would find that a great many of them were not up to the mark. Why should it not be at once distinctly stated that there were certain qualifications which the men should possess, and why should they not be asked to show on examination what they were able to do? In this way they would be sure to know what description of men they were who presented themselves. Under the system proposed there could be no certainty of procuring good men. He had heard it said that certificates were even made matters of bargain and sale by the men. Then, as to the system of training, he thought it very inadequate. The Volunteers were to be a picked body of seamen, trained to the use of arms, well drilled, and made practically acquainted not only with the use of the great gun, but of small arms. The time set apart for drill was twenty-eight days in the year, which, by deducting Sundays and the time required for travelling, would be reduced to twenty-two—a time wholly inadequate to train and drill the men effectively. Now, they knew perfectly well that without an immense deal of practice no man could be of any great value in the management of artillery; and he feared, therefore, that if the country depended upon these Volunteers as being first-rate seamen, accustomed to artillery, and ready to fight an enemy, it would be deceived. He wished next to point out to the noble Duke that if they were not able to produce a better class of men than these were likely to be, they would absolutely ruin the reserve they now had. By one of the regulations, No. 151, it was provided that Naval Volunteers would be eligible for the Coastguard force. He had shown their Lordships that they might confidently rely on the Coastguard to the extent of their numbers. They might be called off their stations to-day and be ready to man a ship to-morrow. But supposing they had 30,000 Volunteers of the description he had referred to, and they had a right to enter the Coastguard service after ten or seven years, he was afraid it would be found that the latter would lose in efficiency. A naval volunteer might pass and not be a seaman at all in the proper sense of the word; he might be only partially drilled and trained—and, yet after he had been a certain number of years on the books he would have the right to enter as one of the élite of our reserve, he being an inferior man and unable to perform any of the duties that a Coastguard man now discharged. In this way the Coastguard force would be deteriorated. It was provided by rule 6 that no naval pensioner could enter that service. But there was a body of men, called short-service pensioners, men of good character and who had each served ten years on board of a man-of-war. They were now scattered over the face of the earth: but, if permitted to join the reserve force, they would be found a most valuable accession to it. At present they received a pension of 6*d.* a day, but by making a difference in their pay of from about £9 to £15 a year, the Government would attract an excellent class of men to the proposed force. There was at present a description of reserve which was considered of some value, but which he thought susceptible of improvement—he meant the crews of the eleven ships that were now stationed in the various out-ports for the purpose of affording facilities for drill to the Coastguard and Coast Volunteers. Those men at present never had any practice, for the ships never moved from their moorings; but he thought if they were sent to sea in summer much might be done to render their crews really efficient. There was a point of some importance to which he wished to advert. At this moment he was told there was a feeling among the mercantile seamen throughout the country that a trap was being laid for them in this plan of the Government. They imagined that when they entered the service of the Government as reserve men they were liable to be pounced upon at any moment and carried off to China or some other distant part of the world where we might be engaged in some petty war. He (the Earl of Hardwicke) was sure he only spoke the feeling of both Houses of Parliament and of the Government when he said most distinctly and emphatically that the end and object of the whole scheme was to obviate the necessity of having recourse to impressment; so that the seamen of the country, of all men, had the greatest interest in its success, and were under the strongest obligations to support it. He was satisfied that no petty war or political accident would ever induce the Government to break the contract they had made in this matter with the seamen of England, or to take those men from their usual occupations on any such enterprise ; so that they might rest assured that when they were called on to serve it would only be in the performance of that great duty of national defence which was incumbent on every citizen.

The Earl of Hardwicke

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, he was not surprised to find that the noble Earl, having acted as Chairman of the Manning Commission, took a considerable interest in the success of the plan in question. He assured the noble Earl that he did not in the least complain of any criticism or even censure which might be passed on a scheme which was still an experiment, and which was now for the first time being tried on a large scale. He (the Duke of Somerset) might shortly advert to some of the principal recommendations of the Manning Commission, and to the course the Admiralty had pursued with respect to them. The Commissioners had made several special recommendations, the first, and perhaps the most important of which related to the establishment of training ships for boys. On that subject two different plans were suggested. One was, that at the naval ports—Portsmouth and Plymouth, for instance—training vessels should be stationed for lads who, after having undergone a certain amount of instruction, should all go into the navy. Another was that at all the great commercial ports training ships should be placed for boys, some of whom should afterwards enter the navy, and others of them be at liberty to join the merchant service. When the Admiralty came to consider those two suggestions it appeared to them that they would have to do something more than place a vessel at each of the large ports—that they would have to attach to each of those vessels a small brig or yacht in which the lads should go to sea, and so have opportunities for practice in seamanship. Under the circumstances he had thought it would be well to pause before they adopted in the large commercial ports a system of training schools such as had been recommended. But, in the meantime, he had thought it desirable to try the experiment on a different scale,—namely, to have training ships stationed at Portsmouth and Plymouth for boys, with small vessels attached, so that during the whole summer the lads might be going out to sea, and rendering themselves really efficient seamen, and he was told that after a year of such instruction these lads would become valuable acquisitions to the Royal Navy. He believed that this would prove a right course to adopt as a commencement, and the Admiralty had accordingly decided on giving practical effect to it. Another recommendation of the Manning Commission related to seamen gunners, and certainly nothing was more important than good naval gunnery. The Admiralty had made arrangements for giving increased pay to seamen gunners, had appointed gunnery lieutenants and instructors of gunnery : so that they had taken some steps to give effect to this recommendation of the Commission. The Commissioners had reported that the supply of provisions to the seamen was too small, and the Admiralty, acting upon the suggestion, had increased the quantity issued to the men. Free grants of bedding and clothing were now also given, the practice having been begun by the late Board of Admiralty, in accordance with the recommendation of the Commission. Another recommendation of the Commissioners was that the seamen should be paid their wages at shorter intervals. That question required some consideration, which it was now receiving ; but it so happened that it was not a matter of pressing importance, because all those men who had entered the service during the present year had received the bounty, which, perhaps, met the views of the Commissioners, that an allowance should be given to the men at a time when they most required it. With respect to warrant officers the Commissioners recommended that certain alterations should be made, and that pensions should be granted to their widows. The Admiralty thought the propositions were just, and had acted upon them. So also with respect to petty officers,—they were to receive an allowance upon being promoted. An important reform had been effected by increasing the number of marines. That force had been increased by 2,000 men last year, and by 1,000 in the Estimates of this year, thus raising the force from 15,000 to 18,000. It was not desirable to increase the force too rapidly, because of the difficulty of drilling a large number of recruits, and he had therefore resolved upon effecting for the present a smaller augmentation of the corps than had taken place during the last year. He next came to the Coastguard, the importance of which force he fully admitted. That force had been increased this year by 500 seamen, and the number of seamen would be continually increased as the landsmen serving in that body were pensioned off. He had next to refer to the great question of the establishment of a naval reserve force. That reserve at present consisted of the Coastguard, of the Royal Naval Coast Volunteers, and the new reserve force created by the Act passed in the course of last summer. There were at present in the Coastguard serving on shore only about 3,200 seamen. In the district Coastguard ships about 1,800 more, making a total of 5,000 seamen fit for service at sea. In the Royal Naval Coast Volunteers there were of men who had been drilled and were ready for immediate embarkation in case of emergency about 6,600. It must be remembered, however, that in creating the new force many men had been attracted to it who would otherwise have joined the Coast Volunteers. The scheme of a naval reserve was one attended by many difficulties, and required the combined action of the Royal Navy and the mercantile marine. He had been told by those well acquainted with the commercial marine that if the Admiralty trusted entirely to naval officers to raise the force they would fail, from the suspicions that would be entertained by the merchant seamen. He, being desirous to avail himself of the assistance of shipping masters and of other persons connected with the commercial marine, applied to the Board of Trade, and the officers of that department had exhibited great zeal and taken great pains to promote his object. The result was that the Board of Trade, after having entered into communication with mercantile men in all parts of the country had drawn up a set of regulations, which were generally approved of by the Admiralty: but he had felt it to be, in the first instance, desirable to make certain restrictions. Thus he had restricted the entry for the present to able seamen. He had been told if he wanted 30,000 men it would not do to restrict the entries to able seamen. He admitted that statement; but if it had been announced that on a given day the Admiralty were prepared to receive all who might choose to enter—whether able or ordinary seamen—the number might have been too large to allow of the whole being drilled effectually, and the system might have broken down at the outset. He had therefore thought it best in the first instance to confine the entries to able seamen, and if they succeeded in getting good men the force would become popular, and they could take more volunteers as they were able to drill them. The liberality of the Admiralty and of Parliament had created the suspicion of the sailors. For many years schemes of a reserve had been in agitation, but the objection always was that the country would pay the bounty, but would not get the force. Last year the offer of £6, and to pay the men during the time of drill, was made, and the force, it was stated was only to be called upon to serve upon occasions of great emergency. He quite agreed with the noble Earl (the Earl of Hardwicke) that no Government should use the reserve, except in case of a great national danger or critical emergency. The particular emergency could not be defined beforehand; but before the men of the reserve could be called upon to embark, there must be an Order in Council and a special proclamation addressed to the reserve. Thus the men in that force could only be called upon to serve after a decision of the Cabinet, and under circumstances which made it almost certain that Parliament, if not then sitting, must be immediately assembled. Thus every possible security was given to the men that they would not be called upon to serve except in a time of some sudden danger or great national emergency. At first, however, seamen thought the terms were too good, and were suspicious that as soon as they had joined the Government intended to ship them off to China. There was no ground, of course, for such doubts, and as to China that was the most popular station just now. Indeed, had he had five times the number of ships to send to China, he would have had no difficulty in manning them. The new scheme only came into operation on January 1, and, despite its restriction to able seamen, the natural suspicions of the men, and the difficulty of all at once understanding the arrangements, he believed about forty or fifty were entering every week, and if that went on for a short time longer, the country would have the nucleus of an efficient reserve. The noble Earl had suggested that the reserve ought to be formed of sailors who had served ten years in the fleet, their places being supplied by bringing in other men. This, however, would greatly injure the efficiency of the service, for the men who had been ten years afloat were some of the best in the navy, and could not at present be spared. Perhaps, hereafter, this plan might be resorted to; but at present it was impossible to part with those men without greatly impairing the efficiency of our naval force; and it was moreover deemed necessary to proceed gradually, otherwise the country would be committed to a large outlay. Under the system he had adopted none were entered but able seamen and those who were likely to be really effective. It had been objected that men were required to be doubly approved, first by a shipping master and then by a naval officer. To some extent that objection was well founded; but if you tried to raise this reserve by naval officers alone the men would not join. It was found necessary to deal with merchant sailors by those to whom they were accustomed. The responsibility of accepting or rejecting any men must rest, of course, on the naval officer; but arrangements had been made by which the naval officer now attended along with the shipping master—so that, although a double approval was still necessary, only a single attendance was required on the part of the men. The noble Earl complained that twenty-two days' training was quite inadequate. The same complaint had been made respecting the twenty-eight days' training to which the militia were subjected. It was true that the Naval Reserve would not be made so efficient as if they were trained for several months; but it should be remembered that the country did not want to engage these men entirely, they wanted them for reserve purposes; they did not want to withdraw them from the mercantile service altogether; and if they took them for more than twenty-two days it was unfair to the interests of that service. He admitted that if they could give more days' training it would be an advantage; but that could only be done by taking the men for a longer period of drill, which would be objectionable. The expense would be enormous, and it would not answer the purpose, because they wanted seamen for seafaring purposes. To pay sailors to be kept on shore would never answer. If they took able seamen, he did not think it was impossible to train the men to the use of the guns, and get them into a state of considerable proficiency in the space of twenty-two days. He did not speak without authority on this point. He had applied to the authorities at the different ports, and he found that marines who had been in training for three weeks only had attained considerable proficiency. This objection, therefore, ought not to weigh with their Lordships and lead them to condemn the system. The noble Earl had spoken of the desirability of connecting the reserve force with a Seamen's Fund. No doubt, it would be desirable; but the Commission had expressed their opinion that the object aimed at would be better attained by means of a fund voluntarily supported. He (the Duke of Somerset) thought that, as these men seemed suspicious already, they would perhaps imagine that some further hold upon them was to be established by a compulsory payment. It had been thought better, therefore, not to mix up any such fund with the new force, but to leave it for voluntary adoption whenever a good scheme could be laid down. The Merchant Seamen's Fund, it would be remembered, had become bankrupt, and great distrust would therefore exist on this point. The noble Earl said there was at present no sufficient instruction for officers or men on board the Coast-guard ships. Every district ship, however, had one or two gun-boats attached to it, and during most of the year these boats were sent out along the coast, and excellent practice was thus afforded. There was great difficulty in securing all the advantages which could be wished for in this way, with a due regard to economy. If they had gun-boats they must have steam machinery, engineers, and superintendence, and they would be constantly liable to the expense of repairs. The Estimates this year were very heavy, but the chief amount was taken for men, and the more men introduced into the navy the wider the basis for a future naval reserve. He had thought it better to begin cautiously in the formation of a reserve; but if it continued at its present rate of increase, some forty or fifty men joining it per week, and if sailors get rid of their suspicions that they were about to be entrapped, and found that they would be called out only on some national emergency, he hoped before long that they would join it still more freely, and that if in a few months' time the noble Earl again called attention to the subject he would be able to enter into the discussion with more hopeful prospects for the future.

The Duke of Somerset

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, that about fourteen years ago he was a member of a Commission which had to consider the state of the Merchant Seamen's Fund. They found it in a bankrupt condition, through the miscalculations of those by whom it had been established; but the earnest desire of the Commission and of the Government which then existed was that the fund should be re-established on a better footing, and it was proposed to do this by the acquisition of certain funds which they could properly lay their hands on, to enable the fund to go forward and prove of advantage to the service. He, indeed, when occupying the position now held by the noble Duke, had gone so far as to conceive the design of a hospital for merchant seamen, which would show that they, as well as the sailors in the Royal Navy, were objects of the tenderest care and solicitude on the part of their country. As regarded the measure for the establishment of this Naval Reserve, he confessed that he never expected great things from it. He had always felt that persons would be disappointed who hoped by its means to be able at all times to lay their hands upon a certain number of men for service in the Royal Navy, because he knew that the men best calculated for the naval reserve were the men who would always be shipping for distant voyages, and were not at home when war was imminent. In point of fact, however, there was at such times in this country a reserve which had not been duly appreciated. People fell into two errors in speaking of the mercantile marine. Some thought that, in the event of war, the whole of that body of men, consisting, according to some calculations, of 200,000 or 300,000, would be available for service in the navy; while others supposed that no sailors would be available, except those who had actually engaged to serve. Now, the fact was this:—There was at all times in the United Kingdom a very considerable body of merchant seamen unemployed, the number varying according to the season. That would form the reserve force of Her Majesty's navy in case of war. It would become available in this way—

The moment there arose a reasonable apprehension, and long before a declaration, of war, merchants were afraid to send their course did not need re compelled to find ing unable to do so in y were of necessity

yment in the Royal of men unemployed at f the next war would han at the commences, because, in conse-
rrow balance between that of the French it at the beginning of ur convoys to enable their voyages; the na-londonborough

vigation of the seas by merchants would be stopped, and a great many men usually employed in the mercantile service would then be disposable here for Her Majesty's service. The same thing would occur in every part of the world; for the merchant would be afraid of putting his ship to sea unless he could receive a great degree of protection from men-of-war. Therefore the men of the merchant service in different districts abroad would be available for service in the Queen's ships in the same districts; and, even if the proposed naval reserve should fail, still he thought there would be that reserve which he had just now alluded to, and of which no circumstances could deprive this country. He must say that the account given by the noble Duke of the prospects of the Naval Reserve was a great deal better than he had expected; and, considering that the Admiralty had confined themselves in the first instance to accepting as volunteers able seamen, he had no doubt, recollecting how comparatively few were the numbers of that body, they might congratulate themselves on having established a system which would produce on paper a respectable force. He was, however, under the apprehension that, in consequence of the men being engaged in distant voyages, the number available in war would not be so great as he should desire to see. There was one thing he would venture to recommend, and that was the Admiralty should consult Lieutenant Brown, who was a perfect master of this subject, and would be able to tell them the number of merchant seamen usually at home at different periods of the year. He would likewise advise them to have at all times in their possession an account of the number of seamen actually in this country. The number, of course, varied at different times, but there should be no week in which the Government should not be aware of the total force of the seamen in the country. He congratulated the country on the efforts made by successive Boards of Admiralty to improve the condition of the seamen. There could be no doubt that the country had acted with great wisdom, liberality, and benevolence towards the seamen, and he trusted that the jealousies and suspicions entertained by the latter would gradually cease to exist, when the seamen observed, as they must of necessity soon perceive, the kind manner in which they were dealt with by successive Boards of Admiralty and by Parliament.

ORDNANCE MAPS.—NEW RAILWAYS.
QUESTION.

THE EARL OF POWIS asked the Under Secretary for War what provision was made for marking on the completed sheets of the Ordnance Survey new lines of railway as they were opened for traffic. The proposal might be carried out at a very little cost, and would be highly useful for reference.

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON² said, the course which the noble Earl recommended had been already adopted. Officers went about the country from time to time to survey different lines of railway as they were made, which were not yet laid down on the sheets of Ordnance Survey. The reports were sent to the office at Southampton, and when they arrived the plates were altered by laying down the lines. Of course it was impossible for the officers to mark the lines of railway on the sheets on hand, but the stock of printed sheets kept on hand was small, and there were few lines of railway not already marked.

House adjourned at Seven o'clock,
till To-morrow, Half past
Ten o'Clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, February 27, 1860.

MINUTES.] NEW MEMBER SWORN.—For Ennis, William Stackpole, esquire.

PUBLIC BILLS.—1° Endowed Schools (No. 3); Coroners (No. 2).

2° Administering of Poison; Packet Service (Transfer of Contracts); Medical Acts Amendment.

STATUE OF RICHARD CŒUR DE LION.
—NELSON MONUMENT.—QUESTION.

MR. HANKEY said, he would beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works when the statue of Richard Cœur de Lion, by Baron Marochetti, for the erection of which a Vote of £1,650 was granted last year, will be put up on the intended site? He also wished to inquire when the lions will be placed in Trafalgar Square?

MR. COWPER said, he must beg to explain that the delay had arisen from the difficulty which was experienced in getting granite for the pedestal of the statue from the quarries. Everything was completed with the exception of the pedestal, and it was contemplated that the statue would be ready for erection in about two months. He would rather answer the second question on a future day.

DUTIES ON FRENCH AND SPANISH WINES.—QUESTION.

MR. BENTINCK said, in the absence of his hon. Friend the Member for Tewkesbury (Mr. Lygon), he desired to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, as Her Majesty's Government, in consideration of their undertaking to obtain the reduction of the Duty on French Wines, have solicited from France the promise of prospective concessions in favour of this country, Whether the contemplated reduction of Duties will not confer similar advantages upon Spanish Wine; and, if so, whether Mr. Buchanan has received instructions to urge upon the Government of Spain the propriety of making a corresponding concession in favour of the trade and commerce of England.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, that the reduction of the duty upon Spanish wines would be precisely that proposed in respect to French wines. He had not, however, thought it expedient to instruct Mr. Buchanan to ask any concession from the Spanish Government.

CEMETERY AT CLAPTON.—QUESTION.

SIR DE LACY EVANS said, in the absence of his hon. Friend (Mr. Berkeley), he wished to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he has given, or intends to give, his sanction to the establishment of a Cemetery at Clapton, which is not only within the prohibited distance, as defined by the Burial Act 15 and 16 of Victoria, but adjoins a populous district; and, if so, what has caused the violation of the spirit and intention of the Statute to be advisable?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that under the existing law, there was a power given to the Secretary of State to prohibit new burial grounds within the Metropolis. There was a schedule of parishes appended to that Act by which the limits of the Metropolis were defined. There was also a clause containing these words:—

“That no new Burial Ground or Cemetery parochial or non-parochial, could be opened within the Metropolis, or within two miles of the same, without the approval of the principal Secretary of State."

In answer to the question of his hon. and gallant Friend, he begged to say he had not as yet given his sanction to the establishment of the burial ground alluded to. The fact of its being within the prohibited districts was not material. The question was, whether the Secretary of State should prohibit the establishment of the cemetery within that district. The Act enabled him to give his sanction to it if he thought proper. He had received numerous communications on the subject, and it was still under consideration.

WINE LICENCES.—QUESTION.

LORD EDWARD THYNNE said, he rose to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the Magistrates will have any control over Licenses to sell Wine granted to Confectioners, Eating-house Keepers, and others in towns, boroughs, or rural districts, and, if not, what remedy is proposed against those persons if they keep disorderly houses or harbour persons of bad character?

SIR DE LACY EVANS said, he also wished to inquire whether it is proposed to introduce any Bill during the present Session with reference to the general licensing system by Magistrates; also, what provisions will be made respecting the 15th and 16th clauses of the Budget; and what arrangements are contemplated as to withholding Licences from persons who may desire to avail themselves of the advantages offered by the admission of Foreign Wines, &c.?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Probably, Sir, the most satisfactory reply which I can give to these questions will be this general answer, that before I ask the House to come to any Vote on the subject of licences for the sale of wine in eating-houses, I shall lay on the table, probably in the shape of a Bill, all the regulations we propose to apply to eating-houses which have received wine licences, so that all who are interested in the subject may have an opportunity of understanding fully the views of Her Majesty's Government. But looking at the question as it stands, I should say that it would certainly be most desirable that Magistrates should have every facility given them both for preventing originally the granting of licences to persons of bad conduct, or those keeping houses frequented by disorderly persons, and likewise for enforcing the laws against them in the most stringent manner after such licences had been received.

Sir George Lewis

CHINA.—QUESTION.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: Sir, I wish to put to the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs a question of which I have not given notice, but which, no doubt, he will be prepared to answer. That question is, Whether he has yet received those Despatches from China which he stated to the House some short time since he expected to arrive; and, secondly, whether he is now prepared to say how soon he will be able to fulfil the promise which he then gave of making a statement to the House with respect to the views of the Government in relation to their Chinese policy?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Sir, I have received the despatches to which the right hon. Baronet refers, but they do not contain any material facts. I hope in a few days to make the statement of which I have given notice.

PUBLIC-HOUSE LICENCES.—QUESTION.

LORD FERMOY said, he had failed to catch the previous answer of Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, and he therefore begged to ask the right hon. Gentleman the question standing in his name—namely, Whether he has any intention of altering the existing system of licensing public-houses further than he proposed to do by his Budget?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, my noble Friend is doubtless aware that several years ago a Committee of this House sat on the subject of licensing public-houses, but the result was that the question to a certain extent was left open; at the same time an anticipation was created that legislation on the general subject would take place. Certain hon. Gentlemen, as you are aware, have proposed to legislate on branches of this subject, particularly on the important point connected with beer-houses; but Her Majesty's Government have not any intention of bringing in a Bill to deal with the question at large. There are some points which I do not consider as being included in the question of my noble Friend; for instance, all matters referring to the sale of liquors not to be consumed on the premises, I consider that it is open to the Government at any period to deal with; and, again, with respect to all questions of local restraint and regulations, I do not intend that my answer should apply. If, as I trust may be the case, the House should adopt, on the proposal of the Government, some plan for the extension of the sale of wine to eating-houses, under proper regulations, I think a very important experiment in connection with the tastes, habits, and moral and social well-being of the country will have been made. It appears to me that this experiment will require some little time to elapse before any judgment can be formed of its results; and the Government will not interfere with the course of that experiment till they have arrived at some satisfactory conclusion.

SIR CHARLES BURRELL said, he wished to ask whether, in the extension of the system of selling Liquor and Beer, it is the intention of the Government to go back to the old plan of allowing Grocers and others to sell Beer of a lower quality to the labouring classes? It was formerly allowed to be done to their great benefit.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The Government has no intention whatever of making any proposal as to the consumption of beer on the premises. The proposition is limited to the sale of wine: as to the sale of beer no proposition or suggestion will be made.

SIR CHARLES BURRELL said, he must beg to explain that the time he referred to, the beer was not drunk on the premises, but taken away by the labouring classes in jugs and bottles.

EXPORT OF COAL.—QUESTION.

MR. HORSMAN said, he rose in pursuance of the Notice he gave on Friday, of his intention to ask a Question of the Government respecting the 11th Article of the Treaty. He had reason to believe that there was on the part of the French Government a disposition expressed not to insist upon the retention of that Article. He now begged to ask, Whether any information of the kind has been received by Her Majesty's Government—he did not mean whether any official information had been made to the British Government [Cries of "Order."] He was only endeavouring to make his Question intelligible. He should wish to know from his noble Friend whether the report that such a disposition has been expressed by the French Government is true; and, if true, whether it has led to any communication between the two Governments likely to lead to any modification of the 11th Article.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, there had been a communication from the French Government, but not to the effect supposed by the right hon. Gentleman. It was rather one to the effect, that if any strong desire was expressed on the part of the English Government for an alteration of the 11th Article, the French Government would be disposed to modify it, but not to give it up. Her Majesty's Government had returned a very positive answer to the French Government that they had no wish to ask nor to propose to the French Government to make any alteration in it.

CUSTOMS ACTS.—COMMITTEE.

House in Committee, according to Order.
Mr. MASSEY in the Chair.

(In the Committee.)

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, that before the Resolutions were taken he wished to raise a point of order. On Monday last his right hon. Friend (Mr. Disraeli) had moved a Resolution on the Question that the Speaker leave the Chair; he thought that Question, as a point of form, should be put before the House went into Committee.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, the Question was put and carried on Monday last, after the Resolution of the right hon. Gentleman had been negatived.

DUTIES ON FOREIGN WINES.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I now rise, Sir, for the purpose of moving a Resolution with respect to the wine duties, which stands second on the list of Resolutions that has been placed in the hands of hon. Members. The first Resolution, as far as the Committee is concerned, was voted, in conformity with the usual practice, without discussion, on the night it was originally moved. Of course it is competent to any hon. Member, if he thinks fit, to raise a discussion on the merits of that first Resolution when the House is resumed and the Resolution is reported; I will not, therefore, detain the Committee by any reference to it. I will pass to the second and most important Resolution, on one of the most difficult questions of fiscal and commercial law that, in the course of my Parliamentary life, I have ever had to deal with. I will not at all conceal from the Committee the sense I have of the extreme difficulty of taking any steps for a reform of the wine duties. The truth is, that a system of very high duties, with its severe pressure, has continued for a long period of time, indeed through many generations, without any considerable variation, with the exception of Mr. Pitt's Commercial Treaty, that ever promised any essential change as to the access to the article of wine by the great body of the people. The effect of this system, combined with the peculiar nature of the commodity, which has a tendency in the finer qualities to increase in value the longer it is kept, is to produce a state of things so artificial and so exceptional that it is impossible to devise any mode of escape from it that will not be attended by very considerable difficulties and open to serious objections during the stage of transition. No doubt, when that stage of transition is accomplished we may arrive at a state of things highly satisfactory to the country, and, I trust, productive to the revenue; but we cannot take the very first step towards effecting a thoroughgoing change in the wine duties without encountering very considerable difficulties in our way. Before I state the method by which Her Majesty's Government purposes to attain the end described in the text of the French Treaty I will answer the question of which notice has been given by the right hon. Member for Stamford (Sir Stafford Northcote), as to the mode to be adopted for ascertaining the ordinary strength of wines, and the manner in which the scale is to be applied to them: I need not say we have no official data, properly so called, of the strength of wines, except at one particular point of the scale, although what is termed the alcoholic test, which many think a simple novelty, is in continual and daily operation, and has been so for a considerable time. The object of that test as now applied is simply to determine, in the sense of the British Customs laws, what is wine, and what is not wine. Any fermented liquor containing a greater amount of alcohol than 40 degrees is not admitted as wine in the ports of this country. We have no official data, then, on which to estimate the ordinary strength of wines, except for those strong sorts that stand on the border line between what is wine and what is not. We have, therefore, instead of referring to the Custom-house books, thought it preferable to collect a great variety of samples representing the general course of trade and the average strength of wines of different classes. I cannot call these official data, and they may be open to dispute, but gentlemen connected with the wine trade, and others interested in the question, have easy access to information of the same general kind. The operation of the test to which I refer has been founded on actual experiment, and the mode of making that experiment is as follows:—The wine is first of all subjected to distillation in small stills, which have been now brought to such perfection that they perform the operation in less than half an hour. The spirit having by this process been extracted from the wine, it is tested in the usual manner, and with the most perfect accuracy, by means of Sykes's hydrometer. Now I come to the different classes of wine, and the different rates of duty at which they are to be admitted into this country. A portion of the lighter wines of France and of the Rhine will be admitted at a duty of 1s. per gallon. The remainder of the lighter wines of France and of the Rhine will be admitted at a duty of 1s. 6d. A portion of the lighter wines of Portugal, Spain, and the Mediterranean will also be admitted at a duty of 1s. 6d. per gallon; while the greater portion of the Spanish, as well as the great bulk of the Portuguese, and a considerable amount of the Sicilian, together with the wines of the south of France, will have to pay a duty of 2s. I must in passing remind the Committee of the artificial condition into which the wine trade is thrown by the peculiar position of our system of duties. One effect of the present state of things has been that the practice has grown up of administering spirits to wine both before and after it reaches this country and has paid duty. To so great an extent, indeed, has this practice been carried, that it has become extremely difficult, in the case of wines coming from other countries than France, to ascertain the precise state at which the wine suitable to the English market arrives by the process of fermentation apart from the admixture of spirit. What these wines possess in alcoholic strength then must be referred to the strength they possess when they arrive in this country. Now, the reasons which induced the Government in negotiating the Treaty with France to proceed upon the principle which we seek to press upon the attention of the House in this Resolution, were founded on the considerations which

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

I am about to lay before the Committee. I can only say that they appeared sufficient to induce us to depart from the plan of levying a uniform duty on wine, which, prima facie, might appear to be the more convenient course, and to adopt that to which we invite your sanction. The grounds, then, upon which the Government were not so much led as driven into the adoption of a system of varying duties on wine are, in the first instance, that wine is a commodity which appears to vary more in its quality, considered as a product of the earth, than almost any other great staple product that can be named. That fact, it is obvious, constitutes a source of difficulty in the operation of a uniform duty, where that duty is extended to such a degree as to constitute a considerable portion of the price of wine; and, because we have instances in which the value of one quality of wine might be represented by a single unit and that of another by 100, it is quite plain that anything more than a merely nominal duty at a uniform rate would be extremely unequal in its operation. Now the Committee will see that we must resort to something more than a mere nominal duty, not only because we cannot afford to spare the amount of revenue which a contrary course would involve, but because the principle on which the duty on wine is levied is one which lies at the very root of half our indirect taxation—the imposition of duties on strong liquors. We cannot, for instance, dispense with the £1,700,000 which we receive from bonded wine, but even if we should deem it expedient to introduce wine into this country free of duty we could not propose such a measure, because the duties on brandy, rum, and malt produce £5,000,000, and that on British spirits between £9,000,000 and £10,000,000, all of which sums are raised on the principle involved in maintaining a considerable duty on spirits. We therefore find it impossible to fix a uniform duty on wine at a low rate. Neither could we adopt one at a high rate, unless we were prepared to sacrifice on the one hand that which is the essential aim of our measures, or upon the other to compromise the security of the largest branch of our revenue. We deemed it, therefore, expedient to propose a plan which should hold out the prospect of admitting to the British market the cheaper wines of the wine-growing countries at a rate not exceeding 1s. per gallon, and I wish to call the attention of the Committee to the fact that although that may appear to be a low rate as compared with the present duty of 5s. 10d. per gallon, yet in reality it is not so with regard to those wines. On the contrary, it may be fairly said that it is a sufficiently high duty to impose on the cheaper yet sound wines of Europe, such, for instance, as those which an English traveller is well contented to get when he sits down to dinner abroad. It is, at all events, the highest rate of duty which we think compatible with the extensive importation of that class of wine into this country, and which it would be desirable to impose consistently with a determination to give fair play to the fiscal experiment which we are about to make. Our wish in making that experiment is, to place access to the article of wine within reach not only of the limited class which now uses it, but within reach of the whole middle classes—of the lowest order of the middle classes, and even of the better portion of the working classes—I do not say as an article of ordinary consumption, but one which they may use on those occasions when they provide themselves with something better than their daily food. I lay it down, therefore, as a fundamental rule that the cheaper and weaker wines of the Continent must be admitted into the British market, if we wish to give fair play to the scheme under the consideration of the Committee, at a rate of duty not exceeding 1s. a gallon. I now come to the question whether we can afford to fix that sum as a uniform rate. I have already suggested that such a rate would, if adopted, entail upon us fiscal sacrifices beyond that which the Government have contemplated. That such sacrifices would have to be made is not, however, the reason why we did not lay before you a proposal to this effect. If it were simply a question of a loss to the revenue of some £300,000, or £400,000, or £500,000, more or less, I must confess, speaking for myself, I should be prepared to face any disadvantages contained within that limit for the sake of giving fairer play to our proposal. There is, however, a much more serious question involved in the matter, and that is the relation between the duties on wine and those which are paid on spirits. We propose that wine which approaches to the strength of 40 degrees proof spirit shall be liable to a duty of 2s. per gallon. The effect of that proposal will be that while we are proposing to tax British spirits 100 degrees proof at something over 8s. a gallon, we are about to tax at the rate of

5s. only the proof spirit contained in wine. In taking this course we are open to objection from opposite quarters. Upon the one hand those who look at the question from the point of view which the distiller is likely to take may, not unnaturally, say that we give undue preference to wine by taxing the proof spirit which it contains at so much lower a rate than in the case of spirits itself. My answer to that objection is, that although the proof spirit which wine contains is one important element in its composition, and one which we take into consideration, yet it is not the only element—that wine, in short, is a commodity which possesses characteristics which recommend it to the consumer entirely apart from this circumstance, and that, although there exists a modified competition between the proof spirit in wine and that which is embodied in the article which is sold under the name of spirits, yet that the competition is indirect in its nature. Now, in order to illustrate more clearly what I mean, I may observe that there is a considerable quantity of spirit contained in beer, and that, taking the percentage of proof spirit which it embodies per gallon, and then calculating the amount of malt duty which we levy on each gallon of beer, and comparing the amount levied on the spirits in beer with that which is levied on spirits net, you would find the alcohol in beer is much more lightly taxed than that which is contained in spirits properly so called. There is thus an indirect competition between the two articles, although practically the consumption of beer does not interfere with that of spirits. The alcohol which beer contains is only one of its characteristics. While, therefore, we have been obliged on the one hand to keep down the duty on the weaker wines to 1s. per gallon, we have, on the other, been compelled, by an imperative regard to fiscal considerations which we cannot overlook, to keep up the duty to 2s. when wine approaches to 40 degrees, for fear we should compromise the immense revenue, amounting to between £11,000,000 and £12,000,000, which we levy on British and foreign spirits. In point of fact, it will be found in placing the duty at 2s. we have placed it as low as we dare. It would be competent to argue that in order to maintain the proportion between the duty on the alcohol in wine and that on the alcohol in spirits the duty should be placed at 2s. 6d. on wine at 40 degrees; but the answer to that is that, after all the best inquiry we can make, the duty being fixed at 2s., there would be no fear of illicit processes or mixture that might be adopted to give the wine the character of spirits; while if we went above 2s. we should have had the risk of those processes, and therefore we are not prepared to make such a proposal. The Committee will, therefore, see that if we are to have a plan to meet the great exigencies of the case, it is, unfortunately, necessary to adopt a varying scale of duties. I say unfortunately, for no man feels more than myself the extreme desirableness of uniformity in the rates of duty, to avoid all delay, all vexation, all uncertainty in the administration of fiscal law. Well, then, if we are compelled by the force of circumstances to have a varying scale of duty, the next question is, on what principle should it be regulated? I am aware that some gentlemen have thought they could regulate the wine duties on the ad valorem principle. I do not mean to deny if that could be applied it would be the best of all, from the immense variation in the quality of the article, and the necessity of raising a large revenue from it. But the simple answer to any man who urges an ad valorem duty is this, that I do not think any Minister of Finance or head of a revenue department could, on the whole, undertake the responsibility of endeavouring to administer the law under such a principle. If, indeed, we had a very low rate of duty on value, it might be done, but that would be impracticable in our case, as I have shown. On the other hand if we were to maintain a very high rate, of 50 or a 100 per cent, then the temptation to fraud would be so great and constant, and the means of meeting it on the other hand so uncertain, that such a law would become impracticable. Very ingenious and well-informed gentlemen have endeavoured to construct a scale of this kind, and I have myself made it a subject of the most careful inquiries, in the hope of finding that it would be possible, but I am obliged, with others, reluctantly to acquiesce in the almost universal opinion—namely, that a scale of duties on wine levied on value, and upon a high ratio on value, would be found impracticable. The scale we propose has in some degree a reference to value, but at the same time a varying degree; on the whole, it will be true that the higher priced wines will pay the higher duty, and the low priced wines the lower duty; but there will be certain exceptions to that rule, because there are some wines, very limited, however, in quantity, both of the Rhine and France, which have a very weak alcoholic character, and at the same time, from their high flavour, are of very considerable value. But putting these exceptions out of view, the alcoholic test, as far as it goes, will vary very nearly according to the value of the wine. I do not, however, recommend it on that ground; it has been adopted simply from a sense that it was an absolute duty not to propose to the House any plan with respect to which we could entertain a reasonable fear that it would endanger the enormous revenue which arises from spirits. That is the ground on which this test has been adopted. Now, as respects the test itself, all these tests are open to a certain amount of objection, because they all entail the necessity of some practical operation; but Parliament, notwithstanding, has found it necessary to adopt the system of classification in some other cases in which it was by no means so imperative as in the case of wines. In the case of the very important article of sugar, for instance, the qualities are divided into three or four different classes, and these, not with reference to one single quality, but with reference to several, it is the duty of the Customs to combine together in order to ascertain the duty. It does not depend on one quality, whether sugar be recognized as refined, or white clayed, or the lowest brown muscovado, but on the combination of these qualities, depending on the grain, the strength, and the colour of the sugar. Now, I do not think the inconvenience here would be so great as in the article of sugar in this important and capital respect—namely, that the test applied to wine is fortunately a certain test. Some, indeed, have said that the test was inapplicable, the quantity of colouring and sweetening matter entirely defeating the action of the hydrometer; but by the process of distillation, which occupies only half an hour, we can ascertain with absolute precision what is the strength of the wine. We have, then, no fear of fraud, no fear of uncertainty, in the operation of the test, while, on the other hand, I have no doubt it will attain its essential object; and I do not believe, nor do the most intelligent gentlemen connected with the trade I have seen desire me to believe, that it will be attended with any inconvenience, except such as may readily be obviated. I have thus explained to the Committee a subject of a rather technical and dry character.

The essential object the Government had in view is the adoption of a scale of duties on wine instead of a uniform rate. There is another important point connected with the operation of the change we propose to the Committee on which it is necessary I should say a few words, and that is the drawback on wines in stock, with respect to which various claims have been preferred. And here I cannot state too strongly my opinion, which I hope is the opinion of the House—I am quite sure it is the only opinion really sustainable on fiscal grounds—that, as a general principle, nothing can be worse than to allow drawbacks on articles subject to Customs' duties, although there may be, I admit, peculiar cases when a very strong equitable claim arises. Supposing, for example, that you are compelled by circumstances to make rapid and frequent changes of duty, incessantly to interfere and disturb the course of trade, sometimes lowering the duties, sometimes raising them—as Mr. Pitt, after lowering the duties on wine in 1787, was obliged to raise them again enormously in 1795. It is not possible for a trade to stand the frequent recurrence of operations of that sort without being relieved from the immediate consequences of such rapid vicissitudes. But the way in which Parliament has dealt of late years has been of quite a different character. I am not speaking of Excise duties, where everything is carried on under survey habitually, I am speaking of Customs' duties. I beg the Committee to recollect what has been the course of our recent legislation. It has tended without exception to the mitigation and removal of duties. The effect of the mitigation and removal of duty, in every case where it is attempted on a scale sufficient to produce its legitimate effect, is to give great extension of trade, and uniformly the result is a profit to the dealers in the article; for you never remove the duty without in the first instance putting a portion, sometimes the whole, but always a portion, of the duty in the pockets of those who carry on the branch of business affected. Do not let it be supposed we grudge that; on the contrary, it is the legitimate effect of your operations; not only so, but it is the means through which your operation produces its fruits, for the increase of the profits of a trade is the sure foundation of the extension of that trade, and the increased supply to the consumer; but, at the same time, it is obvious that the direct tendency of this is to remove any inconvenience which otherwise would arise to dealers from alterations of Customs' duties with reference to their stocks in hand. First, because they have in the price of the article, apart from the duty, received at once a portion of the drawback, and in the extension of trade arising from the mitigation of duties generally more than the amount of drawback. The whole of these considerations apply to the article of wine as fully as to any other branch of trade whatever. Therefore, when your legislation has run constantly in this course of mitigation for a long series of years, I hold that nothing can be weaker than the claim for a drawback on the stock of wine in hand, apart from the very serious consideration that this stock not being under survey you have no means of checking the most intolerable frauds. It is perfectly true with respect to wine, more than almost any other article, that you increase its value by long keeping, and, therefore, if you look at that alone the possessors of stock which has paid the high duty would seem to be at a disadvantage when they are placed in competition with the new wine. But the value of the old wine does not depend on the duty. Those who are rich enough to drink the old wine, do not look at the rate of duty at all. That is completely absorbed in the character of the wine. The new wine introduced at the low duty cannot compete with that class of wines on any terms. The gentlemen who have been accustomed to their old port, their old sherry or Madeira, will not take the new wine at any price. I do not believe there ever was a time at which these considerations told more strongly than they do at present. I believe all those houses in the wine trade which send round their circulars to the public endeavour to make their prices attractive by their cheapness. I received one of those circulars myself the other day, and I was curious to look into it on account of the discussions that were likely to take place. I found that the circular came from a cheap house, but that cheap house offered their old port at 210s. a dozen. If their old port is now worth as much as 210s. the dozen it will not be worth a sixpence less, but probably worth much more, through the stimulus that will be given to consumption after the reduction of the duty. I would therefore impress on the Committee that on all these general grounds there is no just reason whatever for allowing drawback on any part of the stocks of wine on hand. At the same time there does happen to be a specific and partial arrangement on which a claim of good faith may be thought to have arisen. In the year 1839 or 1840 there began a negotiation with France for the reduction of the wine duties, which was continued for one or two years. Before that was well over a negotiation, also for a reduction of the wine duties, commenced with Portugal. That was followed by a similar negotiation with Spain. And the consequence of these negotiations, the whole of which were patent to the public, was a paralysis both of trade and of revenue. Under these circumstances the dealers in wine during the Administration of Sir R. Peel made an application to the Treasury of that day, and Mr. Goulburn, then the Chancellor of the Exchequer, although entirely objecting to drawbacks on stocks of wine in the event of a reduction of duty as a general principle, yet held that there were grounds, in the common interest of the revenue and of trade, for making a specific arrangement. His arrangement was founded on the belief that although drawbacks ought not to be given in the event of any purely legislative reduction of duty, yet in the event of a reduction which followed upon negotiation for a Commercial Treaty, it would be right to give some drawback, because the effect of promising such drawback would be that it would maintain the trade in a healthy state while the negotiations were pending; whereas he found by stern experience in the year 1842 that there was a great falling off in the entries of wine, and consequently in the revenue, owing to the expectation of a treaty. Therefore, the Treasury in 1843 passed a Minute, perfectly distinct and definite in its terms, the effect of which was that all persons might claim drawback on certain wines in their possession, upon certain conditions, in the event—not of a reduction of the wine duties, but of a reduction of the wine duties under treaty. The conditions in question are set forth as clearly as possible in the first paragraph of the Minute. The effect of the Minute is as follows:—That in any Act that may be passed on the conclusion of a treaty for reducing the duties on foreign wine provision should be made for allowing dealers in wine a return of duty on all such wine as may be henceforth cleared from the Customs, provided that a stock equal thereto shall be found in the dealers' possession when the duty is reduced; and provided that the wine so found, and in respect of which drawback is claimed, be wine which has paid duty within two years if imported from Portugal or from France, and within six months if imported from any other foreign country. During the year 1843 that Minute attained its object; it restored confidence to the trade, and placed it in a natural condition. So matters went on, till after the lapse of time all idea of a Commercial Treaty was abandoned. It is right, however, to state that in 1843 that Minute was not only maintained but extended; for an order was issued, with the sanction of the Treasury, by the Board of Excise, extending the terms to all the wine which dealers might have in their possession at the time of the reduction of duty, limited only by the quantity on which they had paid duty within the time specified in the Minute. The proof of the identity of the wine was no longer required. This took place in 1843. The whole matter then passed out of view, the negotiations for Commercial Treaties came to an end, and, I believe, hardly any of the wine-merchants or dealers conformed to the necessary conditions as to the taking out of duplicate warrants and other regulations as to their stocks till the year 1852, when this House appointed a Committee to examine into the question of the wine duties. At that period it was suggested that it would be satisfactory to the trade if they were permitted again to commence acting under the Minute of 1843, and accordingly new directions were issued by the Board of Inland Revenue, which allowed the traders to resume operations in conformity with its provisions. But the extension which the Minute had received in 1843 was expressly withdrawn, because the order of the Board of Excise, dated the 24th of July, 1843, under which the Minute had been extended, was expressly cancelled in the order of the Board of Excise, issued in July, 1852, so that when the arrangement revived it was revived on the original footing of the Minute of 1843, which was clear in its terms, and not liable to any ambiguity of construction. Therefore Her Majesty's Government found the Minute of 1843 in existence with terms perfectly definite. It is, indeed, quite true that the dealers in wine have now suffered none of the inconvenience that attended the former negotiation of a treaty. There has been no protracted delay, no publicity, nothing that has for a moment checked the action of the trade; but to avoid the appearance of anything that might partake of the nature of special pleading, I may state that as the Government find that a considerable portion of the wine trade have acted on the Minute as it stands, and are ready to produce their books, showing that they have so acted, we think it our duty to propose to the Committee to grant drawback to those persons who have conformed to the terms of the Minute, although, as I ventured to tell some of the gentlemen who came as a deputation to me in Downing Street, it appears to me that they enjoy an extremely good fortune, for I have great doubts whether they will lose anything at all by the reduction of the duty; while by the allowance of a drawback I frankly own I think they will in a large number of cases pocket the same money twice over. This, however, accrues to them under what may be deemed a contract, and therefore I trust the Committee will not grudge or scruple to grant it. As to any attempt to go beyond the terms of the Minute, and to claim on general or vague grounds a right to make demands on the public purse, that is no part of the contract, and is in my opinion justified neither by its spirit nor its letter. I therefore think it the duty of the Government to offer the firmest resistance to any such demands; and I shall call upon the Committee to support us in preventing any endeavour to get public moneys for which there is no just claim. I wish to reserve a separate question which has been raised, and which does not belong to the proposal I am about to make, but to the further proposal contained in the latter part of the Resolution, with regard to the final change in the wine duties that is to take place in future years. Thus far I have spoken in respect to the first portions of this Resolution, the first part being that which resolves that the wine duty shall fall immediately from nearly 5s. 10d. to 3s. a gallon, and the next part that which allows a drawback on the exportation of wine until the 31st of March next, and the third that which gives a drawback to dealers who have acted in conformity with the terms of the Minute of 1843. After that comes the closing portion of the Resolution, which provides for a further fall in the wine duties at a later date. It is proposed that those claimants who will now receive under the Minute of 1843 a drawback equal to the difference between 5s. 9d. and 3s. shall be entitled to receive a further drawback at the period of the further fall in the duty equal to the difference between 3s. and the rate at which their wine shall then be finally taxed. I do not wish to pledge the Committee on that subject by anything I now say. It appears to me that the proper time for considering that question, if it is to be considered, will be after we shall have voted that portion of the Resolution with which we are now dealing—namely, the part that relates to the fall in the wine duties which it is proposed shall immediately take place. I know not what course will be most for the convenience of the Committee, but what I should suggest, Sir, would be that in reading the Resolution you should have the goodness to stop—if no hon. Gentleman wishes you, as it is perfectly competent for him to propose, to stop at an earlier period—at the words “2s. 9d. per gallon,” which are immediately before the scale describing the alcoholic test. The effect of that will be to put at once to the Committee so much of the Resolution as includes the whole of the arrangement that will take effect immediately, and to postpone for further consideration the remaining part of the Resolution, relating to the final fall in the duties. It may be that there is in the Committee an idea like that which has been urged upon the Government by various members of the trade—namely, that it would be expedient that whatever changes are to take place in the wine duties should take place entire, and at once. The Government are well aware that there are various considerations of convenience connected with the course of trade which would be best satisfied by a plan of that kind. But the objections to it are, in our view, of greater weight than its recommendations. The first objection has reference to the revenue. I cannot doubt—and the best authorities concur in my apprehensions—that to make a change as great as from 5s. 9d. a gallon to the lowest scale here mentioned by a single stroke would be to inflict on the public revenue, in the first instance and for a little time, a loss very much more serious than it will have to sustain from the proposal as we have framed it. Besides that, I do not think that we could venture upon so hazardous an experiment with a due regard to the interests of the consumer. We must remember what is the state of the stocks in this country. No notice has been given from here which would induce the grower or manufacturer of wine abroad to make any preparation whatever for this change. He has never heard of it, he has never had any idea of obtaining access to the English market, or of preparing his commodity for that market until within the last few weeks; and the stocks in this country, although they may be quite sufficient, are certainly no more than sufficient, to meet the demand which will arise under the change which we propose. They are adapted to supply a demand which is comparatively limited, and although I do not doubt that the Continent will be able to give a considerable extension to the supply even without notice, I think, and I hope the Committee will be of the same opinion, that it would be very hazardous to make the whole of this change in reliance upon markets which have made no preparation whatever to meet so considerable an alteration. It may be a question whether the date which we have fixed for the final fall of the duty is the precise one at which that change ought to take place. That is matter for debate and discussion. At present I confine myself to urging upon the Committee that the entire transition which we intend to make is so great that it ought to be divided into at least two stages, and that a moderate interval ought to be interposed between them. I believe that those who, in former times, have on various occasions endeavoured to induce the House of Commons to sanction changes in the wine duties, have almost always, if not invariably, proposed to make those changes much slower ones than that which is now submitted to the Committee. In fact, our object has been to make it as rapid as we dared, because the inconveniences of a transition state are very great, and we ought to pass to the final or minimum duty as quickly as it is consistent with finding a supply adequate to meet the increased demand. These are the various points on which I have felt it necessary to trouble the Committee, and I therefore now beg to move, as a distinct Motion, so much of the Resolution as enacts the immediate fall of the duty to 3s. a gallon, and provides the amount and conditions of the drawback that shall be payable when that fall takes place.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

1. Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That in lieu of the Duties and Drawbacks of Customs now charged or allowed on the articles undermentioned the following Duties shall be charged thereon, on importation into the United Kingdom, namely:—

Until the 31st day of March, 1861, inclusive.

Wine of and from Foreign Countries—

		s.	d.
Red	the gallon	3	0
White	the gallon	3	0
Lees of such Wine	the gallon	3	0

With an allowance for Drawback on Exportation

until the said 31st day of March, 1861, inclusive, of 3s. per gallon on such Wine Exported or used as Ship's Stores, but that no drawback be granted on Lees of Wine; and with an allowance of Drawback to Licensed Dealers in Wine who have complied with the Provisions of the Minute of the Lords of the Treasury, dated the 7th July, 1843, on the Foreign Wine which they had in Stock the 10th February, 1860, on the conditions of the said Minute, at the rate of 2s. 9d. per gallon."

MR. H. BAILLIE said, he trusted that before the Committee agreed to this Resolution, more satisfactory information would be afforded to them of the mode in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer intended to supply the deficiency in the revenue. And in asking the question of the right hon. Gentleman he begged to assure him that hon. Gentlemen, who sat on the Opposition side of the House, had no objection to the reduction of the import and excise duties. They admitted, as readily as the right hon. Gentlemen himself, the great advantages of these reductions to trade and commerce. But they were of opinion that there was "a time for all things," and that this was not the time to reduce the import and excise duties when there was an acknowledged deficit in the Exchequer of no less than £7,000,000, and when the right hon. Gentleman was about to engage us in a costly and expensive war, for which he had not even given the Committee an estimate. The financial statement of the right hon. Gentleman was founded entirely on the assumption that, after the reduction of these duties, there would be a deficiency of between £9,000,000 and £10,000,000 in the Exchequer. He (Mr. Baillie) would be prepared to show that this deficiency must inevitably amount to £3,000,000 more; and, if so, the Chancellor of the Exchequer must do one of two things—he must either withdraw the proposal for reducing the duty, or else come boldly forward and propose £3,000,000 of addition to the income tax. Now, in what did the fallacy of the right hon. Gentleman's statement consist? He had taken an Estimate of only £500,000 for the extraordinary expenses of the China war within the year. It might be regarded as impossible to form a correct estimate of what those expenses would be; but from the experience of the past we could make a very near approach to the amount. The incidents of the Persian expedition agreed very closely with those of the expedition to China. The Persian expedition was fitted out in Bombay; it consisted of 4,000 European troops and 8,000 Native, 12,000 altogether. It left that Presidency in the month of November 1856; from the setting out of the expedition to the ratification of the Treaty of Bagdad on the 2nd May, 1857, the time was five months and a half. The extraordinary expenses of the war, not including the pay of the troops, but including commissariat and transport charges, amounted to £2,195,000, or, in round numbers, £2,200,000. The Chinese expedition, now fitting out in the Presidencies of Bombay, Madras, and Bengal, as the House was informed the other day by the Secretary of State for India, would consist of 7,000 Europeans and 5,000 Natives, together 12,000 troops, the exact number employed in the Persian expedition; but with this difference, that the proportion of European troops being greater the expenses of the commissariat must be higher, and he believed that in the first six months the expense could not be less than the expense for that period of the Persian war—namely, £2,200,000. But inasmuch as the Chinese expedition could not terminate in less than nine months, the cost could not be less than £3,300,000; and indeed he should be much surprised to find it so small an amount. Yet this was a charge which the right hon. Gentleman had altogether omitted from his estimate. He might possibly suppose that there was a prospect of getting an indemnity. If he did, he had better at once dismiss all such anticipations, because the last accounts informed us that the Chinese Government was in the greatest possible distress for money, and had resorted to every possible expedient to raise it. There was, therefore, no chance of its defraying the cost of our expedition. If, therefore, the French Treaty was expected to produce great advantages to that country, let them, as the phrase was, pay for it over the counter. But instead of doing that, it was to be paid for by the creation of a deficit of 3,000,000 sterling, and at the same time when the Chancellor of the Exchequer invited them to undertake an expensive war, for which he had not condescended to propose any estimate whatever. This was not the way in which the finances of this country ought to be conducted; and whatever might be the party feelings of hon. Gentleman opposite, he hoped that in justice to their constituents they would insist on the Chancellor of the Exchequer making a clear and explicit statement of the mode in which the revenue was to be raised,

MR. CRAWFORD said, he must decline to follow the hon. Member for Invernesshire in his attempt to re-open the general discussion which was closed on Friday night, although he regretted that he had not had an opportunity of expressing the views of his constituents on the Budget as a whole. He should therefore confine himself to the Resolution before the Committee. After the perspicuous and intelligible statement of the Chancellor, he had no difficulty in understanding the grounds upon which a system of ad valorem duties in the case of wine was sought to be established; but, speaking on behalf of the dealers in wine in the City, he could not express his concurrence in the proposal of his right hon. Friend. The alcoholic test was most objectionable; it would certainly be productive of great inconveniences, and would probably prove an entire failure. It was a very nice scientific process, and not a mere mechanical test, depending to a great extent upon the practical skill of the operator and the accuracy of his instruments. Nothing could be more probable than that, while wine imported into London might be found to contain 15 degrees of proof spirit, and so liable to a duty of 1s. 6d. per gallon, the very same quality of wine imported into Liverpool might, owing to a want of dexterity on the part of the operator, or some defect in his instruments, be declared to contain no more than 14 per cent of spirit, and so subject to a charge of only 1s. per gallon. Such cases, he was afraid, would be of constant occurrence. There was, in fact, the greatest difficulty in establishing a differential duty at all. The right hon. Gentleman had alluded to the case of sugar, but an ad valorem duty upon tea had been found quite impracticable, and in the case of sugar there was not only no more prolific cause of disputes between consignees and the Custom-house than the proper classification of the article; but he was informed that it interfered with the process of manufacture abroad, because the manufacturers were afraid if they refined their sugar beyond a certain point it would be charged with the higher duty. The question of drawback was also one of considerable importance. All those dealers who had complied with the Treasury Minute of July, 1843, were to be entitled to 2s. 9d. per gallon upon all the wines they might have in stock. So far good, but the dealers complained that early in the present month they were deprived by a Treasury Minute of the advantage of being allowed to protect themselves until the 1st of January next, by obtaining what was called a duplicate warrant. They complained that when that period should have arrived, and when the new duties should have been brought into operation, they would not be allowed the amount of drawback fairly due to them upon their intermediate payments; and he confessed that the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not altered his opinion that the dealers in wine were entitled to a sum equal to the difference between the existing and the proposed duties.

Mr. H. Baillie

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I have no wish to prejudge that part of the question.

MR. CRAWFORD said, he was glad to hear it, and he hoped that want of decision was the effect of the representations which had been made to the right hon. Gentleman by the representatives of the trade in the course of the day. He should like to know from the Government whether there were any treaties in existence the stipulations of which gave to certain foreign nations—Spain and Portugal for instance—the right to claim that their wines should be introduced into this country, without reference to quality, at as low a rate as the wines of any other country. These were the objections he had to urge against a system of differential duties. At the same time, he was prepared to admit the objections to a uniform rate of duty, and the difficulty of finding an alternative.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he wished to say a word on the question of drawback. He thought the Committee had better confine itself, in the first instance, to the question of drawback under the first change of duties, leaving the change that was to take place in 1861 to future consideration. He quite agreed with the Chancellor of the Exchequer as to the undesirableness of allowing a drawback, but he was afraid good faith would compel them to do so in this instance. He believed the dealers were prepared to abide by the Minute of 1843 as explained by the order of 1852. The case, as it appeared to him, stood thus. A Treasury Minute was issued in the month of July, 1843, with respect to the terms on which a drawback would be allowed in the event of a reduction of the wine duties. There was, however, some ambiguity in its terms, and an application was made for an explanation. The explanation was given authoritatively from the Board of Excise, which explained the terms of the first Minute, by extending the privilege of drawback, not merely to the identical wines that had been first pointed to, but to the same quantity of wines "being of like quality." It was true that the Minute of 1852 revoked that order, but it revoked it only to re-enact it, for it had provided that the wines for which drawback was claimed should be of the same description. He thought that faith ought to be kept with those who had acted on the understanding that the terms of the Minute would be adhered to.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he had no doubt that his hon. Friend (Sir Stafford Northcote) was in error as to the interpretation of his Minute. The Minute of 1852 was intended to revive the regulations for drawback established in 1843, which were all but universally abandoned, and when made it was communicated to every member of the wine trade. As his hon. Friend remarked, it revoked the explanation given by the Board of Excise. But his hon. Friend was in error in supposing that it re-enacted them. It laid down three conditions under which the holders of stock could obtain a drawback. The first was that there should be an equal quantity of wine in stock; the next was, that the identity of the wine should be proved; and the third was, that the quantity found in stock was equal to that which was bonded. The Committee would see that this third condition was merely an accidental and wholly unnecessary repetition of the first, and in no sense whatever removed the necessity for the proof of identity required by the second.

MR. BENTINCK said, that much as he admired the clearness of expression and oratorical ability of the right hon. Gentleman, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, his statement appeared to savour more of assertion than argument. The right hon. Gentleman stated that the mischievous practice of adulteration would be diminished by the measures which the Government proposed; but if he knew anything of the subject, and could trust the opinions which he had received, the result of those measures would be to produce an extensive adulteration of wines on the Continent with a view to their transmission to this country. It had also been alleged that the reduction of the wine duties would enrich the wine dealers; but it was the continental, and not the English wine merchants who would be benefited by the change. There was then but little chance of any advantage under either of those two heads. The right hon. Gentleman had spoken of the good faith to be observed with the wine-dealers, but he should also bear in mind the good faith that ought to be kept with those who paid the income tax. His great objection to the Budget was that it reduced the permanent revenue, without showing how the deficiency was to be made good, and he had never heard any answer given by the right hon. Gentleman to the charge, over and over again preferred, that taxes were remitted upon the luxuries of the higher and middle classes without any attempt to deal with those which affected the necessities of the labouring population. If proof were wanting that the system of free trade—if that could be called a system which was applied without a principle beyond that of favouring the interests of certain classes—proceeded without reference to financial inconvenience or human suffering, it would be found in the figures of the Budget introduced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer at the dictation of the hon. Member for Birmingham. The right hon. Gentleman, with surprising candour, had declared that the alteration of the wine duties would benefit the middle, the lower middle, and the better off among the working classes, but the claims and the necessities of the labouring population were altogether ignored. Gentlemen who called themselves "Liberals," or became members of that party in advanced life, were very fond of dwelling on the grievances of the working classes. How did their acts accord with their professions in the present instance? The hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) had told the House in substance that he had dictated the course taken by Her Majesty's Government, and that if they did not follow it out to the letter he would turn them off the Treasury benches. They were all aware of his power; they knew that he had only to raise his finger, if he wished to see them removed, though he, (Mr. Bentinck) for one, would rather that they remained in office till they drank the very dregs of that cup which they were offering to the people of England; but he should like to ask the Viceroy over Her Majesty's Government how he ever intended to come before the country again as the friend of the working classes, after having given his sanction to one of the most cruel and unjust proposals to the working classes which had ever been made in that House. The Chancellor of the Exchequer never condescended to go into detail ; he questioned whether he knew enough of the rural population of England to enable him to do so ; but, if he thought that it was possible to introduce the lighter class of French wines among the labouring classes as a substitute for their principal beverage beer, he would tell him that it was one of those absurd and visionary ideas which were not worth arguing, for the thing was utterly impossible. In the first place, they would not bear the carriage. The wines themselves were scarcely drinkable in France by any one whose palate could not relish vinegar, and they must of necessity be something less palatable on their arrival in this country, unless they were so adulterated as to be no longer the wholesome pure beverage contemplated by the right hon. Gentleman. Did they expect the people would give up their established habits to drink this poor compound ? The right hon. Gentleman had given a description of what he himself had felt upon drinking half a wineglassful of wine, which was evidently of a similar quality to those French wines, when at the bedside of a sick sailor ; and that description of the right hon. Gentleman's sufferings had been really sufficient to make one's blood run cold. How, then, could the right hon. Gentleman propose to introduce such stuff to our labouring population ? He hoped the labouring population would at last understand who were their real friends. [Mr. BRIGHT, Hear, hear !] The hon. Member for Birmingham cheered ; he was the champion of a very wealthy and powerful class of the community ; in 1846 they succeeded in passing measures that were most beneficial to themselves. In this Budget the same attempt was repeated ; it continued the policy of the changes of 1846. But now the hon. Gentleman and his friends had thrown off all disguise ; the great commercial class wished to legislate for their exclusive benefit. He hoped the Budget would be thoroughly discussed, and then, he thought, the hon. Gentleman would never again be able, by the power of his oratory, to make the mass of the people believe that this legislation for a class would be to their advantage. He wished to have an opportunity of discussing fully the Budget, and the causes of the immense deficit. They had heard a series of assertions as to the causes of it, and a series of assertions as to what the effects of the changes of the Budget would be. But they had never yet heard anything to show what the financial position of the country would be in the year to come. They had heard nothing to show that they might not expect even a greater deficit than that stated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It was all very well to exclaim, sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof ; but that was not a safe mode of financial legislation, and he should be glad to know when the Government would give the House an opportunity of discussing the points to which he had referred. It appeared to him that all discussion of them was postponed and staved off. He wished to know, in short, when the Budget itself would really be dealt with.

Mr. Bentinck

MR. FRANK CROSSLEY was glad to find that the hon. Gentleman had now become the champion of the working men. There was a time when a proposition was made to take off the duty on the first necessary of life, and the hon. Gentleman, instead of taking the part of the working man, did all he could to shut him up in the little island in which they lived, and confine him to the produce of it. The hon. Member said that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, by altering the wine duties, showed a preference for the rich class and the better-off portion of the working class ; but the right hon. Gentleman did not stop there. He showed them that the alteration in the wine duties would improve the condition of the working class generally, because by importing this wine there would be an extended demand for goods ; and that portion of the people who could not partake of the wine would get employment by means of its introduction. He (Mr. Crossley) must say that he had had many communications from his constituents in the wine trade, suggesting that he should support a proposition for a uniform duty on all wines, and his reply was that they were not to consider what would be for their individual advantage, but what would be for the benefit of the country at large.

SIR EDWARD GROGAN said, there were three points in the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer which the right hon. Gentleman had endeavoured to impress upon the House. One was that a uniform rate upon wine was an impossibility. He should be happy to hear from the right hon. Gentleman why he had departed from his principle of having one uniform duty on all wines, and yet proposed discriminating duties upon those of a stronger and a richer character. The wine trade were in favour of one uniform duty on wines whatever their quality, and had passed resolutions at their public meetings in favour of that object. He certainly could not understand upon what grounds the right hon. Gentleman had proposed two distinct scales of duties. When the right hon. Gentleman spoke of determining the different classes by a process of distillation, he should recollect that such a system would involve a period of about half-an-hour in its application, and that it would consequently entail an immense expenditure of time upon the officers of Customs and the other parties concerned whenever a vessel arrived with a cargo of wine. Such a process, too, would require an extraordinary delicacy of handling in order to do justice to all persons interested in the trade. It was scarcely to be expected that the present class of officers at the outposts would be equal to this duty. On the subject of the drawback, the right hon. Gentleman endeavoured to draw a wide distinction between articles that came under the Excise laws and those that came under the Customs laws. He (Sir E. Grogan) could not see any reason why such a difference should be established. He thought it would be most unjust to withhold the drawback from the wine trade when it was allowed upon paper, especially after the distinct promise held out in the Treasury Minute of 1843 in regard to wines which had complied with the conditions therein laid down. The right hon. Gentleman said, that a copy of that Minute had been sent in 1843 to every person engaged in the wine trade. He could tell the right hon. Gentleman that there was a great number of wine merchants established since that period, who had never received a copy of that Minute, and had not the slightest information of what it contained. Where was the justice of punishing that class of traders for the negligence of the Government officials by withholding from them the drawback which was granted to others? He trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would give further consideration to the points he had urged.

MR. WOODE said, the wine trade did not ask for any favour, but merely justice. They only wished the Treasury to abide by the construction which they placed upon their own words in 1843, and with regard to which no doubt had ever been entertained. The present proposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer merely held out a premium for fraud, because it was utterly impossible for the excise to identify wine so as to know whether it had been brought into stock within two years. For that information they must rely upon the statement of wine merchants themselves; and though honest people would make a true statement, those—and there were some in every trade—who were not particularly conscientious would represent their wine as imported within the two years. He trusted the Committee would be of opinion that the words of the Minute could not bear any other meaning than that the trade had a claim for drawbacks upon all wines answering the description in the orders, provided they had an equal quantity in stock at the time.

MR. MONCKTON MILNES said, he would remind the Committee that the question of the revision of the wine duties had been brought forward with great ability and zeal in previous years by Mr. Oliveira, formerly a Member of the House, without exciting the slightest attention on the part of the Government, and even very little on the part of the House itself. Although he had no very special private reasons for alluding to the assiduity and personal labour displayed by Mr. Oliveira, he felt it right to refer to the efforts of that gentleman, and to express his regret that he was not present in the House, because he had on those occasions, though perfectly unconscious of it, been actually sowing the seeds of this great constitutional reform. Though he (Mr. M. Milnes) agreed with the general principle of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's measure, there were many details with respect to which the right hon. Gentleman would find himself deceived. The alcoholic test, for instance, to which he proposed to submit all wines imported, was the very worst which could be selected. The effect would necessarily be to introduce the most acidulent wines, and to keep out those better productions of the Peninsula which would best suit the taste of the British public. He thought that if they were to have a regular wine trade with the Continent, they would be obliged to abandon differential and agree upon fixed duties. His principal object in taking part in the discussion, however, was to direct attention to the great injustice with which the Government proposed to deal with the holders of stocks of wine. There was something almost repulsive in making it a matter of strict legal contract. It would only be fair to treat the wine dealers now as they would have been treated in 1843 if the Commercial Treaty, of which there was then a prospect, had been carried out. The Minute issued on that occasion provided that they should be no losers by the Treaty, and he confessed he did not see how a distinction could be drawn between that and the present case. With regard to the identity of stocks of wine, he thought the Government should adopt a course marked by the greatest liberality. The Minute had died away, and the surveyors themselves had told dealers in wines it was useless to keep the stock-book which that document required. The Chancellor of the Exchequer would do well not to require the production of any formal documents, but to content himself with a passbook, regularly drawn up, accompanied by duplicate certificates supplied to the trade by the Inland Revenue, and by them transmitted to the Excise. He would not be a loser by that plan, while he would do justice to the trade. He spoke principally on behalf of the merchants who held small stocks of wine, the more important merchants having kept their accounts more accurately. The former had not been culpably negligent, but had been actually encouraged not to keep the account specified in the Minute of 1843 by those very officers whose duty it was to see that the Minute was obeyed. He therefore should move as an Amendment, without any desire to press it against the wishes of the Committee, to insert after the words "2s. 9d. per gallon," "or by such other process which may prove satisfactorily to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue that such stock has been acquired before the 1st of February, 1860." He would only add that the right hon. Gentleman would tarnish his scheme if he acted towards any body of men affected by it harshly or unjustly.

Amendment proposed,—

"At the end of the proposed Resolution, to add the words 'or by such other process as may prove satisfactorily to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue that such Stock has been acquired before the 10th day of February, 1860.'"

Question proposed, "That these words be there added."

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. CAYLEY said, he thought the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer would do well to adopt the suggestion of the hon. Member for Pontefract. He wished to draw the attention of the Government to certain articles which they appeared to have lost sight of in those arrangements. In the correspondence that had taken place between the noble Lord

Mr. Monckton Milnes

the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, Lord Cowley, and Mr. Cobden, he was surprised to see no mention made of an article closely connected with the agricultural interest, namely, beer, ale, and porter, especially as the taste for malt liquor was rapidly increasing among the French, and the consumption had doubled within a very short period; and it had been rumoured that the Emperor of the French had invited the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Bass) to establish a brewery in Paris. He thought the Government might have asked for some quid pro quo in reference to articles which had already engaged the attention of the Emperor at a time when we were asked to admit French wine at so much lower a rate of duty. If any one called for a bottle of Bass's pale ale at a café in Paris he was charged two francs for it. The duty on a thirty-six-gallon cask of ale was about 9s. or 9s. 2d., the douane 5s. 10d., making altogether a duty of 15s. upon an article worth some 30s., the cost of transit to Paris being 6s. 4d. additional. It was therefore clearly a prohibitory duty, and he thought that at a time like this, when we were making concessions as to the wine duties, the Government had been guilty of a very serious omission in not having insisted upon the entrance of beer into France at a cheaper duty. Malt liquor was an article for which the English were as famous as the French were for their wines, and its export, therefore, might be proportionately increased by a diminution of the import duties on it in foreign countries. At a time, too, when our import duties on foreign wines were to be so much diminished, it was only just that the malt tax should be reduced or abolished. A recent return showed that the increased consumption per head of various articles of importation had gone along with the reduction of the duties upon them. There had been, for instance, two reductions [MR. BRIGHT: Three reductions.] —Well, three reductions in the duty on French wines since 1820, and the result was that the consumption had been doubled. There had been also considerable reductions in the duties on tea, coffee, and sugar, and the consumption of those articles had likewise greatly increased. There had been, however, only a slight reduction in the duty on malt, and consequently the consumption of that article per head had remained virtually stationary. The manufacture of malt was also cruelly hampered by the vexatious and inquisitorial proceedings of the Excise at every stage, and the heavy penalties attached to any breach of their regulations. He would like to ask the hon. Member for Birmingham, supposing Lancashire to be a cotton-growing as well as a cotton-manufacturing country, what would be the condition of mind of a man even as pacific as himself if he had to pay a tax of 50 per cent upon cotton twist, and was plagued and harassed at every stage of its manufacture by the exciseman? In his (Mr. Cayley's) belief, were such the case, half the manufacturing body of that country would be in custody for assaults on the Excise, and the other half in Bedlam before three months were expired. In conclusion, he begged to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether any reference had been made to the article of English beer during the negotiation of the Treaty with France? and if so, whether there was any probability of our being allowed to introduce that article into France at a cheaper rate at a moment when, so far as he could learn, the people of that country were so much disposed to consume it; and when in this country we were to be tempted and invited by a great fall in the duties to be such largely increased consumers of French wine?

MR. DODSON remarked, that the present duty upon French wine in England and the duty upon English beer in France were almost equivalent, being from a fourth to a fifth of the value of the article imported, and that therefore the reduction of the one ought to follow the reduction of the other. He was of opinion also that to make a reduction in the duty upon French wines, without also making a reduction of the duty upon the materials of English beer, was overstepping the principle of free trade. The effect of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's proposition was to establish a protection in favour of the foreigner as against the home producer. The right hon. Gentleman had exaggerated the prosperity of the agricultural classes in his statement a few evenings previously. He had assumed that landlords were getting increased rents because the produce of schedule A had considerably increased; but this was, in fact, owing to the landlords having invested more capital in the land, and the tendency having been of late years to throw small farms into large ones, a greater area came under the operation of the income tax, and thereby increased the receipts without supposing that the farmers were making greater profits than in former years.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER remarked that, so far from there not being discussion enough on these matters, as the hon. Member for Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck) had feared, the discussion was taking almost too wide a range. He must decline to enter into the variety of subjects which the hon. Member for Inverness (Mr. H. Baillie) had opened up. Such topics as that of the finances of 1861, and that of the propriety of the Government Estimates for the military expedition to China, might be discussed at some fitter opportunity than in Committee on a particular Vote about the Customs Acts. The last two speakers had introduced a question more germane to the business. It was inquired, first, whether the Government had paid any attention to the case of English beer admitted into France, and it was complained that nothing had been done for this; and also that sufficient consideration was not given to the charges on the production of English beer, in the shape of malt and hop duty. In answer to that he would state that he did not think that in the official correspondence there was any mention of English beer, and no particular instructions were given to include it in the negotiations. They did not stipulate, or stickle, or fight for it. That was not conformable to the nature of the transaction in which they were engaged. Had they endeavoured to weigh matters in opposite scales, according to the old fashion of commercial treaties, they must have broken down altogether, and they would have deserved to break down, and the good they hoped the Treaty would realize would not have taken place. But there were reasons for not insisting on that particular article of beer. If they had founded a demand that France should reduce the duty on English beer, upon the ground of the duty on French wine being reduced by England, France would have naturally demanded what amount of duty are you going to lay on French wine. But France would then have come to a conclusion enormously different from that of the hon. Gentleman who said just now, that we levied the same duty on wine that France did on beer. On certain select qualities of wine, representing perhaps a thousandth part of the vintage of France, on the very finest and choicest, the incidence of our duty might be as the hon. Gentleman had stated; but that had nothing whatever to do with the general relation between our duty and the wines of France. Taking the lowest of the French wines that came in now, the hon. Gentleman was quite in error as to the proportion between the duty and their value. The other day some French wine, very sound and palatable wine, was sent to him (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) by a gentleman, who informed him that he had paid 12s. duty on it, and that he was selling it retail in London at 26s. a dozen. Here there was a duty of 100 per cent, but even in this case the article was of a fine quality, and not a fair specimen of the common French wines. The duty on such French wine as that, however, when reduced as much as the Government proposed to reduce it, would still be 20 or 25 per cent on its value. Now, the duty on English beer in France, which he hoped would be reduced, and which the Government would try to reduce if they could, was at this moment considerably less in proportion to the value of the article. When the Government should have carried into effect the whole of their proposed changes with regard to French wines, they would still continue to levy on all except the very finest a duty considerably greater than France levied on our beer. The duty in France on English beer was, according to the best estimate he could make, something less than 2½d. a gallon, or two-fifths of a penny, which was, as nearly as possible, 18 per cent on the value of English beer. That did not make out a very strong case against France on the question of wine and beer. Then the hon. Gentleman raised another question, as to the relation between the malt and hop duty levied in England and the duty which was to be levied on French wine. He (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) agreed that it would be highly inexpedient and unfair to levy a higher duty on beer, that is, on the malt of our own soil, than we levied on the wine coming from abroad; but this was by no means the case. According to his estimate of the present incidence of the malt duty it could not fairly be stated at more than 15 per cent on the value of the manufactured article, namely, beer. With respect to the wine duty, on the other hand, a fair estimate would make it 40 or 50 per cent, or even 100 per cent, and upwards. He did not mean on the expensive kinds of wine, for he would admit that on those the duty would be light; and even now it was not extraordinarily heavy. It was, however, practically impossible to observe the distinctions between the different kinds so as to tax each kind in exact relation to its value. But with respect to those very fine kinds of wine, they obviously would not come into the slightest competition with beer, which paid hop and malt duties. The competition which beer would have to sustain with wine, if it really had any such competition to sustain, must be with the lower kinds of wine, and the latter would still be much more heavily taxed, in proportion to their value than beer itself was. The hon. Member for Dublin (Sir E. Grogan) had asked why, if the graduated scale was good, it should not be applied immediately. At present there was an uniform duty, and it was proposed to keep an intermediate duty for so very short a period, that it would not be necessary or practicable to substitute the graduated scale for cheaper wines, instead of the simpler uniform rate, until that short intermediate period was over. The same hon. Member had said he could see no difference between the claims of those who dealt in goods that paid a customs duty and those who dealt in excisable goods, as to the return of the duty. He (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) was surprised to hear that doctrine, which if it were to be applied to the operations of any year when customs duties were greatly reduced would require a million and a half or a couple of millions to be provided, to repay all those who had introduced goods liable to the customs duty. But he denied the justice of the principle of drawbacks generally in the circumstances under which our legislation had proceeded for a number of years past. If, however, drawbacks were to be allowed in some cases, it must obviously be in cases where a supervision had been kept over the goods until the time when the drawback was paid, and where consequently some means of absolutely identifying the goods existed. Now those means were supplied by the excise surveys, but with customable goods there were no such means whatever. It might be said, indeed, that wine was not an excisable commodity, and it was not; but wine, by the Treasury Minute, was for a certain purpose set down as an excisable commodity; and the stocks of the wine merchants were thus made subject to surveys and inspection, on purpose that, if ever a claim to drawback arose, it might be dealt with in the same manner as an article of excise. Now, a variety of propositions had been made, and his hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract (Mr. M. Milnes) proposed that we should entirely throw overboard all consideration of the distinction between customable and excisable commoditiea. He must, however, be aware that the Government had lost sight of the great bulk of the stocks of wine, and knew nothing of them, either as to the time when the duties upon them were paid, or whether they had been paid at all. Yet, his hon. Friend proposed that the Government should deal with all of them alike, and say to every man in the country who had got wine, "We will return you the amount of the duty on your stock." He could not call the proposal of the hon. Member for Pontefract generous; he called it foolish and extravagant. It would be dealing with the public revenue in a way which the House would never dream of sanctioning. The hon. Gentleman did not say whence he proposed to supply the deficiency that his suggestion, if adopted, would entail. The hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck) might legitimately address to the hon. Member for Pontefract a pertinent inquiry as to what amount of additional burden he meant to impose on the community in order to give effect to his liberal-minded scheme. There was not the slightest case for the return of a single farthing beyond what was due under the specific terms of the contract. There was no loss to be inflicted on the wine trade. The wine trade were too open and ingenuous to make a secret of this matter. They recognized the enormous benefit of the proposed reduction of the duties, and there could be no doubt that prices would be acted upon by the stimulus which the change would create. The Treasury Minute of 1843, with regard to drawback, to which his hon. Friend had referred, was perfectly clear and explicit. No one who read could put upon it two constructions. True, a supplementary letter was added; but it did not attempt to explain the Minute, which needed no explanation: it altered and enlarged it, and so changed its whole basis. The original Minute was confined to the case of a reduction of duty under treaty; whereas the letter made no reference whatever to treaty, but recognized the claim entirely apart from it. That letter was most carelessly and loosely expressed—a defect very rarely to be found in any document emanating from the Inland Revenue Department. No doubt, if that document had been allowed to remain, the Government would have been bound to stand by the consequence of the negligence displayed in its preparation; but the question was subsequently reconsidered, and the letter was duly cancelled and revoked, notice being given to the trade of its revocation. The minute then reassumed its original shape, and by its terms the Government proposed to stand. The proposition of the hon. Member for Pontefract was not only unprecedented, but was one which it was totally impossible to carry into effect. It would cost the country half a million or a million, and, if adopted, the hon. Gentleman should take the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer, and meet the deficiency that his own measure would occasion.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

MR. MONCKTON MILNES said, he should have submitted to the superior judgment of the right hon. Gentleman if he had proved the proposal he had made to be impracticable. His suggestion was that the money should be returned only when the Commissioners of Inland Revenue had satisfactorily ascertained that the stocks had paid the extra duty. The right hon. Gentleman was entirely mistaken in saying that these wine merchants would not be losers, and it would be unjust to give this favour to those traders who had adhered to the letter of the contract, while it was refused to those who had fulfilled its spirit. Two courses were open to the Chancellor of the Exchequer—namely, either to do summary injustice by refusing the drawback to all, or to do plain and simple justice by acceding to his proposal. He thought the wine dealers had established a very strong case, and if he saw that the feeling of the Committee was with him, he should take the sense of hon. Members on the question.

MR. BALL maintained that the subject of the malt-tax was immediately connected with the question before the Committee. He regretted that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who showed so much courtesy and favour to all the other claimants upon his consideration, invariably resisted every appeal made to him on behalf of the agricultural interest. The right hon. Gentleman had given no answer to his hon. Friend (Mr. Cayley). No classes had been so severely treated as the British farmers and maltsters had been with respect to the duties on malt. The interests of the working classes also were deeply injured by that duty, interfering, as it did, with the demand for their labour. The Excise system, particularly with reference to the taking of security from those who wished to malt, also operated most oppressively. Hon. Gentlemen opposite never failed to taunt the Protectionists with the success of free trade. He had bowed to the decision of the House on that subject, but he was not afraid to avow that he still held the principles he had professed of old. Free trade had failed to realize three of its greatest promises. It had not given the poor man a cheaper loaf than he had before, and in this respect it had deceived and betrayed him. Then, it was said there would be an end of those fluctuations of prices which had prevailed under protection, whereas, prices had fluctuated more under free trade than under the eight or ten preceding years. The third promise had been just as delusive. The Free-traders said, "Only let us have trade unshackled and we shall never have war again." He believed that this Budget would break many a man's heart who had cheered on the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) in his contest for free trade. There had never been a general trial of free trade before, and many tradesmen and others who never sympathized with the agriculturists would find out whether free trade was a boon or not. Hon. Gentlemen opposite, after they had given free trade to the agriculturists, tried their hands with the shipping interest, and brought down the value of shipping property not less than 30 per cent. He intended to divide the House to-night, for it was of no use to ask for justice to the agriculturists after the wine resolution had passed. There was no party so oppressed as the agriculturists, and he asked for relief for them in the shape of malt duty. If the cotton manufacturers suffered the same vexatious interference as the maltsters in carrying on their trade, the roof of that House would fly off with the eloquence of the hon. Member for Birmingham. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was going to allow the foreigner for the first time to introduce malt. This would encourage him to cultivate the growth of barley, and thereby damage the barley growers at home. At present the malting trade was almost a monopoly. The London brewers were men of great wealth. They had agents in every market with unlimited capital, and this gave them the pick of the market, so that they bought all the better qualities of the barley. Another class of maltsters were men who bought the second quality of barley with their own capital. A certain time was necessary for making it into malt, and the usage had been to allow the maltsters some weeks' credit for the payment of the duty. The right hon. Gentleman was not aware of the evils that would flow from his proposals in regard to this branch of trade. Last year there was a good deal of inferior barley grown in Sussex and Norfolk, which the great brewers would not have. The maltsters, who found their own capital, were able to take such barley if the Government gave them a little time, and thereby they benefited the farmer. The fact was that the whole Budget was an abomination—a hodge-podge. The morality of the Budget was this—

Mr. Ball

"You rob Peter to pay Paul,
You tax the Briton to bribe the Gaul."

Mr. BASS observed that he feared that the anticipation of the Chancellor of the Exchequer as to the extended consumption of cheap wine would not be fulfilled. He (Mr. Bass) was prepared to make a great sacrifice in order to enable the Emperor of the French to induce his subjects to adopt free trade principles; he thought it as well to subsidize France by a Treaty of this kind as in any other way, but he did not think, looking at the circumstances of the wine trade for the last two or three years, that France would derive much benefit from this particular article of the Treaty. In 1857, after a very good vintage, the preceding one being a very fair one, France had imported from Spain upwards of 12,000,000 of gallons of wine—nearly twice as much as we consumed in a year. It followed, therefore, that at least Spain would be able to send us 12,000,000 gallons before France could send us an additional gallon to that she now exported. Even if the 30,000,000 or 50,000,000 of gallons which some anticipated were consumed in this country, the duty, being only about 16d. a gallon on the average, would not amount to more than £700,000 or £800,000. The comparison of the Chancellor of the Exchequer between the duties on French wines in this country and the duty on malt liquor in France was hardly fair. He had taken the very lowest class of French wines, which of course showed a high rate of duty; and on the other hand he had taken a high class of English beer, which showed a low rate of duty in proportion to its value. The common run of beer sent to France was sold at from 20s. to 30s. the barrel. Taking it at 25s. the price would be about 8½d. a gallon. The French Customs' duty upon beer was 9s. 2d. a barrel of thirty-six gallons, or about 3d. a gallon. Now, a duty of 3d. upon an article sold at 8½d. was certainly a great deal more than 18 per cent. During last year we imported 700,000 or 800,000 gallons of French wine at a price of 10s. 4d. a gallon for white, and 14s. 9d. a gallon for red. All this wine would come in at the 1s. rate, which would thus amount to a duty of 10 per cent on white and only 7½ per cent on red wine. It was not, however, fair to compare French wines with English beer, because, as M. Chevalier truly said, those wines had no equivalent in England. The duty on malt was fixed by Act of Parliament at 21s. 8½d. per quarter, but it was more, owing to the mode in which it was levied. Last year he had paid 22s. 4d. per quarter on 90,000 quarters, and adding the hop duty, equivalent to 1s. 8d. a quarter more, the whole amount was raised to 24s. The price of British barley during the last forty or fifty years had been below 33s. a quarter, and therefore the entire duty upon that article was one of 70 or 75 per cent. This was the fair comparison between the duties upon French wines and British wine, as beer had been called. If we were to have free trade, why should not malt have the advantage of it as well as anything else? Its consumption showed as much elasticity as that of any other article, rising with a small duty and falling with a high one. In 1854 a large additional duty of 1s. 6d. a bushel was imposed, with no corresponding advance of revenue. In 1856, the 1s. 6d. was taken off, still leaving the duty 2s. 8d. the bushel; and in the very next year there was an increase of 30 per cent in the consumption in England, and of 50 per cent in Ireland. Why should not the Chancellor of the Exchequer, if he was for free trade and at the same time fair trade, give them a chance of returning him the revenue by reducing the duty on malt? Were the malt tax reduced one-half, in three years it would yield the same revenue as now. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, however, was for bringing wines from France, and Spain, and Portugal, and spirits from Holland. He (Mr. Bass) was told that Russia could distil spirits at 8d. a gallon. All these things were to be brought in to compete with our indigenous produce. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had the other day said of certain Gentlemen who had gone to him as deputations that they were all, without exception, Free-traders, but they were not Free-traders without exception. He was a Free-trader without exception, and he should like to see free trade in malt,—a declaration which had not been made in that House by any brewer for the last forty years. Another way in which beer was about to be placed at a disadvantage was that a new class of houses were to be permitted to sell wine, but the permission was not to extend to beer. It was true it might be introduced by another process, by getting certain names and certificates of character; but not by the easy course which was sufficient in the case of the foreign articles. The hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. B. Osborne) in his speech the other night, spoke of the adulterations of wine that took place in this country, but he (Mr. Bass) could easily show, from the blue-book, that this was not the only country in which adulteration took place, and that France was quite as much in the habit of adulterating wines as our dealers were. It was very possible, therefore, that we might get a great deal of French wine not quite so pure as some Gentlemen anticipated. For instance Mr. Saville Lumley stated that during the last five or six years Spanish wines, mixed and flavoured with other substances, had been exported to all parts of the world as the finest wines of the South of France. Sir E. Tennent said that in the event of a serious reduction of the wine duties, our entire system of taxation would have to be re-arranged—that it would involve the necessity of a corresponding reduction in the duty on brandy—and that then it would be impossible, consistent with justice, to maintain the duties on British spirits, and on Scotch and Irish whisky—and that the malt-tax must be got rid of. It was most unfair that British spirits, worth 1s. 8d. a gallon, should pay a duty of 8s., while the best kinds of French brandy only paid 8s. 6d. per gallon.

MR. VANCE said, he could not but regret that the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had not made his speech the other night; it was one of the most convincing speeches against the whole Budget that he had ever heard. The wine trade in Dublin objected to the duty on wine being fixed at 3s. for the first year, subject to a further reduction. This would tend to restrict trade, if not to bring it to a perfect standstill, as dealers would abstain from increasing their stocks. In some of the small ports it would be impossible to get officers who could test scientifically the strength of the wine. Another objection to the present scheme was that it imposed a smaller proportionate duty on the best Lafitte claret and on sherry than on the coarsest Burgundy. At present a most unjust distinction was kept up between British and foreign spirits, for the latter was gauged only on leaving the Custom-house, but British spirits were gauged on quite a different principle. The latter were gauged while new and before any of the spirit had evaporated. No proof had been given that the proposed reductions of duty would stimulate the export of our manufactures to France. Irish linens and poplins would derive no benefit, nor did he believe that any of the manufactures of the West Riding could enter France at a duty of 30 per cent.

MR. HUMBERSTON said, he trusted that since the principle of allowing a drawback had been conceded no exception would be made to the disadvantage of those dealers who had simply failed to comply with the technicalities of a Treasury order. He thought the principle of granting the drawback ought to be extended to the whole of the trade, even though some of its members should not have technically complied with the Excise regulations.

COLONEL SYKES said, that if they were to re-argue the general question of free trade and to re-open the Budget, their discussion of the Resolutions would occupy the whole of the Session. He would confine his observations to the question under the immediate consideration of the Committee. Believing, as he did, that the Budget was statesmanlike and comprehensive, it was painful to him to have to object to some of its details. He thought, however, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer did not propose to deal fairly with the dealers in wine. Those traders who had complied with the Treasury Minute of 1843 were to have a drawback of 2s. 9d. per gallon. But that Minute had long since been abandoned; the Government had announced that the intention to exact compliance with its conditions was at an end, and it was too bad that the claims of the great body of wine merchants to drawback upon stocks in hand should be refused on a mere technicality. If drawback was to be allowed to those dealers who had complied with the Minute of 1843, if drawback was to be given to traders in paper, and if a demand was to be made for drawback by timber merchants, common justice required that those dealers in wine who had not acted upon an abandoned Treasury Minute should have their fair claims allowed. He should vote for the Amendment.

MR. WHITESIDE said, he wished to take the opportunity of reminding the Committee that the probable effect of a reduction of our wine duties had at one time been discussed in France; and no less a personage than the Emperor of the French had expressed a very remarkable opinion upon that subject. The merchants of Bordeaux had asked His Majesty to endeavour to induce the English Government to reduce our wine duties; and his answer was, that "it was a delusion to suppose that even if the duty were altogether abolished the people of England would be induced to drink the light wines of France." His Majesty added that he had himself lived in this country and knew our tastes; and that the French growers would deceive themselves if they thought the English would largely consume their produce, whatever concession might be made in favour of English manufactures in France. The Chamber of Commerce of Bordeaux had afterwards sent a deputation to Paris, and the Emperor repeated to them in more decided terms his former declaration, stating that his opinion was "founded upon personal experience, and that the Bordeaux merchants would do well to consider what he had said;" but he added that it would be different in the case of brandy, and that if the duty upon that article in England were reduced a great advantage would be gained by the cultivators of the vine in France.

MR. URQUHART admitted that great benefit would result from a reduction of the tea, malt, sugar, and coffee duties, but, paradoxical as it might appear, he was convinced that the best and easiest way to obtain that benefit and lighten the burdens of the poor was by the middle and upper classes beginning to drink the cheap wines of France. What he meant was that an augmented commerce with France would produce more cordial relations between the two countries, and eventually lead to a large reduction of our extravagant expenditure, thereby enabling us to reduce or abolish the duties levied on articles of general consumption.

MR. H. BAILLIE said, that with reference to the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the proper time for discussing the expenses of the Chinese war would be when the Estimates were before the House, he wished to explain that as they were then asked to adopt a proposal which would diminish the national revenue, it was not in his opinion an improper time to ask the Government how they intended to meet the expenses of the Chinese expedition. The Estimates of these expenses were not now and, practically, never would be submitted to Parliament. The only Estimate which had been produced was one for £850,000 for expenses incurred in this country. But the extraordinary expenses of the Chinese expedition, which would be incurred in India, could not come before the House till the end of the Session. They would, in fact, constitute a deficit next year.

MR. HENLEY said, he would confine himself to the Question before the Committee, which he understood to be the reduction of the wine duties to a uniform duty of 3s. up to a given period, upon which an Amendment had been moved with respect to drawback. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had argued the case with great ability, but he was not at all satisfied that the having a comparatively high duty on French wine for the first twelve months, and then lowering the duty afterwards, would tend either to the benefit of the consumer or to the relief of the revenue. He could not help thinking that the practical result would be that nobody who had now got any considerable stock of wine would buy a single bottle for the next twelve months. So far from the wine trade being benefited by that proposal, the effect would necessarily be to hang up all the transactions in it for some time to come. It would have been a great advantage to those who traded in wines if the duty could have been fixed once for all. The trade would then be set free and people would buy three years' consumption within the year. The right hon. Gentleman had then said that if the duty were at once reduced to the lowest point it would be of no use before the wines were manufactured for this country. Certainly it would be pleasant for the people to know that they were to wait for cheap wines until they were manufactured—not until the grapes produced them. Again, his mind was not relieved by what had been said as to the necessity of what was called the spirit test. He thought that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in saying that wine did not come in competition with spirits, almost answered his own argument on that point. When he (Mr. Henley) first read the general proposal as to the wine duties, it struck him as embodying a direct differential duty in favour of France, and nothing that he had since heard in debate had altered his mind on that subject. What the object of the Government could be in throwing that ounce of gold into the scale of the Gaul—whether it was done the more to induce the French Emperor to abandon his Holiness the Pope, he could not say; but, whatever might have been the intention, the arrangement went in point of fact to establish a differential duty in favour of the wines of France against all the other wine-growing countries in the world; and he did not think that in these times of free trade there was much justice in such a proposition. Nor did he think the general scheme, financially, was oversafe; but, the House having determined upon that scheme being carried out, he was not disposed to do anything that might tend to weaken it, for, in his opinion, it was weak enough already. With regard to the drawback the Chancellor of the Exchequer seemed to think that under the increased consumption of wine which must take place if the duty were diminished the wine merchants would be able to make good any loss that would arise from the diminished value of the wine which they held. But either the public or the wine merchants must pay the amount of the 5s. 9d. duty which had been levied on the stock in hand; and if the charge were to fall on the public no large increase in the trade could for the present be expected. He was bound, however, by the Minute of 1852, and he would not therefore support the Amendment. Notice had been given to the trade in the year 1843, and had been renewed in the year 1852; and he did not think that a case for that concession in their behalf had been made out.

MR. MONCKTON MILNES said, he wished to alter his Amendment, and he hoped the Committee would allow him to substitute the following words for those which he had originally proposed at the end of the clause:—"Or who can prove by any other process which will be satisfactory to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue that such stock of wine had been required and the duty paid upon it within two years of the 10th of February, 1860."

Another Amendment proposed,—

"At the end of the proposed Resolution, to add the words 'or who can prove, by any other process which shall be satisfactory to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, that such stock of Wine has been acquired and the Duty paid within two years before the 10th day of February, 1860.'"

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he must confess that this proposition was one of the loosest he had ever heard. There were certain rules laid down, on the observance of which drawback might be claimed; it was confessed that those rules had not been observed by certain traders ; and an attempt was now made to exempt those persons from the consequences of their own neglect. If such a course as that was to be adopted, how could the Committee expect that any conditions in analogous cases would be observed hereafter ? Similar claims, founded on such a precedent, might be preferred in behalf of other interests, and he begged the Committee to reflect on the lavish expenditure to which that might lead. Men would only have to say that, though certain conditions had been imposed on them, they had not observed those conditions, and because they had not observed them they came to Parliament and asked for a drawback. He trusted his hon. Friend would not insist upon so untenable a proposition.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he should feel it his duty to vote against the proposal of the hon. Member for Pontefract. The question was whether the Committee and the Government ought, or ought not, to enforce the conditions which had been distinctly laid down, but which had nevertheless not been observed. As those conditions so laid down had not been fulfilled, he thought the parties in whose interest the proposition of the hon. Member for Pontefract was made were entirely out of court and had no claim for a drawback. He did not mean, however, to abandon the ground he took before with regard to the identity between the Order of 1852 and the Minute of 1843; but there was no need of an Amendment to establish that point, for the Resolution provided that all persons who complied with the Order of 1842 were entitled to the drawback. The question was, therefore, narrowed to the proper construction of the Treasury Order, and he thought that might be safely left to the equity of the Government.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, it was a comfortable thought that they were now engaged in a discussion on the real business of the country, and that no party spirit or party feeling could be introduced. He meant to confine himself entirely to the question that was now before the Committee. He had listened with the utmost attention to the elaborate and lucid statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and he was ready to admit that an argument might be raised on the terms of the different orders. But he said that even where a fair ground of doubt existed that doubt ought, as a simple matter of justice, to be settled in favour of the merchants rather than of the Government, whose ambiguous terms had given rise to the doubt. There was no merchant, he contended, who could read the Treasury Order without feeling satisfied that he was entitled to a drawback so long as he possessed a stock of wine on hand equal to and of like quality with that on which he had paid duty within the last two years. He hoped the Government would deal with the matter in a spirit of equity and not as special pleaders. In his argument he did not refer to the Treasury Minute of 1842, which had been revoked, but confined himself entirely to the last-issued document—the Treasury Order of 1852. In the construction of that order the whole question turned on the meaning of one word, and that word might just as well, in point of grammar, in point of common sense, and in point of justice, be interpreted in favour of the merchant as in favour of the Government. The words were—

Lord John Russell

“In any Act that may be passed upon the conclusion of any treaty for a reduction of the duties upon foreign wines, provision shall be made for allowing to certain dealers a return of duties upon all such”—that was the important word—“wines as may be henceforth cleared from the Customs, provided that a stock of wine equal thereto shall be found in such dealer's possession at the time of the reduction of such duties.”

If the Minute had stopped there, no doubt could have arisen on the point. The Minute went on, “provided that it be proved that such wine has paid the duty within two years.” The whole question was whether “such wine” meant all such wines as might henceforth be cleared, in which case the construction must be in favour of the merchant, or whether it applied to the latter expression, that such stock should have been in the dealer's possession for two years. He really thought no one would doubt that if a dealer had in his possession 10,000 gallons of wine, of which 5,000 had been in his possession for more, and 5,000 for less than two years, he would imagine that if he had the entire quantity of wine in his possession, he would be entitled to a drawback on the entire quantity. He (Sir Fitzroy Kelly) agreed with the right hon. Gentleman that the closing words of the Order were mere surplusage; but then the right hon. Gentleman should remember that they were not dealing with special pleaders but with merchants ; and it was clear that the last words of the Order would make the greatest impression on their minds. He thought that a Government bringing forth a measure intended to facilitate and encourage trade ought to deal liberally and equitably with those whose interests were to be affected. With respect to the amount of revenue involved, that was not the point. It was a question of justice, and whether the amount was £600,000 or £1,000,000 he hoped the Government would take a large and liberal view of the matter.

MR. WOODD observed that the Minute of 1852 contained the same words as were in the former Minute of 1843, "provided that it be proved that such wine had paid duty within two years."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The words "and of the like description" were added in 1852.

MR. WOODD thought that the addition only made his case the stronger, for it clearly could not refer to the same wines. It was intended that the Order of 1852 should include the Order of July, 1843.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he was anxious to assist the Committee in arriving at a satisfactory conclusion. At present they appeared to be discussing two different questions—the Amendment moved by the hon. Member for Pontefract, and the proposition which had been just argued by the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Sir F. Kelly). He must confess he was not able to follow clearly the hon. and learned Gentleman's argument, but that probably was his own fault. He understood him, however, to found his observations simply upon the terms and conditions of the Treasury Minute and of the subsidiary documents as they stood. If that were so, the hon. and learned Gentleman agreed with the Motion as he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) proposed it—namely, that the drawbacks should be given to parties who had complied with the conditions of the said Minute. As to the interpretation of the words, there might be an important difference of opinion upon them, but, the difference being one of construction only, the Committee were not in a condition to arrive at any conclusion until the papers were before them. They would, therefore, be under no disadvantage in acceding to the Resolution, after which it would remain open to any hon. Member in the Customs' Committee, which would not be finished for some time, to call for a decision on the point of construction. With respect to the Amendment, or rather the addition proposed by his hon. Friend (Mr. M. Milnes), that involved a totally distinct question. His hon. and learned Friend called compliance with the conditions of a covenant a technicality, and said that the Government ought therefore to dispense with any such compliance. Now, the cost of this generosity, or whatever it might be called, on the part of his hon. Friend [Mr. M. MILNES.—Justice!] would be about £600,000. A covenant had been made with certain parties; they did not pretend to have performed its conditions; and yet justice demanded that the Government should treat them as if they had performed the conditions. That was his hon. Friend's idea of justice. Then it was said, "Let the parties, if they can, prove that they are entitled to the drawback." But there was no process by which they could prove it other than by the Excise survey, to which none of them had submitted. It would be very unfair on the part of the Government to accept a Motion of this kind, and then save themselves from paying by alleging that the dealers had no means of proving the identical quantity entitled to drawback. But the mischief of this proposal did not stop here. His hon. Friend called upon the Committee to declare that wine which had paid Customs' duty within two years should receive a drawback. Now, if this principle were adopted for wine, it would be only just to apply it equally to timber, silk goods, gloves, currants, raisins, figs, and every other article upon which reductions were proposed, until in the pursuit of what his hon. Friend called "justice"—but which he called the grossest and most gratuitous injustice towards the public—they would sacrifice not £600,000, but a sum which would impoverish a much richer Chancellor of the Exchequer than he was.

MR. MONCKTON MILNES said, the right hon. Gentleman quite misapprehended what had fallen from him. Every one of these persons had submitted to the Excise survey, had received a certificate, and had entered the particulars in his cash-book. The distinction set up was a technicality. It was, whether the trade had complied with the special form called the stock-book process, which the officers of Excise told them was unnecessary. The right hon. Gentleman would not be recommending his Budget to the country if, on the first night of the Committee, he inflicted an injustice which would fall on the weak and the poor, and not on the rich man, who had kept his books in the particular form prescribed.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER observed that his hon. Friend had stated that the officers of Excise had advised persons not to comply with the rules laid down in the Minute. He had heard this alleged before; but he was bound to say that not one case had been certified to him in which that charge had been proved, and therefore he was unable to believe that it had been done. His honourable Friend said that these persons had omitted to keep a stock-book, which he called a technicality; but the truth was that that book constituted the whole of the evidence in the case. It was the beginning and the end of the claim, and afforded the only means of proof that could be adduced upon which the Treasury could rely.

MR. BENTINCK said, he was anxious that the vote he was about to give was one that should not be misunderstood. In ordinary cases he might not have thought the hon. Member for Pontefract was so high an authority; but he believed that to make an appeal to the present Government on the part of justice, patriotism, or right feeling, was a hopeless undertaking. The Government did not attempt to convince except by a majority. Every man, therefore, holding the opinion he did was, he thought, bound to throw every possible obstruction in the way of this most mischievous measure.

MR. WOODE remarked, that he was quite content to accept the Resolution as it stood, and to go into the question of interpretation when they had the papers before them.

SIR EDWARD GROGAN stated, that he presented a petition the other night from certain wine dealers in Dublin containing the assertion which one of the petitioners stated as being within the personal knowledge of the Secretary of the Treasury, that the officers of Excise whose duty it was to observe and carry into effect the Minute of 1843, not only failed to perform their duty, but in many instances threw obstacles in the way of traders who wished to comply with the Treasury regulations, and actually refused to enter and verify their stock sheets.

MR. LAING said, it was true that a wine merchant told him that the officer of the Excise advised him not to keep a book, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer had received a letter from another wine merchant to the same effect, but these were mere cases of misconduct on the part of the officers, and ought to have been reported to the Board of Inland Revenue.

SIR MINTO FARQUHAR thought, that if it had been done in two cases, it was very likely that it had been done in other cases, and that a general impression had been made upon the minds of wine merchants, that such a book as that alluded to was not necessary. He thought a good case had been made out for the Amendment, and if pressed to a division he should vote for it.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

Question put, "That those words be there added."

The Committee divided: Ayes 72; Noes 183: Majority 111.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he then rose to propose the remainder of the Resolution which fixed the rates of duties to be paid on wines of different strength. In this part, however, the Government had determined to make a certain amount of change, which he thought would be acceptable to the House. He had stated that it was quite necessary that there should be an interval before the final fall in the duties, but, at the same time, they would make that interval as short as possible, and, on consideration, they thought it might be put at the 1st of January next year, instead of the 1st of April. With respect to the degrees of strength of alcohol in wines, the Government proposed that in the lowest class of wines, instead of terminating at 15 per cent, the test should be 18 degrees. The effect of the alteration would be that wine of 18 degrees of strength should be admitted at 1s. per gallon, wines of 26 degrees of alcoholic strength 1s. 6d. per gallon, and wines of 40 degrees of strength 2s. a gallon.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, the observations of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer only increased the objections that ought to be entertained by the Committee to his scheme. One great objection to the proposal was that the differential duty was entirely in favour of French wines alone. As the right hon. Gentleman had first proposed his scheme, it was perfectly clear he was acting on imperfect information, because the lower scale of duties 15 degrees of alcoholic strength would admit only a very small portion of French wines, and those of the lowest and weakest character. He (Mr. S. FitzGerald) held in his hand the result of some experiments that had been made by two or three of the principal importing houses in London within the last week, and they showed that sherries of every kind averaged from 32 to 33 per cent of alcoholic strength, so that they would come in at the very highest rate of duty. Marsala, the Sicilian wine, came at 33 per cent, while port was bound to possess from 33 to 40 degrees. Therefore all wines from Spain and Portugal would come in at the highest rate of duty. The Medoc wine, of what was termed port growth, contained 17 degrees; Chateau Latour was 18 degrees: and indeed the experiments with 200 samples of claret, of various vintages—namely, 1856, 1857, and 1858, and of different kinds—showed that they possessed an average of only 18 degrees of alcoholic strength. There was, however, this further objection, that by establishing this differential duty in favour of French wines alone, in itself a great objection, it seemed as if we were getting rid by an artifice and a trick in the levying of the duty of our covenant with Spain and Portugal, to admit their wines at the same rate of duty as the wines of the most favoured nations. He would only ask the Committee whether this should be permitted? But he wished more particularly to point out, with reference to the alcoholic test proposed by the right hon. Gentleman, the difficulties under which he would find himself from having made this concession to France part of the Treaty, instead of proposing that it should be enacted by the independent legislation of that House. If there was one point upon which the wine trade was perfectly agreed it was that, although the public would derive considerable advantage, and although they themselves would derive considerable advantage from this alteration in the wine duties, still the alcoholic test proposed would be found utterly impracticable, and that if practicable as a test, it would be impossible to carry it into execution; because, first, it required a considerable time to perform the requisite operation. The right hon. Gentleman had said that it could be done in half an hour. Admitting that to be the case, what would be the result? He had been informed by a very large importer that it was not at all an unusual thing for him to clear forty or fifty pipes in a morning; and if it required half an hour to test each pipe, when would the forty or fifty pipes be cleared? No doubt it would be said that this test was in use at the octroi in Paris, but he was informed that it had caused such inconvenience that, except in cases where the octroi officers had received information which induced them to suspect fraud, it was scarcely ever used there. Weeks and months elapsed there without its ever being put into practice. Then it would require a very different class of officers from those ordinarily employed—men who were practical chemists—to apply the test with any success. The right hon. Gentleman had taken credit in his Budget for a saving of £20,000 on account of the number of persons that his proposed alterations would render unnecessary in the collection of the Customs' duties, but if practical chemists were required, and in such numbers as would be necessary, what would become of that £20,000? A curious case had occurred not long since which would exemplify the necessity for the employment of such persons. Three pipes of port were imported, exactly similar in character, of the same shipping, vintage, and price. One was sent to London, one to Leith, and one to another port, the name of which at that moment he did not recollect. That sent to London was not permitted to pass the Custom-house, because it was said by the officer who tested it to contain above 43 degrees of alcoholic strength, no wine, according to the present law, being permitted to pass that was above that strength. That sent to Leith was allowed to pass because it was below that strength. But that sent to the other port was rejected by one officer, but admitted by a second, who repeated the operation of testing. It was evident, therefore, that not only would considerable delay be occasioned, and that a new class of officers would have to be appointed, but that the proposed test would give rise to constant disputes between the officers and the shippers. In fact, the whole of the wine trade agreed in the opinion that the test was one of a perfectly impracticable character; there was not one dissentient voice upon that point. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: Hear, hear!] The right hon. Gentleman would have an opportunity shortly of expressing his opinion, whether dissentient or otherwise, upon the statements he (Mr. FitzGerald) was making, and it would be more convenient if he would defer until then his energetic "hear, hear!" It was a cheer that rather implied ridicule than anything else, and was certainly scarcely one of a courteous nature. He (Mr. FitzGerald) thought the right hon. Gentleman himself would be compelled to admit sooner or later the impracticability of the test, for it would place him in this position. It was not as if it was to be applied by force of an Act of Parliament, but it formed part of the Treaty, from which no retreat could be, and it would be necessary to abide by the stipulations of that Treaty, however inconvenient its application might be found. But if found so inconvenient as to be perfectly impracticable, and therefore discontinued, then the admission of every description of French wine, whatever its actual strength, could be demanded at the lowest rate—namely, 1s. per gallon. If it were discontinued with reference to French wines it must equally be so with respect to the wines of those countries which were to be treated the same as the most favoured nations. But the right hon. Gentleman had told the House earlier in the evening that with regard to the great bulk of wines coming from Spain and Portugal he had come to the conclusion that it would be sheer folly and madness to admit them at a duty one farthing below 2s. per gallon. The right hon. Gentleman would therefore be compelled to submit to a deficit in the revenue such as he never contemplated, and which it would be impossible to supply except by that direct taxation which he himself had deprecated but now practised. It was proved by the evidence taken before the Wine Duties Committee in 1852 that if the duty were reduced to 1s. a gallon, it would require the consumption of wine to be multiplied sixfold to equalize the revenue—that instead of 6,000,000, there must be 36,000,000 gallons of wine consumed to meet the loss of revenue occasioned by the transaction. But another difficulty had been pointed out to him by practical men who had considered this question. They said that there were wines very new and very full-flavoured but very cheap, not exceeding in price 2d. or 3d. a gallon in France, and which, if sufficiently brandied, could be brought over. It was perfectly clear, that if admitted at the rate of 1s. a gallon it would be a good speculation to import those wines brandied up to the fullest strength permitted by law solely for the purpose of re-distilling it and (putting the wine out of consideration) obtaining the brandy. Even paying the full duty the brandy would be thus introduced at a rate not exceeding 5s. per gallon, while if it paid that duty only at which he had shown the right hon. Gentleman might be compelled to admit it, by the discontinuance of his impracticable test—namely, 1s. per gallon, the brandy thus obtained would be introduced at a rate not exceeding 2s. 6d. per gallon. What, then, would become of the duty on brandy? He held in his hand a letter from one of the largest wine importers in London—a gentleman who, if his name were mentioned, the right hon. Gentleman would admit was a reliable authority upon these questions, and that gentleman asserted his ability to prove the impracticability of the alcoholic test, and that if adopted all the wines of Spain and Portugal, as well as those of France would, before long, be introduced at the lowest rate of duty—namely, 1s. per gallon. If so, was it not worth consideration by the right hon. Gentleman whether it was not advisable to postpone this portion of his Resolution until he had made further inquiry into the matter?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he wished to express his regret at having given offence to the hon. Gentleman by the cheer which was involuntarily extorted from him by the force of imagination, which induced the declaration that he spoke for the wine trade without a dissentient voice. The hon. Gentleman contended that if a higher rate were laid on strong wine a differential duty would be imposed in favour of the wines of France as against those of the Peninsula; there was some truth in the statement that the wines of the northern vine-producing countries were weaker than those of the south, but it should be borne in mind that the state of our law hitherto had deprived gentlemen in the trade almost entirely of the means of knowing what was the natural state of the juice of the vine after the process of fermentation. The hon. Gentleman's statements had been greatly exaggerated. He stated that no wines but those of France would come in at a low duty. On the contrary, the country that would derive exclusive advantages from those low rates would be Germany, which had nothing whatever to do with the Treaty. So far from deriving an exclusive advantage from the Treaty, a very large portion of the wines of France were not only not weak, but were the very strongest which came in, and all of them would have to pay this 2s. duty. If France were to reason in the spirit of the hon. Gentleman, she might say, because we had placed a duty of 2s. on wine in bottle, whatever the strength, and because no wine was imported in bottles from Spain and Portugal, that we were thereby departing from the principle of alcoholic strength, and were establishing differential duties. The only object which the Government could have in endeavouring to discover the proportion of alcohol was to protect the spirit revenue; it might be impossible to deal with it exactly, but any difficulties which might exist had been enormously overstated by the hon. Gentleman. He believed it would be found that a mistake was made by those who, like the late Attorney General for Ireland, still clung to the belief that French wines were unfavourably viewed.

Mr. Seymour FitzGerald

MR. WHITESIDE: I said the French Emperor stated so.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: But why, if he did not believe it himself, had he put the French Emperor into the box—he was his own witness? He would illustrate what he meant by a reference to the sugar trade. The sugars of Cuba were of a much higher quality than those which came from Brazil; and, on that account, Cuban sugars paid a much higher duty, but was it right to say that differential duties were established? The amount of duty payable altogether depended on the quality, and it was precisely at this point that the difficulty was experienced in getting wine in its natural state. The wines of the Peninsula were rarely seen in their natural state, though it was sometimes the case. The other day he heard of two samples of port of the last vintage, the strength of which respectively was 27 and 28, being probably eight or nine degrees under the ordinary average, which was made up by the admixture of brandy. The hon. Gentleman declared that the trade united in condemning the proposed test as impracticable. He did not know whether they had made representations to him in what might be called their corporate capacity, but in those which had been made to him they certainly did not hold the language of the hon. Gentleman. In their resolutions they stated that it would be cumbrous and cause delay.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD: I meant that it would be found practically inoperative.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: So far from that, he might state that within the last six months 1,366 wines had been sampled at the Custom-house in London. And as to the statement that the system would entail enormous expenses by the establishments at the different ports, he would answer it by saying that it was not intended to maintain staffs for the purpose at the smaller trading localities; the wine trade of England was concentrated in a very limited number of ports. The direct importation into any other ports was so insignificant it would be absurd to have an esta-lishment of officers in them for a purpose like this; and it was inaccurate to say that a higher class of Custom-house officers would be required to conduct this operation. On the contrary, the Chairman of the Board of Customs, after this plan had been adopted by the Government, had assured him that in a short time, under the measures proposed, the department would be able to dispense altogether with the services of a great number of the class of landing-waiters, a costly and highly accomplished class of officers. He would not go into a second explanation of the general grounds for adopting this change. The hon. Gentleman said—and he would admit—that there was a degree of inconvenience in any process of testing, or weighing, or examining that delayed the passing of a commodity for a single moment. But if the hon. Gentleman meant that the process of testing caused a general obstruction to the ordinary course of trade he must join issue with him. The wine trade had not represented to him by their corporate deputations that they would sustain any amount of inconvenience from the process. Wine was not only the article of which the quality was tested on importation. The process was not like the examinations of the octroi of Paris, by which every cart or cask was inspected; these were large operations. Thousands of hogsheads of sugar were imported, but every single hogshead was not examined. Experience taught the officers what number of hogsheads of sugar or cases of wine it was necessary to take in order to ascertain the ordinary quality of the article. In these things what appeared to be difficulties vanished when they were practically dealt with. The hon. Gentleman had come down to supply the lack of information on the part of the Government, and had stated that full brandied wines of a low quality might be purchased abroad for 2d. or 3d. a gallon.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD assured the right hon. Gentleman he had said nothing of the kind. He had said that wines of coarse quality could be purchased abroad, and brandy added to it before importation.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER observed he had understood the hon. Gentleman to say now that a full-bodied, strong, but coarse wine could be bought and imported at the rate of 2d. or 3d. a gallon.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, he must beg the right hon. Gentleman's pardon. What he had said was that a strong-flavoured wine might be bought at that rate, and brandied so as to make it worth while to import it.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER thought the impression on the House was that the hon. Gentleman had said strong wines. Had it been true that wine of any spirituous strength could be imported at that rate the statement would be important. But he was assured that wines of any strength, however coarse, coming in here, liable to a 2s. duty, as containing 40 degrees of proof spirit, could not be imported at less than 12 times the amount stated by the hon. Gentleman. He did not know what could be done with such wines; there might be an argument concealed in the statement, but he could not perceive it.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, he must beg leave again to explain. He had stated that a coarse wine might be bought in France at the price he had named, and it would be worth while for the buyers to mix a very large proportion of brandy with it, and import it at the shilling rate of duty, solely for the purpose of redistillation,—for the sake of the brandy it contained.

MR. T. BARING said, he wished to know why the number of degrees of proof spirit that would make wines liable to the duty of 1s., had been suddenly changed from 15 degrees to 18? It should be recollected that wine underwent no subsequent process after importation; but sugar was refined, and was valued according to the quantity of saccharine matter it contained. Wine was taken into consumption merely according to the taste of the consumer. It was the avowed object of the right hon. Gentleman to increase the consumption of pure wine, but the differential duty would tend to make adulterated wine cheaper than pure. The wines of Portugal and Spain must be diluted before they could be imported at the lower duty; if the taste of the consumer was for strong wines, why not admit it as the same duty as weak? It seemed to him that every inducement was held out to the adulteration of wine before it was imported. If the Government wish to introduce a pure article, he could not understand the principle on which a graduated scale of duty was imposed. As to the process of collecting it, if the right hon. Gentleman was certain it could be done readily and easily, he might be secure.

Mr. Seymour FitzGerald

But he had a very different account; he had heard of wine rejected at one port and admitted at another. If the Government did not need a superior class of Custom-house officers to apply the test—men above all suspicion of being tampered with—it might be perfectly secure as to the machinery for collecting the duty. But a uniform duty was preferable; the consumers should be left to select the wines that suited their own taste. The comparison of the sugar duties was totally inapplicable to wine.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he inferred from his remarks that the hon. Gentleman could not have heard the statement he had made in the early part of the evening, or he would not have asked why the Government did not propose the same duty for weak wines as for strong. The answer was as simple as possible. The higher rate of duty was imposed as a protection to the revenue derived from spirits; but if the same duty were placed on all wines alike it would defeat the main purpose of this great change, which was to promote the introduction of wines of a medium or low quality. And if the 1s. duty were applied to all wines up to the standard of 40 degrees of proof spirit, then those whom he was bound to consult, and without whom he could not move, stated that they could not be responsible for the collection of £11,000,000 from the duty on spirits. The hon. Gentleman had alluded to the wine that was rejected at one port and admitted at another. The explanation of that particular case was very simple. It was this:—The Custom-house had not been in the habit, hitherto, of enforcing the test with very great rigour. All they looked to was ascertaining the bonâ fides of the importers; and when they knew that there was no danger to the spirit revenue they did not exercise so much rigour as the strict letter of the law required. The real explanation, however, of the difficulty was, that during the recent vine disease in the Peninsula a change had taken place in the practice of the wine trade. It had been found necessary, in consequence of the oidium, or deemed convenient, to brandy wines more highly than had previously been the case.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he should like to learn from the right hon. Gentleman what effect the acceleration of the lowest scale of duties would have upon the revenue, as well as to ascertain the reason why he had advanced the lowest degree of proof from 15 to 18, while he had made no change in the two other scales? The objection to the alcoholic test was that it was cumbrous, and must, if it were to be applied to every separate sample, be productive of great inconvenience to the dealers in wine. He might also observe that it had been pointed out to him that 15 degrees was a very inconvenient point for the lowest scale, touching as it did upon the clarets, and this was the reason, he presumed, which had led the right hon. Gentleman to make the proposed alteration. In his opinion there ought to be only two classes so as to simplify operations as much as possible. It was objectionable, moreover, that under the proposed scheme a preference over Spanish and Portuguese would be given to French wines. That would be more especially so as a consequence of the alteration in the lowest scale which the right hon. Gentleman had made, for nearly all the French wines, except perhaps Rousillon, would be imported under the 18 degree scale, while nearly all the wines of Spain and Portugal would be thrown into the third class. With respect to the question of an ad valorem duty being imposed, he would simply say that in many instances the highest rate of duty would have to be paid upon the least valuable wines—as, for instance, in the case of Cape and Marsala, which, although they were inferior in point of value to the finest French wines, yet would have to pay a higher duty. He should also contend that as a consequence of that state of things, the poorer classes would not enjoy those advantages as consumers of French wines, which the right hon. Gentleman seemed to regard as the main object of his proposal. If the duties in question had been ad valorem duties the case of the sugar duties would have applied, but the scale did not fall with anything like equal force on the different classes of wines. The right hon. Gentleman was, it appeared to him, doing an unwise thing if he desired to see other countries open their markets to us, in reversing the policy of the Methuen Treaty, by admitting nearly all the wines of France under the lowest scale, while the wines of Spain and Portugal were excluded from its operation.

LORD ALFRED CHURCHILL said, that the alcohol in wine having a less specific gravity rose to the top after the cask had been some time in bond. It would not do to shake the cask, because that would spoil the wine. How did the right hon. Gentleman propose to get over the difficulty of the test showing a different result if applied to the upper than if applied to the lower portion?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the difficulty was easily overcome every day by the Board of Customs drawing partly from the top and partly from the bottom of the cask. As to the expense of this measure to the revenue, they would not lose so much on wine as the spirit duties would give; but, of course, that was speaking only of the two articles wine and spirit. After the whole of the propositions had been dealt with, he would make a statement of the general result. His hon. Friend was entirely wrong as to this being an inverted ad valorem scale. It was true that Hermitage would pay the lowest duty and Marsala the higher duty, but fine clarets were rare products and would not form a thousandth part of the wines imported. Looking to that exceptional class of wines and not to the 999 other sorts, it might be said to be an inverted ad valorem duty. But generally the strong wines were the dear, and the weak wines the cheap wines. Therefore the scale would fall justly. He frankly owned he did not recommend it as an ad valorem duty.

MR. HENLEY said, that the proposal to levy a duty of 10 per cent on wines of 15 degrees strength at one moment, and of the same amount on wines of 18 degrees at another, was an arbitrary change, for which no reason had been given.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, his hon. Friend had stated the reason for the alteration quite correctly. The line at 15 was inconvenient, because it would tend to press down the clarets now introduced to bring them under that strength. His hon. Friend had alluded to a very important point, though he seemed not to be aware of the facts. The strength at which British wines were made was a good index of the turn which popular taste would take. British wines had no natural strength, but to suit the taste of the public they were generally made at 24 and 25. His own impression was that there would be a considerable importation of wines at from 22 to 25, although at present none of that kind was imported.

MR. BASS said, that not only the Chateau wines but all the wines of Bordeaux would come under the 15 per cent standard. The right hon. Gentleman was mistaken in supposing that class of wine was the exception. In the south of France there was produced a considerable quantity of low quality and low price, and a vast quantity of moderate wines which, like all the wines of Germany, would come under 15 per cent. In point of fact, if the right hon. Gentleman referred to statistical tables of the relative strength of the different wines of Europe, he would find that the highest class would really have to pay the low and the lower class the high duty.

MR. J. B. SMITH said, it was the brandy which was imported with the wine which made the difference, and therefore the wines of Spain and Portugal would pay higher duty than the wines of France, which were not brandied.

MR. BASS said, the hon. Member was mistaken in supposing that the wines of Spain and Portugal were highly brandied. The spontaneous production of spirit in those wines very much exceeded 15 per cent.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he looked upon the question as important in its bearing on our foreign relations; and, therefore, he wished to hear whether the right hon. Gentleman had really considered how far these Resolutions were consistent with the existing treaties between this and other countries. In levying duties on wine, it was proposed to substitute an entirely new test, and he had not heard any substantial reason why they should depart from a system which had existed for centuries, unless it was to confer an exclusive favour on France. If three merchants imported to-day 50 pipes of wine from Portugal, Spain, and France respectively, they would pay the same duty; but if they imported the same quantities and qualities after the Resolution was agreed to, perhaps one-third less would be paid on the French wine than would be paid on the wines of Spain and Portugal. We had treaty engagements with Spain and Portugal, and the question was whether, under the most favoured nation clause, it would not be a breach of those treaties. Then, as to the alcoholic tests, it was impossible to deny that, however carefully and skilfully applied, they were open to considerable doubt; and, unless some latitude were allowed, the result would be that when the scheme came into operation the revenue authorities would be beset with petitioners all complaining of the effect of the test as applied to their wines. It was also perfectly clear that the result of the arrangement proposed would be, that the wines of Spain and Portugal would have to pay the highest duty; and that the French would be the great gainers, as their wines would fall under the low duty.

Mr. Bass

MR. HASSARD said, he wished to know if the Chancellor of the Exchequer had considered what effect his proposal would have on colonial wines, and especially those which came from the Cape of Good Hope. If they had to pay the high duty the charge would press very severely upon them. The original strength of those wines was about 17 per cent, but they had to be raised to 25 per cent with alcohol in order to prevent fermentation while passing the tropics, and might therefore have to pay the higher duty. He thought that those wines deserved some attention at the hands of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and he wished to know whether there were any means by which they might not be placed at a disadvantage by the side of other wines.

MR. CRAWFORD said, he wished to know whether the new duties would take effect, as was the custom, from the next day, and, if so, whether care would be taken not to charge people who came early in the morning the high duty, while those who came in the afternoon paid only the reduced duty.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he believed it was not the intention of the Committee to continue any differential duty in favour of Cape wines after the new scale came into operation. They would pay, like other wines of the same strength, for the protection of the spirit revenue in England. With respect to the question of the hon. Member for the City (Mr. Crawford), the rule adopted of late years was, that the Resolutions of the House for reducing Customs' duties took effect immediately, subject to the condition, that if Parliament did not confirm those Resolutions the parties were bound to pay the difference. He felt it his duty, unless the Committee should be of a different opinion, to take care that the same rule was acted upon in the present case, and that the 3s. duty should be taken the next day.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that the Resolutions would take effect as soon as the House had confirmed the Resolutions passed in Committee.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that was also his own impression, though upon making inquiry he had been told otherwise. The usual course, however, would be followed, and the new duty would take effect immediately after the Resolution had been reported to the House.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he wished, before the Committee proceeded with the Resolution, to present a Petition from some inhabitants of North Warwickshire which reached him after the meeting of the House.

2. Resolved, That on and after the 1st day of January, 1861, the following Duties shall be charged, namely :—

		Containing less than the following Rates of Proof Spirit, verified by Sykes' Hydrometer, namely :—			If Imported in Bottles.
		18	26	40
		degrees.	degrees.	degrees.
Wine of and from Foreign Countries—		s. d.	s. d.	s. d.	s. d.
Red	the gallon	1 0	1 6	2 0	2 0
White	the gallon	1 0	1 6	2 0	2 0
Lees of such Wine	the gallon	1 0	1 6	2 0	2 0
Wine, the growth and produce of any British possession, and imported direct from thence—
Red	the gallon	1 0	1 6	2 0	2 0
White	the gallon	1 0	1 6	2 0	2 0
Lees of such wine	the gallon	1 0	1 6	2 0	2 0

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he would then move the fourth Resolution, providing that the duties charged upon certain goods, wares, and merchandise imported into the United Kingdom shall cease and determine, a list of forty-three different articles being annexed to the Resolution.

Motion made, and Question proposed,—
“ That the Duties of Customs chargeable upon the goods, wares, and merchandise hereinafter mentioned imported into Great Britain and Ireland, shall cease and determine, namely :—
“ Agates or Cornelians set.”

MR. NEWDEGATE objected to proceed with the Resolution, which embraced no fewer than forty-three articles, and affected the industry of many thousands of their fellow-countrymen. He would move that the Chairman report progress.

SIR WILLIAM MILES said, that as the Chancellor of the Exchequer had given notice that he would take all the articles in the French Treaty first, it followed that books and parchment from abroad would gain admission into England before the Excise duty on paper was taken off. As, however, there was a condition attaching to the article in question, that the provision was not to take effect unless the Excise duty in England was remitted, would it not be as well, for the sake of saving time, to postpone the discussion on that provision of the Treaty until after they had settled

The prayer of the petition was, that in the case of the House assenting to a reduction of duty on French products, our own agricultural produce, especially malt, might not be placed at disadvantage, and he hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would direct his attention to the prayer of the petition.

as to the removal of the Excise duty? He might also remind them that the hon. Member for Hertfordshire (Mr. Puller) had an Amendment on the paper respecting the prohibition of the export of rags from France.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, said he would take care that the Resolution should be so drawn as not to commit the House in case the Excise duty on paper was not repealed. He hoped the hon. Member for Warwickshire would waive his objection to proceeding with the Resolution, at any rate until they came to some article that evoked opposition.

MR. BENTINCK said, that in that case he should object to the very first item—“ agates, or cornelians, set.” He did not think that, at so late an hour, they could make satisfactory progress with the Resolution.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, although he feared there was not much that was bond fide about the hon. Member's objection, still he should not oppose the Motion to report progress after the wine Resolutions were ordered to be reported.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS inquired if the article in the fourth Resolution, though named in the French Treaty, would be received from other parts of the world without an equivalent?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the Resolution did not limit the articles admitted to those coming from France; it took no cognizance of their origin, but left the import open from all the world.

MR. T. BARING inquired in what order the right hon. Gentleman was proceeding with the Resolutions?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the only deviation that would be made in the natural order of the Resolutions was in the case of the spirit duties (Resolution No. 3). And, as stated by him the other day in answer to a question from the hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. T. Duncombe) the Resolution respecting spirits would be postponed until after the other Resolutions had been passed.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, the answer of the right hon. Gentleman to the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Alderman Salomons) was not consistent with the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the other day, that the giving of certain facilities to France did not imply their being extended to German goods.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the hon. Gentleman had mistaken the purport of his answer. What he had stated was that, under the Treaty, it would be perfectly competent to the House of Commons, if it thought fit, to lay higher duties on German or any other goods than on the French goods; the French Treaty would not forbid it.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he hoped hon. Members having Motions on the paper for to-morrow would have the kindness to waive them and allow the discussion on these Resolutions to proceed. He hoped the hon. Member for Berks would give his consent to this arrangement.

CAPTAIN LEICESTER VERNON said, he was exceedingly loth to give way on this occasion, because he stood excessively well for bringing on to-morrow the Motion of which he had given notice. He considered it of very great importance in a commercial point of view, because until it was settled commercial men could scarcely know whether they were safe in taking Government contracts or not. At the same time, he would not stand in the way of the Government or the House if it was their wish to proceed with these Resolutions. He hoped, however, the Government would give him facilities for bringing on his Motion on an early day.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, it might be convenient to the hon. Member for Bridgewater (Mr. Kinglake) to be informed that the Motion of which he had given notice for next day—namely, one for the production of copies and extracts respecting Savoy—would not be objected to by the Government.

Mr. Alderman Salomons

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he had no objection to the House resuming that the Chairman might report the Resolutions on the wine duties to the House.

Whereupon Motion made, and Question, "That the Chairman do report progress," put and agreed to.

House resumed.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow. Committee report progress.

PACKET SERVICE (TRANSFER OF CONTRACTS) BILL.—SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made and Question proposed "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. LYGON said, that the measure proposed to transfer the supervision of the mail contract service from the Admiralty to the Post Office, although the latter department had shown itself extremely slow in affording the public the facilities to which they were entitled. Moreover, this Bill was premature as it prejudged the question now before the Committee to whom the task of laying down the principles on which telegraphic and packet contracts should be conducted had been intrusted. If that Committee was to be of any use at all, this measure ought to be postponed until they had reported. He begged, therefore, to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made and Question proposed "That the Debate be now adjourned."

MR. KINNAIRD said, he should support the Second Reading of the Bill, as he maintained that the management of these contracts under the Admiralty was most expensive, and that it was highly desirable, in the interests of public economy, that the change now proposed should be effected without delay.

MR. LAING said, the measure raised no question as to the manner in which new contracts should be made, but merely transferred the supervision of existing contracts to the Post Office, the department to which such matters naturally belonged, as to it all complaints of irregularity in respect to the mails were in the first instance referred. The Board of Admiralty asked to have the transfer made, as they had quite enough of business of a more important kind to attend to. Moreover, the Committee thought it desirable that the Government should proceed on their own responsibility, and he hoped the House, therefore, would read the Bill a second time.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that the Post Office originally possessed the functions now proposed to be restored to it, when the system worked so ill that it was thought expedient to substitute for it the supervision of the Admiralty. The alteration now proposed was an important one, and ought not to be adopted until the Committee on packet contracts had made some recommendation.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that the Board of Admiralty was already overburdened with its own proper work in connection with the navy, and ought to be relieved of this extraneous branch of its duties. This business had been thrown upon the Admiralty at a time when the mail packets were vessels of war. But now that the conveyance of the mails was put out to contract and carried on in merchant vessels, there was no reason whatever why the Post Office, with the assistance of the Board of Trade, if necessary, should not discharge this duty.

MR. HOWES said, he wished to observe that the Committee on Packet Contracts thought they were not called upon to express an opinion on this subject, as the Government had undertaken the Bill on their own responsibility. The Committee doubted whether the matter was within the terms of the reference.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that the Bill did not bear upon the matters referred to the Committee on Packet Contracts. It was clear that whatever arrangements they might recommend would apply equally to the Post Office and Admiralty management. The transfer of these contracts was merely proposed for the convenience of the departments and in order that the public service might be better carried on.

MR. WHITESIDE said, he understood when the Committee was moved for, that it was for the purpose of having the advantage of their opinion.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he did not understand that such was the object.

MR. LYGON said, he would not trouble the House to divide. When the Bill went into Committee, however, he should propose that the Bill be referred to the Select Committee on Packet Contracts.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read 2^o, and committed for Monday next.

MEDICAL ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. WHITESIDE said, he rose to move the Second Reading of this Bill, which was intended to restore the University of Dublin the power of granting licences in surgery, which the University possessed 300 years ago, and which was omitted, he believed, by an accidental omission in the late Act for regulating medical degrees.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. CRAUFURD said, he should oppose the Bill, as he objected to any attempt to tinker up the general Act of 1858.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."

MR. CARDWELL said, the object of the Bill was to supply a casus omissus in the original Bill. He hoped the House would read the Bill a second time.

THE LORD ADVOCATE opposed the Bill, on the ground that it was an unnecessary innovation upon the principle laid down in 1858. It was likely to interfere with the proceedings of the Edinburgh School of Surgery.

MR. WHITESIDE said, he could not understand why Scotch Members should be so much interested in a measure that did not concern them. The original Act was not intended to interfere with the power possessed by any existing body to grant degrees which they at present conferred. It happened, however, that in the schedule appended to the Act the degree of "licentiate in surgery," which was granted by the University of Dublin, was accidentally omitted. The consequence was that several young gentlemen had won appointments as surgeons in the army and other departments by competitive examination, but they could not get a licence from their University.

MR. VANCE said, that last year he was instructed to oppose the Bill, but he was not on the present occasion. He was not aware whether there was any objection to it, but he thought the alteration ought to be confined to Dublin University.

Mr. LEFROY said, he should support the Bill, as it applied to no other College in Ireland than that of Dublin.

Mr. COWPER said, he did not exactly understand the case made out in favour of the Bill, but he thought it should be referred to the medical council to enable them to petition the House for or against it.

Mr. KINNAIRD considered it very unfair to press the Bill to a division at a late hour of the night, after Members had gone away in the expectation that no opposition would be taken.

Question, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question," put, and agreed to.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read 2^o, and committed for Monday next.

House adjourned at One o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, February 28, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—2^o Probate and Administration (India); Court of Chancery.

PLEA OF "NOT GUILTY."—PETITION.— PUNISHMENT OF BRIBERY.

EXPLANATION.

LORD BROUGHAM said, a petition had been entrusted to him from an important body, the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Society, signed by their respected President Mr. Beaumont, praying their Lordships, which he (Lord Brougham) had read, and which had been presented to the House. Its object was to inquire, on arraignment, or guilty, "the question, do you wish to be tried, or do you wish to be tried by a jury of solicitors and barristers?" and he could refer to the society advised from experience in the matter, and he could refer to the facts stated, in an instructive letter of the 10th of December, 1859, from Mr. Osborn, which contained a statement from the reverend authorities, with gaol chaplains, recorders, and other magistrates, showing clearly the mischievous effects of the present method of proceeding. He would take this opportunity of contradicting a statement which had been often made since the last Congress of the National Association of Social Science, and made under an entire mistake of what had passed there. He hardly ever had complained of such misstatements, nor would he now on his own account merely, but in justice to his colleagues of the Association, and in order to prevent the use made of the statement by the adversaries of all effectual measures to extirpate electoral corruption, he felt bound to set this matter right. It had been represented at different times, even since the Congress at Bradford, that he had recommended making bribery felony, and he saw in a respectable paper that morning (The Morning Post), wonder expressed that he (Lord Brougham) the reformer of the Criminal Law, and ex-President of its Society, should have fallen into such an error. Now, happily on this there could not possibly be any mistake; for the speech was not one about which different accounts or reports could be given by those who heard it, but it was an address written and delivered by him, being the annual address as President of Council of the Association, and he held in his hand that address as printed in their Transactions. He would read the words of the address as far as related to this subject. After relating his experience of the inefficacy of pecuniary penalties to check slave trading, which his Act of 1811 had effectually abolished, as carried on by British subjects, and he really believed that this reference had occasioned the mistake, but no one would think because slave trading, the most enormous crime, involving all the worst offences, of fraud, pillage, and even murder, was properly declared to be a felony, and punishable as such, that, therefore, the same penalty should be attached to bribery—or, on the contrary, the address expressly stated that it should be dealt with as a criminal misdemeanour, which it is, and made punishable as such, and that candidates and their agents would no longer be guilty of it when they found that they were liable to imprisonment with hard labour, and that the road from the hustings led not to the House of Commons, but to the treadmill. Not one word was said to recommend treating the offence as a felony. That those guilty of it, both those who took, and still more, they who gave bribes, were guilty in his view, that the poor men whom they bribed, that these were guilty of a most grievous offence, and one which sapped the very foundation of our constitution, was his deliberate opinion at the time he delivered the address, and this opinion had been confirmed by whatever had since passed. He felt quite convinced that the course recommended at the Congress, and to which no one had offered the least objection, must be pursued by those elsewhere and in their Lordships' House, if they were in earnest in their efforts to extirpate bribery. No other means had the least chance of proving effectual. But treating bribery as what it is, an infamous offence, and punishing it as such, would have the happy effect of putting it down.

CRIMINAL OUTRAGES IN IRELAND.

RETURNS MOVED FOR.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, that in moving for a number of Returns, of which he had given notice, connected with criminal outrages in Ireland, he wished to draw their Lordships' attention to the remarkable impunity with which offences and crimes of the gravest and most atrocious character were committed in certain parts of Ireland. The occurrence of such outrages was the more extraordinary, as that country presented an appearance of general improvement and increased prosperity within the last few years, such as had never before existed within the recollection, he believed, of any of their Lordships. The constituted authorities appeared perfectly unable to cope with the criminal tendencies of assassins in certain districts; and for this the Government—not the present or any particular Administration, but the State generally—were, in his opinion, to blame for not having paid due attention to the matter. The present condition of affairs was equally disgraceful to the people among whom such outrages were committed, and to the authorities of the State under which they could pass unpunished. He did not wish to weary their Lordships with a recital of all the cases of outrage which had occurred during the last few years, many of which must be fresh in their Lordships' recollection; but he might instance the recent attempt to assassinate Mr. Dunn in the streets of Tullamore, and the audacious attack which had been made only a few weeks ago upon a house at Lamplugh.

How was it, he would ask, that such crimes could be perpetrated with impunity in a country where there were 12,000 policemen and seventy-two magistrates? These circumstances had not passed without remark from the judicial bench. The Chief Baron, at the Westmeath Assizes, in July, 1858, in referring to the large amount of undetected crime which was known to exist in that quarter, declared his inability to understand how such a state of things could exist if the authorities did their duty, and expressed his opinion that much neglect and want of diligence had been exhibited. The Chief Justice of Ireland, in his charge to the grand jury at Tullamore, June 25, 1859, remarked with regret that the cases of unpunished crime and outrage which had occurred in the county since the last assizes were sixfold in comparison with those in which the offenders were made amenable. The police reported that seventeen cases of Whiteboy or agrarian outrage had been committed between the 2nd of March and the 17th of July, in two of which alone the criminals appeared to have been made amenable to the law. The Chief Justice added:—

“ Now, gentlemen, you have, I presume, magistrates and police. I presume they know their duty. I understand that the whole county has been proclaimed, and therefore extraordinary powers have been vested in the persons who are intrusted with the preservation of the peace. I do not know the purpose for which a police force is organized if it be not to prevent crime and outrage; very possibly no force may be able entirely to prevent the commission of crime; but at least the duty belongs to them of detecting and apprehending offenders and all who have disturbed the peace of your county. I am quite willing to presume that the persons to whom this duty has been delegated have attempted to perform it; but, with respect to the results, I regret to say they have been just the same as if the duty had not been performed at all. I hope that the purpose for which police constables have been organized and the usefulness of the office have not been merged in the éclat and renown to which, for some purpose or other, they may very laudably aspire, namely, the charm of a military body; but, unquestionably, the primary duty of the police constable is that of an officer for preserving the peace of the county, and—when he cannot preserve—of discovering, hunting out, tracing, and bringing to justice the offenders and disturbers of the peace. The offenders, in almost all instances, are perfectly well known; and how it happens that the police should be unable to get some tidings of, or find out some clue to the detection of these offenders, is to me a matter of wonder.”

The cause of this was the inefficiency of the police for the purposes for which they were originally constituted. He would read to the House a few statistics which would prove conclusively that crime was on the increase in the localities referred to, while convictions were less frequent than in past years. He held in his hand a return of the number of persons committed and convicted in Ireland for three years, up to the conclusion of 1858. In 1856, 2,063 persons were committed, 1,024 were convicted, and 1,039 were acquitted. In 1857, 2,153 were committed, 1,036 convicted, and 1,117 acquitted. In 1858 the number of persons committed was 2,058, and the number convicted only 895, leaving no less than 1,163 acquittals. He did not wish to throw any disparagement on the character of the Irish constabulary, who were, for their numbers, one of the best conducted bodies of men in the world. They were honest, sober, attentive, and the fault was not with them, but with those who had made them no longer a constabulary force, but practically soldiers. That they were as excellent a body of light infantry as could be found, he did not doubt; but they were taken from their duties as police, and they were thereby rendered incapable of doing the work of constables. What was the origin of this force, and what were they entitled upon their formation? They were first organized by the late Sir Robert Peel in 1814, who certainly never meant them to be a military force. The title of the Bill under which they were constituted was, "A Bill to provide for the better execution of the laws in Ireland, by appointing superintending magistrates and additional constables in counties in certain cases." When the last Act regulating this force was under discussion in 1836, the Duke of Wellington took the objection that unless care were taken the constabulary would become a military force in the hands of the Lord Lieutenant. The Prime Minister thereupon replied, that it was intended all through that they should be constables. Under the management, however, to which the police had been subjected they had become a military force, the first recognition of which was that when the Queen visited Ireland this force marched past her Majesty at a grand review in the Phoenix-park, Dublin, as part of the military force of Ireland. The whole of their drill and instruction was military, and was such as not only to give them no opportunities of discharging their duties as constables, but to prevent their efficiency as such. When a policeman joined the force he was brought up to Dublin for drill. No doubt the police ought to be drilled to a certain extent, to enable them to meet

The Marquess of Clanricarde bodies more numerous than themselves; but these men were dressed and accounted as soldiers, and were drilled as soldiers. The first duty of a policeman, it might be thought, was to make himself acquainted with every person in his parish and to go about among them. But the men were so confined to barracks as to prevent as much as possible any intercourse with the public. In point of fact if any constable were known to have any connexion or intercourse with the people, so far from being considered a useful man who was likely to detect criminals, he was regarded as a dangerous person, whose sympathies were with the people; it was thought that he was not to be depended upon, and he was removed from the scenes and persons who were familiar to him to a new district, and sometimes dismissed the force altogether. He did not think that the object of establishing a police force was simply to institute a sort of domestic military, altogether separate and cut off from the people, but these men were armed, and dressed, and kept in barracks just as if they were soldiers of the Royal army. This was a matter that Parliament had not yet considered; but it was one which ought to be dealt with without delay. Then there was a body of detectives, whose sole duty it was to detect crime; and when there were any disturbances or extraordinary crimes in the provinces these men were sent from the metropolis to parts of the country of which they knew no more than the London police would, and their appearance in a locality usually had the effect of exciting jealousy among the regular force; but such a system was necessary, because the local police being a sort of military body, were useless for the purposes of a detective police. There was an instance of a murder being committed on the borders of Clare and Galway, and one of these detectives was sent down. He appeared dressed like a gentleman, and instead of moving about in a judicious way in a different character among the peasantry to obtain information, he so demeaned himself that it became immediately known who he was. The consequence was that he could obtain no information whatever. But to make the absurdity greater, when about a year afterwards another grave offence committed in the same neighbourhood, the very same man, of course well-known to the people, was sent down to make inquiries. It was an important feature in this matter that so far from crime being prevalent in Ireland, so far from the people generally being disorderly, there was not on the face of the earth a population among whom there was so little general crime and immorality. He ventured to say that if returns of the amount of crime of all kinds were made, the statistics would reflect the highest honour on the Irish people. What he complained of was that where crime did exist the constituted authorities of the country were totally unable to deal with it, and that where it did not exist it was entirely due to the good conduct of the people themselves. He would say a word or two with respect to the stipendiary magistrates. When the Act of 1836 passed through Parliament there was a good deal of discussion about the appointment of this class of magistrates, and it was then contended that they were selected as men more likely to be able to deal with the crime of the country than the resident magistrates. But they were in a very anomalous and strange position, and their standing in reference to the resident magistrates was very ill-defined. The gentry of the country did not know in what light to regard them, and the consequence was, a very natural clashing of the duties of the two bodies. One effect of this appointment had been that the constabulary no longer looked upon the resident magistracy with the respect which they ought to do. In proof this he might cite the reply of a constable to a resident magistrate, a Member of the other House, when he found fault with some part of his conduct,—“I have given satisfaction to my superior officer, and that is enough for me.” The truth was that the stipendiary magistrates had superseded the local magistracy, and this reacted on the constabulary. It was a grave constitutional question whether this large constabulary force ought to be continued as an armed body; whether, in short, they were to be constables or soldiers. The force consisted of 12,184 men, with 316 horses, and they were all appointed by and under the control of the Lord Lieutenant. The cost, including the stipendiary magistrates, was upwards of £653,256, of which no less than £639,391 was chargeable on the Consolidated Fund, and £13,865 on counties and cities in Ireland. He believed that no corps d'élite in Europe formed a more admirable body of men than the 12,000 members of the Irish constabulary force. They were told to be soldiers, and they were excellent soldiers; and he felt persuaded that if they were told be constables they would be excellent constables. He did not object to their being armed and drilled, but he did object to their being taken away from the proper performance of their duties as a constabulary force, and converted into soldiers. The noble Marquess concluded by moving for a “Return of the Number of Offences against the Person reported to the Government by the Police in Ireland, and the Number of Individuals tried, the Number acquitted, and the Number committed for such Crimes, in each Year from the 1st January, 1850, to the 1st January, 1860: Also,

“Return of the Number of Cases in which the Irish Government offered Rewards for the Apprehension of Criminals in each of the above-mentioned Years, specifying the Number of Cases in which any such Reward was claimed and paid: Also,

“Return of the Number of Outrages reported in each of the last Seven Years in the Counties of Meath, Westmeath, and King's County, and the Number of Persons tried, with the Number of Convictions or Acquittals in those Years: Also,

“Return of the Amount of the Police stationed in those Counties in each of those Years, and of the Number of Stipendiary Magistrates: And also,

“Return of the Total Amount of the Constabulary Force in Ireland and of the Number of Stipendiary Magistrates, in each of the Years 1830, 1840, 1850, 1855, and 1859.”

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, that with the alteration of a very few words there would be no objection to producing the Returns moved for by the noble Marquess. He proposed that the words “for such crimes” in the first Return should be omitted, inasmuch as it would be impossible to conform to them without entailing a vast amount of unnecessary labour and loss of time. He would also recommend that the different Returns should be made out for the term of ten years, instead of for the varying intervals indicated in the Motion. He must, however, ask their Lordships not to be led away by the noble Marquess's speech, to the tenor of which there were grave objections. He (the Duke of Somerset) thought the Irish constabulary, for the time it had existed, had been a most useful force; and that anything that tended to reduce its efficiency would be regarded as a serious evil to Ireland. It was not enough to say that crimes had been committed, and that the persons who had committed them had escaped detection and punishment. In order to form a proper estimate of the value of the Irish police force, which might now be regarded as an institution of the country, it was necessary to look back to their services for a series of years; and, if their Lordships did that, they would be convinced that upon the whole those services had tended greatly to diminish crime. The nature of crime in Ireland as compared with that of England, and the manifest difference in the facilities for its detection in the two countries, were also to be borne in mind. In Ireland the mass of the population were disposed to protect the perpetration of the most common class of outrages; and their Lordships must recollect that a detective force was not all that was wanted to bring persons who had committed crime to trial and conviction; there must also be witnesses, and the great difficulty was to obtain witnesses. Crime in Ireland was of a peculiar character. It was generally crime against the person, and resulted from two causes—either from questions connected with land or with religion. Taking offences against the person, he would show their Lordships—looking back over a series of years—that crime had greatly diminished. In 1850 the offences specially reported to the Inspector General were 10,600; in 1851 they were reduced to 9,000; in 1855 to 4,000; in 1858 to 3,400; and in 1859 they amounted to 3,600. There had, therefore, been a great decrease in that class of crimes in ten years. Again, taking cases of homicide, in 1850 they amounted to 139; in 1858 they were reduced to 103; and in 1859 to 88. Of serious assaults, endangering life, there were, in 1850, 748; and since that time they had been reduced in some years and had increased in others. They were, therefore, unhappily, about as numerous now as they were ten years ago; but they arose in nearly every instance out of disputes connected with the tenure of land, and they were limited to a small portion of the country. In 1850 there were 7,000 cases of sheep and cattle stealing, and in 1858, 1,100. So that in that class of crime seen a remarkable diminution. could go through the whole crime, and show that under any which the noble Marquess because it had not tended to be, in reality crime had greatly and especially that of homicide. unlawful administration of an was formerly a common crime, atly diminished, as had those lation and sending threatening it distillation was formerly put down by a special revenue force had been done away, amalgamated with the constabulary of Somerset lary; and he (the Duke of Somerset) was informed by authorities connected with the revenue that illicit distillation had been more repressed by the constabulary than it had been before. The noble Marquess did not wish the Irish constabulary force to be soldiers; but as he understood the noble Marquess, he did not object to the constabulary being subjected to a certain amount of drill, inasmuch as that was necessary and valuable in the case of men who might be called on to act in bodies; but he did not clearly apprehend the exact amount of condemnation which the noble Marquess meant to bestow on the constabulary force. The detection of crime in Ireland materially depended on obtaining the necessary witnesses. But that was next to impossible, and crime would still continue so long as there prevailed among the people a determination not to support the law, but to uphold instead a hidden law of their own, controlling and overriding the law of the land. The noble Marquess objected to the constabulary being employed as detectives, because he said they set about their business in a very clumsy manner. That might be so, but he (the Duke of Somerset) had been informed that on one occasion, when a detective had been sent over to Ireland from England with a view to the discovery of the perpetrator of a crime in Dublin, he found the constabulary force had such superior means of obtaining information that he left the matter in their hands. He did not think the condemnation passed upon the police force of Ireland by the noble Marquess was a just one, and in agreeing to the Motion he wished it to be understood that he dissented from the opinion upon which it had been made. He should propose to amend the Motion by omitting from the first Return the words "for such crimes," and in the third substituting "ten" years for "seven."

THE MARQUESS OF LONDONDERRY thought that the constabulary should be placed more under the control of the local magistrates. At present they received their orders from head quarters, and they seemed to feel a good deal of jealousy about being interfered with by the local authorities.

EARL GREY thought it very likely that there existed too great a desire on the part of the chief of the force to turn the constabulary into a body of smart soldiers. But he agreed with the noble Duke that the failure in bringing criminals to justice in Ireland arose not from that cause, but from the sympathy manifested by the mass of the population with the perpetrators of agrarian outrages. The noble Marquess complained that the men were kept always in their uniform ; but that was likewise the case with the London force, with the exception of a certain number of men, who were allowed to appear in plain clothes on special occasions. The real cause of the impunity of crime was the reluctance of the population to appear against the perpetrators of offences. In fact, in some districts, the whole population sympathised with the criminal rather than with the police. In his opinion it would be necessary to carry further a principle they had already recognized by an Act passed in the year 1847, by which the Irish Government were enabled to station a body of police in any particular place at the expense of the district. That was a return to the old law of our Saxon ancestors, who made each district responsible for all the offences committed within it; and by that law peace and good order had at last been established. What he should recommend would be to lay a fine upon every district in which offences of a certain description were committed, to be levied not upon the owners of the property, but upon the occupiers, unless the offenders were brought to justice. Something must be done, for the bad spirit which they had hoped had been put down was reviving; and if they allowed that spirit to interfere with the schemes for the improvement of property which were beginning to be adopted, there was an end to all their hopes for the advancement of the country in wealth, in prosperity, and in civilization.

THE MARQUESS OF WESTMEATH said, he believed the returns which the noble Duke (the Duke of Somerset) had quoted, for the purpose of showing that crime had of late diminished in Ireland were calculated to mislead their Lordships. Since the month of July, 1858, there had been twelve murders committed in the county of Westmeath, and there had been only one conviction in these twelve cases, and that had only been a conviction for manslaughter. Three other persons, indeed, remained for trial at the next assizes. How then could it be said that there had of late been a diminution of crime in Ireland? The ribbon system was one of awful terror, and it was no wonder that under its operation witnesses were prevented from affording their aid to secure the ends of justice. He did not believe that anything like that system existed in any other country in Europe. He was persuaded that nothing but military law would be capable of dealing with that evil. He did not say that he would recommend the introduction of military law into Ireland; but he said that the evil was one that could only be dealt with by extraordinary means. Something should be done, for the country could not be left in the state in which it was at present placed.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE said, he thought it was too much the habit, in discussions of this nature, for noble Lords to quote the instances of their own exceptional localities, as showing the character of the whole country. When the noble Marquess, who spoke last, said that crime and outrage had increased, and were increasing, he gave utterance to a statement which was not borne out by the returns that had been made with regard to the country generally, however true it might be with regard to his own particular county. His noble Friend on the cross benches (Earl Grey) seemed to think that agrarian outrages had of late been on the increase, but he could assure his noble Friend that that was not the case. In proof that crime was generally decreasing he might mention that in 1851 there were twelve homicides of an agrarian character, while last year there were only four; that, in 1851 there were 133 serious assaults endangering life, and last year only nineteen. These facts must be satisfactory to their Lordships, and it certainly was unfair towards a country in which such progress had been made to infer that generally speaking there was now the same extent of crime as obtained when he was Secretary for Ireland and for some years subsequently. It was said that the police in Ireland assumed a somewhat military character. That, no doubt, was an evil to be guarded against; but no one would wish to reduce the Irish constabulary to the purely civilian character of the police in this country. He admitted, however, that the force ought not to be so purely military as to greatly impair its usefulness in detecting crime, and in aiding the law by the production of witnesses. It was true that there was often a lack of witnesses that enabled many criminals to escape, and doubtless a good constable could often bring forward a witness where an inefficient one would fail. A complaint had been made that the constabulary did not attend to the orders of the local magistrates. Now, of course, it was impossible for him to test exactly the justice of that complaint; but where a body had been organized under an efficient head it was absolutely necessary that they should take their orders from their own officers, and not from individual magistrates. He did not affirm that they should not be under the orders of the magistracy generally; but infinite confusion would result if each magistrate were able to give independent orders, and the constabulary would never know whom they were to obey. In England the same rule prevailed. It was the duty of the police to take orders from their Superintendents; and though this sometimes led to complaints, he was convinced that the more they were kept under the control of their own officers the better.

THE MARQUESS OF WESTMEATH said, he had not the slightest intention of making an attack on the Government, but simply to state what he knew to be the fact. If the law were powerful enough to give the people protection they would not want witnesses; but unfortunately it was not so.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, he had never intended to deny that there had been an immense decrease of crime in Ireland, which now was one of the most tranquil countries in Europe. As to England, she would come very badly off in comparison with the sister country. The homicides in England vastly exceeded those in Ireland, and horrible crimes were committed here which in Ireland were totally unknown. What he complained of was that the Irish police were unable to detect the crime which did exist there. According to the argument of the noble Duke, soldiers would do very well as a constabulary force in Ireland; but he (the Marquess of Clanricarde) maintained that soldiers could not be constables. There was at present great difficulty in procuring evidence; he admitted that; but the local constables, who had more liberty of action, and who knew the country and had greater intercourse with the population used to get evidence, and would do so again. Some time ago a murder was committed in Queen's County, according to rumour, by a man named Delany. This person absconded, and the police with all their exertions could not ascertain whither he had gone. Now, if there had been such a body of constables as used to exist, he believed it would have been impossible for Delany to have escaped. He did not object to the alterations proposed in the Returns.

Motion as amended agreed to.

Returns ordered.

The Duke of Newcastle

EMIGRATION FROM INDIA—THE FRENCH COLONIES.

QUESTION.

LORD HARRIS, after some prefatory remarks, which were inaudible, asked Her Majesty's Government, according to his notice,—

"1. Whether in a Treaty which, it is reported, is about to be ratified with France, and by which the Government of that Country will be authorized to appoint Emigration Agents at the Presidency or other Seaport Towns of India for the Purpose of obtaining Agricultural Labourers for the French Colonies, Care has been taken to ensure that the Laws, Rules, and Regulations respecting Emigrants from India to British Colonies at present existing, or as they may hereafter be modified, shall be fully enforced; and if so, by what means?"

"2. Whether Power has been retained to the Government of India temporarily to stop such Emigration should there be reason to suppose that the above Conditions had not been complied with?"

"3. Whether Provision has been made to ascertain by means of British Agents the Number of Natives of India (being Subjects of Her Majesty) actually resident in the French Colonies, with a view to learning their Condition and the Means afforded to them of returning to their Native Land?"

LORD WODEHOUSE said, he was glad the noble Lord had given him this opportunity of explaining how the matter stood because many persons connected with India were under a misapprehension as to what had been done and the nature of the experiment proposed to be made. The treaty was not yet signed, but the subject had been under the careful consideration not only of the office with which he was connected, but also of the Colonial Office and the Indian Government. The noble Lord was right in supposing that anxious consideration had been given to the establishment of rules and regulations to protect the emigrants from being oppressed, and to insure to them all the advantages to which they were entitled. He should like, before answering the noble Lord's Questions, to mention how this project of convention originated; for it was necessary to the due appreciation of the treaty to understand how the Government became engaged in the negotiations. They commenced before the late Government came into office, they had been continued under the noble Earl the late Secretary of State, and under the present Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and were at length likely to be brought to a conclusion. The object of the scheme was to do away, through its means, with that French system of exportation of Blacks from Africa which was well known to their Lordships. There was but one opinion as to that system, for, whatever regulations the French Government might lay down for the exportation of Blacks to their colonies, and whatever advantages the Blacks might enjoy when they arrived there, still it was inevitable that such a system of emigration must be attended with the continuance of the atrocious practice of man-hunting in Africa. Her Majesty's Government had continually remonstrated with the French Government against the prosecution of that scheme ; but the French Government very naturally replied (not admitting the scheme to be of the character imputed, that their colonies were in urgent want of labourers, while the English colonies had a constant supply from India, and they said, " Give us the same advantages, and we will put an end to emigration from Africa." It was therefore thought by successive Governments of Her Majesty a matter of importance to consider whether facilities could not be given to the French Government to obtain labourers from India. That was the origin of the negotiations. He would now proceed to answer the questions of the noble Lord. In the first place, the noble Lord asked what precautions had been taken to see that the regulations prescribed for the collection and care of emigrants to our own colonies were also observed in reference to emigrants to French colonies. As regarded British ports, precisely the same regulations would be observed. As regarded French ports in India there was a difference, because they were not in the territory of Her Majesty ; but it was provided that there should be consular agents at those ports (if they did not already exist there) who would have the power to see that the emigrants were placed on board under regulations which had been agreed upon between the two Governments, and that the rules which had been established for their conveyance should be carried into effect—that proper lists were delivered of all emigrants, and that contracts were delivered to them. He thought that such stringent rules were laid down that it was impossible the regulations should not be observed ; believing, as he did, without the least doubt, that the French authorities would carry them out with strict faith. He had omitted to mention that the appointment of the French agents employed in the collection of emigrants would be subject to the control of the British Government, from whom they would receive an authority equivalent to the exequatur given to a Foreign Consul. It was very well known that a considerable number of emigrants had already found their way to the French colony of Réunion. He understood, of 65,000 labourers now in that colony, 49,000 were Indians, and a very large portion subjects of Her Majesty. He understood, further, that these 49,000 were likely very soon to return to India, as their contracts had nearly expired, and so certain was it that a large number would leave, that the colony of Réunion was in great distress lest the supply of labour should entirely fail. It was of great importance in conducting emigration, especially an emigration passing through the tropics, that there should be strict regulations as to medical attendance and as to the number carried. The French regulations were not by any means as satisfactory as our own in that respect, although it appeared that in practice there had not been much sickness on board French emigrant vessels. But it had been agreed that the French regulations should be assimilated to ours, and in consequence there would be some changes, but fit and proper changes, in the English regulations. The regulations would then be substantially the same for emigrants transported either in French or English ships conveyed either to French or English colonies. With regard to the regulations respecting the condition of the emigrants in the French colonies, the matter had been very carefully examined, and it was found that the regulations in Martinique were of a satisfactory nature ; and it was, therefore, provided in the treaty that the regulations in Martinique and no other should be put in force in all the French colonies. The principal stipulations in the contracts were, that they should not be for more than five years ; that, at the end of the five years, a free passage should be allowed at the expense of the French Government to their own homes ;—that was also the usual stipulations as to their families ; and it was arranged that there should be a proper proportion of women to men. These stipulations were of the same character as had been found completely successful in our own colonies. The noble Lord was anxious to know what measures were taken to see that these provisions were carried out. Consuls would be appointed for the purpose, where there were not already British Consuls, in the colonies to which the emigration took place. The Consuls would be required to obtain all particulars which might be useful to the Government, as to the number of emigrants, the number of deaths on the voyage, the number of deaths during the term of the contracts, and the changes of masters which might be made during the time the emigrants were working in the colony; and it was also provided that the emigrants should have access at all times to the Consul, so that if they had any complaints, those complaints might be made known. The other question was, whether there was a provision in the treaty enabling the Indian Government to put a stop at any time to this emigration. Practically if such a power were retained, the treaty would be of little use, because it was obvious that if the planters were liable at any moment to have the emigration suddenly stopped, they could not calculate upon a constant supply of labour, and it might happen that the Indian Government might stop it upon information which turned out not to warrant such a step. The only practical mode was to limit the operation of the treaty; and it was intended that the treaty should be in force at first for $3\frac{1}{2}$ years—for two years, and $1\frac{1}{2}$ year's notice—and afterwards be liable to be terminated by $1\frac{1}{2}$ year's notice. It was absolutely necessary that the notice should be rather long, or the planters might be embarrassed by a sudden cessation in the supply of labour. The noble Lord had referred to the position of exequatur in Réunion, and had inquired whether Her Majesty's Government were in possession of undoubted information on this point. The Government had received some information with regard to Réunion—not so ample as might have been given, but as far as it went it did not lead them to think that the labourers were ill-treated. At the same time, as there was so much emigration to French colonies, without any treaty, it was important it should be recognized by treaty, that they might be able to see that the subjects of the Queen were properly treated in French colonies. They might rely upon it that it would be the interest of the French planters and Government to see that the emigration was satisfactory to the English Government; because if it were not, the treaty would not be renewed, and the advantage of a constant supply of labour would be lost. He admitted that this was an experiment to be vigilantly guarded and carefully watched; but if it were found to put a stop to what was called emigration from Africa, and to establish emigration to the French colonies the same as to our own, it would accomplish an object which was worth some risk, and that there was some risk he did not wish to deny.

Lord Wodehouse

THE EARL OF DERBY said, the noble Lord had stated what were the causes which had led to this treaty very clearly. As far as he (the Earl of Derby) could make out the provisions were almost precisely the same as those of a treaty which had been in the course of negotiation by the late Government. The subject, however, was one which needed carefully to be watched; but he thought the Government would be justified in entering into the treaty, when it was accompanied by proper precautions. The noble Lord stated that one object of the treaty was to supply the deficiency of labour in the French colonies caused by the discontinuance of African immigration; he (the Earl of Derby) did not collect whether there was any stipulation in the treaty as to the discontinuance of that immigration.

LORD WODEHOUSE said, that was obviously the cardinal point upon which the whole treaty turned. The provision was not to be found in the treaty itself, but it was the subject of a distinct agreement with the French Government in such a manner that he had not the least apprehension that we should be deprived of the advantages which we expected. There was some difficulty in making it a provision in the treaty that other emigration should cease, as that was a matter of French internal and municipal regulation. But the subject was under the most anxious consideration of Her Majesty's Government, and they would see that the treaty was not concluded until the point was sufficiently guarded.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, he now heard for the first time, and with regret, that there was any intention of forming a treaty with France on the basis described by the noble Lord, and earnestly hoped that a reconsideration of all the circumstances of the case would induce the Government to abandon it. No one could be more anxious to guard the emigrants in the Mauritius than the noble Earl who had just spoken, with whom all the measures for their protection originated; and at present every precaution was taken to provide for the comfort and protection of the emigrants from India to the Mauritius, both during the voyage and on their arrival in the colony. But it was practically impossible to provide in any treaty for the adequate protection of our subjects in a French colony. No matter what provisions were made in the treaty, their fulfilment would ultimately depend not only on the good faith of the French Government, but also on the loyalty and honesty of the persons who were to carry out the orders of that Government in the colony. What protection had they moreover that the law in the French colonies would not be changed? It had been said that the object of the arrangement was to induce the French to desist from the practice of taking the blacks from the coast of Africa, nominally as labourers but practically as slaves; but with all his sympathy for the Africans, he was not prepared to relieve them by the sacrifice of our own subjects in India. He would never consent to subject our own people, who ought to be our constant care, to the very miseries from which we desired to free the blacks of Africa. He did not believe the treaty, if concluded, could be carried into effect without the assistance of the Legislative Council of India, and he had no doubt that body possessed sufficient independence of spirit to bestow upon the Natives that protection which Her Majesty's Government were apparently not disposed to afford. Her Majesty had no power to compel the Government of India either to pass a new or to alter an old law; and it must, therefore, rest with the Government of India to consider whether they could obey the directions of the home Government with safety to the State and to the interests of the people committed to their charge. As the law now stood, the Indian Government could, without further legislation, refuse to permit the embarkation of emigrants in any ship; and he hoped they would retain that power in their hands. The home Government could not deprive them of that power, except by a measure sanctioned by Parliament, which he hoped and trusted would never be agreed to. He repeated his conviction that it would be humanly impossible to insure the same protection to the emigrants in a French as in our own colony. It could only be attempted by constant interference, which must necessarily lead to contention between the two countries. He trusted that the feeling which the proposition of this treaty would excite in India would be such as to compel the Government to bring the subject before Parliament in the shape of a Bill, and he was confident that if they did, it would be rejected.

EARL GREY agreed with the noble Earl who had just spoken, that if the proposed agreement were carried out care must be taken to guard against the danger of abuse. He believed that the present system of Coolie emigration from India to the Mauritius had conferred a benefit upon both emigrants and colonists. The enormous increase in the production of sugar in the Mauritius was entirely due to the well-regulated system of bringing emigrants to that colony; and that it was advantageous to the Coolies themselves was proved by the large sums of money they were able to carry back to India, and their satisfaction with the treatment they received was such that it was no uncommon thing for them to bring their friends and relatives from India to join them in the colony. This plan of emigration did good to India in another way, because when the emigrants returned they brought with them a knowledge of a better system of agriculture, and improved modes of labour, which they would not fail gradually to introduce upon their own soil, and habits of perseverance and industry which have a beneficial effect on the inhabitants of their own countries. He was ready to admit that we had not the means of enforcing the same protection to the emigrants in a French colony that we had in one of our own; but he thought that the powers which we possessed of terminating the treaty at eighteen months' notice was a sufficient answer to the noble Earl's objections, because the knowledge that that power would be exercised would render the French colonists very careful how they did anything to excite our indignation, and induce us to put it into operation. The appointment of agents on the spot, the presence of English Consuls in the French colonies, to whom the emigrants were secured access, was also another security for the good treatment of the emigrants; and, on the whole, he felt the system was one that ought to be fairly tried. He might mention that he had reason to believe, from persons who had visited the interior of the French colonies, that the labourers, when they arrived there, were, on the whole, well treated. He would approve of the plan only on one condition. Her Majesty's Government ought to insist, before a single labourer went to the French colonies from India, that most atrocious system of opening places for the reception of slaves on the coast of Africa, under the direct authority of the French Government, should be at once abandoned. The more he heard of the working of this system the more he was convinced of its atrocity. The French Government opened what they called "depôts of industry" on the African coast. They bought the slaves who were brought down to them. For the purpose of supplying these depôts, slave-hunts were instituted, and industrious populations in the interior were liable to be kidnapped, and hundreds and thousands were killed in wars in order to bring a few hundreds to the French depôts. The French Government were at this moment the great slave-traders of Africa, and Her Majesty's Government would desert their duty if they did not take care that, before the French Government were allowed to obtain the advantages given under this treaty, the most complete security should be taken for the abandonment of this most atrocious system.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON thought that there were one or two points on which it was most important they should have explanation. He wished to know whether there was any stringent stipulations for the re-conveyance of the Coolies back to their own country; for if there were not the result would be exceedingly unfortunate. His noble Friend used an expression which created great apprehension in his mind. He alluded to the amount of space on board the ship which conveyed the Coolies. In the case of an English ship it was one emigrant to two tons, but in French ships it was two emigrants to two tons. He understood that the matter was under consideration, but he was afraid that our regulations were to be relaxed to meet the French. The contracts with the Coolies were said to be of five years' duration; he wished to know whether they would be absolute contracts, or whether power would be given to the Coolies after three years' service, to change their masters. He thought that the Government would not be doing its duty if it did not throw around the Coolies every possible protection in their power.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE said, that the noble Earl who had condemned this treaty (the Earl of Ellenborough), stated that he now heard of it for the first time; he (the Duke of Newcastle) was not, therefore, surprised at the views which the noble Earl had expressed, for when he, too, first heard of it his impressions were very unfavourable, and he had not sufficiently appreciated its advantages. The noble Earl stated that although the law in the French colonies might be perfectly good at the present moment, it was in the power of France to alter that law, and to render it less favourable to the Coolies. But the possibility of any such alteration was obviated by the treaty. It was ascertained that the law of Martinique was as favourable to the Coolies as the law in the British colonies, and the treaty contained a provision that the laws of the other French colonies should be in this respect assimilated to that of Martinique. It was therefore impossible for the French Government, without violating the treaty and committing a breach of faith, to alter the law in a manner unfavourable to the Coolies. The noble Earl also declared that he was not ready to sacrifice the subjects of Great Britain in India, in order to save the blacks in Africa. He was astonished to hear this opinion, in which he heartily concurred, put forward as an objection, because although the treaty arose out of the attempt on the part of France to revive the slave trade on the coast of Africa, yet it must not be forgotten that there existed a state of things in the French colonies which might justify the treaty apart from what had taken place on the African coast. In the Island of Réunion, out of 69,000 labourers not less than 49,000 were Coolies. The noble Earl, therefore, should not forget that the French had the power of introducing British subjects into their colonies without our permission, and that at present we had no power of interfering for their protection through our Consuls. But by the Treaty we obtained a better position for them, or at least as good as for emigrants to our own colonies. Pains had been taken to ascertain the condition and state of the law regarding labourers in two of the French colonies—Martinique and Réunion—and the reports thus obtained were certainly favourable as to the treatment of the labourers. The great difficulty, no doubt, lay in the colonies themselves. As regarded the depôts in India, and the transmission of the Coolies across the seas, the English Government had sufficient means of securing that the treatment of the Coolies who emigrated to French colonies should be identical with that of the emigrants to British colonies. Under the treaty provision was taken that the Coolies should not only have free access to our Consuls, but that the French authorities should be obliged to give ample returns to our Consuls of the number of Coolies in each colony, the time of their service, the mortality among them, and a very considerable number of details which gave a fair, if not entire, security for the treatment of these emigrants. His noble Friend opposite (Earl Grey) said, he assented to the treaty on one condition—namely, that the emigration from Africa now carried on under the French Government should entirely cease. That condition was not introduced into the treaty, as they were met when they proposed it by the argument that it would be an indignity to France to interfere with its municipal law; but if there was faith in men they were entitled to assume on promises made apart from the treaty that emigration, so far as regarded the East Coast of Africa, would cease immediately; but that as regarded the West Coast, in consequence of an existing contract, it would not cease till about a year from this time. His noble Friend who spoke last asked whether security had been taken for return passages to the Coolies. His reply was that an express provision was made in the treaty to that effect. His noble Friend also asked whether the five years' contract with the Coolies was identical with our own, and whether there was a limitation of three years. In respect to this he might state that on some minor points there were slight differences in the French contract from our own, but these were all compensated for by corresponding concessions. His impression was that the period of five years in the French contract was absolute. With regard to the space allowed to each Coolie in the French vessels, it would not be so great as had hitherto been allowed in our emigration ships. Our Emigration Commissioners had for the last two years been considering whether, in the case of ships conveying emigrants to our own colonies, some diminution of the space now given—which was twelve superficial feet for each adult, and six feet between decks—should not take place; and in the case of the French ships some diminution had, therefore, been admitted from our present standard. This was not a concession to the French against the convictions of Her Majesty's Government, but one that flowed from the suggestion of our own Emigration Commissioners. He could assure their Lordships that everything had been done that was deemed necessary to insure the comfort of the Coolies, and that the operations of the whole project would be watched with the most careful attention. The treaty, it was arranged, might be terminated on a notice being given of eighteen months.

Earl Grey

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH called the attention of the noble Earl to the practical effect which giving notice of the termination of the treaty would have upon the Coolies. It was clear that after the treaty terminated the Coolies in a French colony would cease to have the protection which it extended to them; and it might happen that many Coolies who had entered into the five years' contract would have to spend some years of the period without the security they had counted upon enjoying.

House adjourned at Eight o'clock,
till To-morrow, half-past
Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, February 28, 1860.

MR. POPE HENNESSY AND THE COMMITTEE OF SELECTION.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN reported from the Committee of Selection,—

"That on the 17th of February instant they appointed a Committee on Group No. 1 of Railway Bills, and gave to each Member sufficient notice of his appointment, and transmitted to each Member a blank form of the Declaration required, with a request that he would forthwith return it, with his signature attached.

"That Mr. John Pope Hennessy was one of the Members so appointed, but that they have not received from him either the aforesaid Declaration, or any excuse in lieu thereof.

"The Committee of Selection have therefore, in conformity with the 91st Standing Order, to report the name of Mr. John Pope Hennessy to the House."

The Committee of Selection had a very invidious duty to perform in nominating Members to serve on private Committees, and they took every means in their power to ascertain at what period of the Session it was most convenient for Members to serve. This had been done in reference to all the Members who had been nominated to serve on the Select Committee on Group No. 1 of Railway Bills. The Committee had met that morning, and one of the Members not being present, the Committee could not proceed to business, the consequence of which was that the parties had been put to an expense of at least £300. He was sorry to say that this was a case of considerable aggravation. The Messenger who carried the summons had placed it in the hands of the hon. Member for King's County himself; and two or three messages had been sent to him since to see that the Orders of the House were complied with. It was not until that morning, when there was no possibility of getting over the difficulty, that the hon. Gentleman was not present, the Committee had in consequence to be broken up, and the expenses were thrown away. No doubt the hon. Gentleman was a young Member of the House, but at the same time it was absolutely necessary that hon. Members should make themselves acquainted with the rules of the House, in order to prevent the inconvenience and expense which was incurred by such neglect.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. John Pope Hennessy do attend the Committee on Group No. 1 of Railway Bills forthwith."

MR. RIDLEY, as one of the Members of the Committee, begged to say that he had had a calculation of the expenses to which the parties would be put by the non-attendance of the hon. Member placed in his hand, from which it appeared that the expenses of Counsel, Agents, and Engineers, would be £266, of other witnesses £54, making £320; besides other expenses, which would bring up the sum to at least £400.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, he thought the course proposed to be pursued was most inadequate. It was really too bad, considering the pains which the hon. and gallant Member (Colonel Wilson Patten) took to consult the convenience of Members, that any hon. Gentleman who had really received due notice of his nomination, should put parties to such expense by neglecting to attend. Some further reparation did certainly seem necessary to be made on the first blush of the case, and he had expected to hear the hon. and gallant Member move that the absentee be ordered to attend in his place in the House immediately. Nothing short of that course ought to be pursued, and he would therefore move—"That Mr. John Pope Hennessy be ordered to attend this House in his place."

Colonel Wilson Patten

Amendment proposed, to leave out the words "the Committee on Group No. 1 of Railway Bills," in order to insert the words "this House in his place," instead thereof.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, he understood the hon. Gentleman had just gone to Ireland, and it could not therefore make any difference whether he were ordered to attend in his place in the Committee or in the House.

Question "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and negatived.

Words inserted.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Ordered,

"That Mr. John Pope Hennessy do attend this House in his place forthwith."

Ordered,

"That the Committee on Group No. 1 of Railway Bills have leave to sit and proceed to business To-morrow, at Eleven of the clock, notwithstanding the Declaration required by the 94th Standing Order has not been signed by Mr. John Pope Hennessy, one of the Members of such Committee."

COLLECTION OF TAXES.

QUESTION.

In reply to Mr. T. DUNCOMBE,

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER stated that Her Majesty's Government had no intention of proposing a measure for the universal and compulsory transfer of the collection of any of the Queen's Taxes to Government Officers. But in particular parts of the country a desire appeared to exist on the part of the local authorities to have the power of devolving the collection on the Queen's Officers; and a Bill, therefore, would probably be introduced in the course of the present Session to authorize this voluntary transfer in cases in which it was considered desirable. With regard to the order in which the Resolutions would be proposed in the Committee, it was intended that the Resolution on the Spirit Duties should be postponed till the last of the Resolutions having reference to the Treaty with France. Next to the Resolutions on the Wine Duties, he would move that referring to manufactured goods.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE stated that he would amend the Resolution of which he had given notice on the Spirit Duties. Instead of moving that the Duty on Foreign Spirits be raised to 10s. per gallon, he would propose that it be fixed at 9s. instead of 8s. 6d.

POSTAL RATES.

QUESTION.

MR. DAWSON said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he is prepared to consider the propriety of commencing the scale for the transmission of printed matter at a Halfpenny Stamp for the first two ounces in weight.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the question of the hon. Member was rather ambiguous in its wording. If it were intended to ask him whether he had considered the subject, he would reply that he had done so repeatedly and at great length; but if it were sought to know what his intentions were on the point, he thought it would be better to reserve his answer until he could state all the reasons which had led him to the decision at which he had arrived.

ANNEXATION OF SAVOY TO FRANCE.

QUESTION.

MR. MONCKTON MILNES said, he wished to ask the hon. and learned Member for Bridgwater (Mr. Kinglake), Whether the willingness which Her Majesty's Government had shown to lay on the table certain papers connected with the question of Savoy would not alter his view as to the propriety of bringing forward that evening the Motion of which he had given notice, and which, in the absence of those papers, could be only supported by matters of rumour.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he did not think there was any ground for adjourning this question. He would appeal to both sides of the House if it were right that the hon. and learned Member for Bridgwater, in the course which he proposed to take, should be subjected to the pressure that had been put upon him. He should be sorry to see his hon. Friend (Mr. Milnes) defeated on two consecutive nights, but on this occasion he certainly did not represent the feelings or the wishes of the House. A week ago the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs had requested the hon. and learned Member for Bridgwater to adjourn the Motion, and, on a subsequent occasion, when a question was asked, he said he would defer his answer till that evening, when there would be a full opportunity of discussing the subject. With regard to the rumours alluded to by the hon. Gentleman, he was sorry to say he believed they were facts. The question of the annexation of Savoy had been discussed in the other House of Parliament in the absence of any papers on the subject; and if they were to make their non-production a ground for postponing the Motion, the public would begin to believe that the House of Commons had absolved themselves from discussing questions of public policy altogether, and had relinquished them to the other House. He conceived that the present was the proper time for entering into the discussion, and he should have thought that the Government would rejoice at the opportunity of entering into those explanations and affording those assurances which would place their conduct in a fair and intelligible light before the public. Owing, probably, to want of information the conduct of the Government had been canvassed in no very favourable manner; but by the result of the discussion the merits of the case must be disclosed, and he was convinced that if the conduct of the Government had been straightforward and manly, the House of Commons would confirm the view which they had taken, and the result would be rather to strengthen their hands than otherwise.

MR. SPEAKER: As the hon. Baronet has not concluded with a Motion his observations have been irregular.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: I beg to conclude by moving the adjournment of the House.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: In answer to the appeal made to me by the hon. Baronet who has just sat down, I have to state that I certainly shall not renew the application which I made to my hon. and learned Friend to postpone this Motion, either on account of injury to the public service or of any public inconvenience which would ensue from the discussion of such a Motion. But there certainly is this consideration, which I think has a great deal to do with the fair discussion of the subject, that the papers are not before the House; and although when my hon. and learned Friend formerly proposed to enter into this question I was not in a position to produce them, if the hon. Gentleman were now to move for the production of copies or extracts from the correspondence which has taken place between Her Majesty's Government and that of the Emperor of the French on this subject. I should have no difficulty in complying with that Motion. And if, as stated by the hon. Baronet, the question is to be whether the Government has behaved well or ill, and has sustained the character of the country, I do think the House would be in a much better position to act if the papers were before them. It will also be in the recollection of hon. Members who were present last night that the House, having been engaged for some hours in the consideration of questions arising out of the Commercial Treaty, and of articles of Customs relating to them, was of opinion that it would be desirable to proceed to-night with other propositions in relation to that subject. That does seem to me a reason for postponing the discussion on public grounds until after the papers have been produced. There was a hon. and gallant Gentleman (Captain Leicester Vernon) who had precedence of my hon. and learned Friend, and it must be admitted that the question raised by his Motion was one of great importance, and one which I dare say many persons are anxious to see determined; but he very fairly postponed it in order that the business to which I have alluded might be proceeded with. Of course it is for the hon. and learned Gentleman himself to decide whether he will proceed with his Motion.

MR. KINGLAKE said, he would at once admit that if the object of his Motion were to convey any real or implied censure on Her Majesty's Government, it would be most unbecoming in the House to proceed without those papers which were about to be produced, and which would disclose the true nature of the negotiations in which Her Majesty's Ministers had been engaged. But as their absence was the only ground advanced in support of the appeal made to him by the hon. Member for Pontefract, he must say that, according to the information which he had received, time was of vital moment in this matter. If the noble Lord had been able to make any statement which would have the effect of assuring him that on a future day the House would stand in exactly the same position as at present, he might have been induced to delay his Motion; but in the absence of such an assurance, however painful it might be to him personally, he conceived that he ought to persevere in his Motion.

Motion put and negatived.

Lord John Russell

ANNEXATION OF SAVOY AND NICE TO FRANCE.

PAPERS MOVED FOR.

MR. KINGLAKE said, he then rose to move for the production of the Correspondence between Her Majesty's Government and the Governments of France and Sardinia in respect to the proposal for annexing Savoy and Nice to the empire of France. He wished to call the attention of the House to this rumoured annexation; but he would endeavour from the outset to confine himself strictly to the subject in hand—not that there were not many neighbouring topics of great interest and importance, but because, by so limiting himself to the question, he should best achieve the main object of his Motion, which was an expression of opinion on the part of the House, almost, if not entirely, unanimous. The rumour of an annexation had arisen in a strange manner, and he had found extreme difficulty in discovering its origin. Here were two countries side by side, the sovereigns of both living, as far as we know, on terms of amity and friendship; they were comrades and allies in the Italian war, and he was not aware of any grounds on which the one should be supposed to be seeking to despoil the other. Yet suddenly it became known or believed that a portion of the provinces of Sardinia were by some process or other to be transferred to France. In the autumn of last year he had received a communication from Paris, which was very short and pithy. It was in these words:—"Savoy and Nice are to be annexed by universal suffrage." He had not, therefore, been taken by surprise, and the House would see by and by how it was he was not much startled by this announcement. The rumour spread abroad and gathered strength, and in the early part of the present year the impression that these provinces were to be severed from the territory of Sardinia became so general that the loyal subjects of Sardinia, both in Savoy and Nice, began to think it time to express their fidelity to the King of Sardinia. They accordingly met in large numbers in Chambery, brought out their ancient banners, and in a firm but respectful manner asserted the unaltered loyalty with which they clung to the ancient house of Savoy. A similar demonstration took place in the county, or, more strictly speaking, in the city of Nice. He should have thought if any public act could be more than another justifiable, it would be this act of loyal subjects of their king meeting together, not for the purpose of raising a disturbance or expressing discontent, but to exhibit their loyalty, not to an exiled king, but their reigning Sovereign. These loyal demonstrations on the part of the people of Savoy soon called forth angry denunciations from the organs of the Parisian press supposed to speak with more or less precision the views of the Imperial Government. The Patrie said :—

“Two measures cannot be applied to Savoy and to Italy. . . . We have a right to demand a cessation of this intolerable state of affairs, and equal justice for all. People will then see that the real inspirations of Savoy and Nice are for France.”

In the time of the old French Revolution moderation was made a crime; but he had never before heard it charged as a crime against a people, that they had clung with loyalty to the actual ruler under whom they lived. These menaces, if he might so call them, issuing from the official or semi-official press, produced a great deal of alarm. It was in some degree mitigated, but not altogether allayed, by the following curious statement made by the Constitutionnel, in that part of the paper which indicated that the writer expressed the views of the Imperial Government :—

“The report going the round of the journals relative to the annexation of Savoy and Nice to France is but the result of a presentiment of public opinion, and a statement based on the logic of facts. The press has been struck by the attraction felt by the population of Savoy towards France, and by the justice of a measure which, at the moment when Piedmont is to be singularly aggrandized, would give France a geographical frontier. But this unanimous tendency of the press remains completely without official impulse. What Savoy wishes for, what France desires, does not appear doubtful; but what the Government will and can do remains hidden under the veil of diplomacy. Those who assert that the affair is settled are no better informed than those who say that it will not take place. The Emperor is the scrupulous defender of the essential conditions which insure and guarantee the European equilibrium, and will certainly not allow them to be altered, either to his own detriment or that of others.”

This article left the question altogether in doubt. On the 7th of February a discussion took place in that House on the question; and it then became known, from the statement of a Minister of the C that the annexation of these two p France had been the subject of n As to the principles on which ti tion was founded, they were of a nature that it was difficult to say to what country they might not be applied. It was said for instance that the people of Savoy spoke the language of France. Where was that principle to stop? If the consent of Europe to the annexation was sought on account of the sympathies of the people of Savoy with France, the people had themselves given a most distinct answer to that proposition. They have evinced a strong determination to remain subjects of the King of Sardinia. He would not trouble the House with reading the touching declarations published at Chambéry; one was addressed to the people of England, the other to the King of Sardinia; but the House might learn from those declarations with what feeling the people of Savoy were animated. On the other hand the objections on European grounds against the scheme were of the most stringent character. In the first place, the northern portion of Savoy—that was to say, that portion of it that consisted of Chablais, Faucigny, and Genevois—was not, in the full and complete sense of the term, part of the kingdom of Sardinia; the fact being that for all European purposes those provinces belonged to Switzerland, and that the great Powers at the settlement of 1815 had guaranteed the neutrality of the whole of those provinces with the same completeness and anxiety with which they had guaranteed to Europe the neutrality and integrity of Switzerland herself. If, then, the northern part of Savoy were to become a portion of the territory of France, what, he should like to know, would become of the neutrality which had been thus guaranteed? Would not France, were she to become possessed of this department of Mont Blanc, as he believed it was intended to be called, be in a position to march her troops across it with a directness which was not at present the case; would she not for military purposes envelop Switzerland, and would not the security which Europe sought to obtain by the neutrality of Switzerland, under these circumstances be almost completely at an end? For his own part, he was prepared to contend that if there were one circumstance to which more than another it was due that this happy part of the world had not been desolated by conquest, it was the fact that in a central part of the Continent there rejoiced to hear from the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs in that decisive language, of which he was so great a master, a few days ago, that by that guarantee the Government of this country was determined to abide. Now, however, that we had it established that the neutrality of Switzerland was to be maintained, it clearly followed that the frontiers of that country on the side of Savoy ought to be upheld undisturbed, so that the integrity of Switzerland might with the greatest advantage be secured. Let any man cast his eye over the map of that part of Europe to which he referred, and he would see at a glance the danger with which the integrity of Switzerland would be menaced if the contemplated annexation of Savoy to France were to take place. She would, in fact, be jammed in between the fangs, so to speak, of two departments of France, and the maintenance of her neutrality would, he thought, be under such circumstances almost a geographical impossibility. There was, however, even a still more important view of the question which he wished to submit to the House, and one with respect to which, as far as he was aware, very false ideas seemed to be entertained. He had heard it frequently stated that treaties—since those which had been entered into in 1815—had been thought so little of, and had been so frequently violated, that we need not make ourselves very anxious about their exact observance in particular instances. Now, he could understand the way in which an erroneous view of that kind had originated, but he hoped he should be able to satisfy the House that that sort of cynical indifference to the obligations which treaties imposed had at all events no application to the engagements by which we were bound in the case of those provinces which bordered on France. Many of the engagements which had been entered into at the settlement of 1815—such, for instance, as the constitution of the republic of Cracow—might be regarded in the light to which he alluded; for, although each and all the Powers which had been parties to that particular engagement had an undoubted right to remonstrate against its violation, yet they were under no obligation to take any active steps in case such violation took place. The same might be said with respect to the Italian States. There was another class of treaties by which the ownership and enjoyment of her territories was specifically guaranteed to an independent country, as, for instance, was the case of Switzerland. There was, however, a third and a more important class of treaties, under which category came that by which this country had guaranteed, not that Savoy and Nice should be part of Sardinia, or that the Rhenish provinces should always belong to Prussia, but that those provinces verging as they did on the borders of France should not be annexed to the French Empire. That being so, a definitive treaty which had been signed between France and the Allied Powers on the 20th of November, 1815, provided by its first article that the frontiers of France should be the same as they had been in the year 1790, save so far as related to such modifications on one side or the other as were detailed in the article itself. The article then went on to describe the frontiers of France exactly as they stood at the present moment. Now, if the matter had rested at that point, the neutrality of Switzerland would have rested on the same footing as the security of the republic of Cracow or that of many other States of Europe to which no special guarantee applied; but the time was not one in which the four great Powers of Europe were disposed to leave it to the mere whim of other Powers to decide whether they would or would not acquiesce at some future day in an alteration of the frontiers of France; and accordingly, by the use of the most stringent language, and by the most stringent process known to diplomacy, every one of the four great Powers had been made to engage by separate Treaty one with the other that it would maintain in its full force and vigour the particular treaty which he had just mentioned. Another treaty had, therefore, been signed at Paris on the 20th of November, 1815, between this country and Austria, the object of which was declared to be “to fix beforehand, by a solemn treaty, the principles which they (the two Powers concerned) proposed to follow in order to guarantee Europe from the dangers by which she may still be menaced.” The first Article of the Treaty was as follows:—

Mr. Kinglake

“The High Contracting Parties reciprocally promise to maintain in its full force and vigour the treaty signed this day with His Most Christian Majesty, and to see that the stipulations of the said treaty, as well as those of the particular conventions which have reference thereto, shall be strictly and faithfully executed in their fullest extent.”

A treaty in precisely the same words had been entered into with Russia and Prussia, and it was somewhat curious that, by a protocol which was written nearly at the same time, it was provided that the King of Sardinia should receive out of the common fund under the control of the great Powers a sum of 10,000,000 francs, to be laid out upon the strengthening of the Sardinian fortifications on the French side, so that it appeared they were not satisfied with simply giving him the territories in question in trust, as it were, for the rest of Europe. Now, what he wished the House specially to observe was the effect which the annexation of Nice and Savoy to France would be calculated to have upon that which, he supposed, was dear to every hon. Member at the present moment—our freedom of action. As matters at present stood, it was competent to us to stand aloof from the great Continental struggles, and to come to a calm determination as to whether we should or should not take any part in those contests. If the proposed annexation, however, took place, our freedom of action would have departed for ever, for no sooner would it have been accomplished than the casus foederis would have been complete, and Austria or Russia or Prussia might call upon us separately, and without joint action, to fulfil our treaty engagements. If, therefore, this country were desirous not to be forced against her will into European complications, or not to expose herself to the liability of rendering herself liable to the charge of dishonour for not having abided by her obligations, it was of the deepest importance that Savoy should not be added to the French Empire. He, for one, could not consent to forget that the kingdom of Sardinia was governed in accordance with principles of which we in this country highly approved; while he, at the same time, did not wish to enter into any comparison between our institutions and those of France. It was enough for him to say that, perhaps by prejudice, he was led to prefer those we ourselves enjoyed; and he could not but think that in the present state of Europe it would not be merely a misfortune to Savoy and Nice, but to the whole of Europe, to extend in any degree the influence of French institutions in that direction. Indeed, we could not consent to the annexation of Savoy and Nice without defacing the map of Europe. He desired to say that he did not speak with anything like jealousy of the extension of France in a fair direction. He thought the acquiescence of this country in the vast extension France had made for itself in Algeria was a proof that we had no jealousy of that sort; and no doubt the extension of France in Algeria had added very much to her material means. It had given her a great deal of that military strength she now enjoyed; and he thought the Emperor must feel that, if he was now strong in a military point of view, he owed a very large proportion of his military strength to the foresight and care of those great statesmen who in the time of Louis Philippe so very perseveringly went on with the determination to extend the influence of France in the north of Africa. It had been his fortune to travel in that country, and it was competent for him, as an individual, to come back and endeavour to persuade the people that it was dangerous for France to extend herself in that direction, and that she ought to withdraw from Algeria, which tended to increase her influence and strength in Europe. But he never entertained any idea of that kind, and no such idea was ever entertained in England. His objection to the annexation of Savoy and Nice was not that it would add a certain amount of population and strength to France; his objection was founded on this—that the possession of these territories by France would be the unsettlement of Europe. There was another circumstance which rendered this annexation objectionable, and that was that Sardinia was a settled Government while the empire of France was an institution very newly founded. He confessed he could warmly enter into the feelings of those Savoyards and men of Nice who preferred to belong to a settled Government and did not desire to become the subjects of the French Empire. They willingly admitted the great glory the French Empire was manifesting in the world, but they also respectfully said that in that glory they did not desire to share. It was important to inquire how and when did this scheme of annexation of Savoy and Nice originate. Was it, or was it not, true that the idea of effecting this annexation was entertained before the late war? The Emperor of the French, when he engaged in the last Italian war, obtained the acquiescence of Europe to that enterprise of his by the most solemn assurances that he entertained no scheme of personal ambition, no scheme involving the aggrandisement of France. "The Government of the Emperor," Count Walewski wrote to the Duke of Malakhoff, "being neither influenced by any arrière pensée, nor by any ambitious views, has nothing to dissemble, nothing to conceal." On the 27th of April (wrote Earl Cowley to the Earl of Malmesbury),

"Count Walewski informed me yesterday, that he had written to the Duke of Malakhoff a despatch for communication to Her Majesty's Government, in which he had given assurances that the present attitude of the Imperial Government was dictated by no prospects of conquest or ambition."—[No. 458.]

Count Walewski, approaching still more closely to the very subject of this discussion, addressed the Duke of Malakhoff in these few words:—he said,

"The passes of the Alps are not in our hands, and it is in the highest degree important to us that the key of them should remain at Turin—at Turin only." . . .

"His Imperial Majesty, strictly faithful to the words which he pronounced when the French people recalled him to the throne of the chief of his dynasty, is animated by no personal ambition, by no desire of conquest. . . .

"His Majesty has no thought, you may give the most positive assurances to those about you, of separating his views from those of his Allies."

Well, then, in a still more striking and public form, the Emperor gave assurances of the same kind when he was at Milan on the 8th of June. In the Proclamation he addressed to the Italian people, he said, —

"Your enemies, who are my enemies, have endeavoured to diminish the sympathy which exists throughout all Europe for your cause, by trying to persuade the world that I am carrying on this war only for personal ambition, or to aggrandize the territory of France. If there are men who do not understand their epoch, I am not of the number. In the enlightened state of public opinion which prevails, men are greater by the moral influence which they exercise than by barren conquests, and this moral influence I seek after with pride in endeavouring to emancipate one of the most beautiful parts of Europe."

He must frankly acknowledge that he was not one of those who placed implicit reliance on those representations, for he happened to have in his drawer a paper that led him to suspect that those words had not much more foundation, and deserved no more weight, than the bulletins of a former Emperor. It was no doubt said that men who spoke of this annexation being conceived and contrived before the war, indulged a malignant thought after the time. He was so circumstanced that he should be able to appeal to an hon. Member of that House (Mr. S. Fitz Gerald), who would tell them, if asked the question, that eleven months ago, in March last, when peace prevailed in Europe, he had felt it his duty to make to Her Majesty's then Government (although he was in opposition to them), a communication to the effect he would read to the House; but, before doing so, he must be permitted to say that he received it under circumstances which fully justified him in making any use of it he chose. He might have come down and read it to the House at once; but it seemed better for the public service that he should communicate it privately to the hon. Gentleman opposite. The House must not, however, ask him to give the name of the gentleman from whom he received the communication. All he could say was that, speaking on his honour, he received it from a source which made him firmly believe in its truth; and he would have the support of the hon. Gentleman opposite when he said this was no new thought or idea, but a communication he made to him eleven months ago. He repeated that at a time when Europe was at peace, when the war in Italy had not begun, he received a communication which was in these words:—

Mr. Kinglake

"On the evening before the marriage with the Princess Clotilde a paper was signed by the Emperor of the French, which was called a pacte de famille, not a treaty or convention, promising aid, offensive and defensive, to Sardinia; the King, on his side, promising Savoy and Nice, in return for whatever possessions he may gain in Lombardy. The paper was signed by Walewski."

The Earl of Malmesbury seemed to have desired the Earl Cowley to ask a question on the subject, but he used the word "treaty," and asked whether a treaty did not exist, instead of the pacte de famille. Earl Cowley replied on the 1st of May, 1859:—

"Count Walewski having given me an opportunity, I said to him this afternoon, but without putting any question to him on the subject, I thought it right to let him know that Her Majesty's Government had been informed that a treaty had been signed on the 17th of January last between France and Sardinia, by which the latter agreed to cede Savoy to France provided she was put in possession of Lombardy. Count Walewski replied that all he could assure me was that, up to this moment, there was no treaty whatever between France and Sardinia. . . . He made no allusion to the territorial question."—[No. 507.]

No disclaimer was made for a long time, and in the month of July, when the noble Secretary for Foreign Affairs (Lord John Russell) announced to the House the conclusion of the Peace of Villafranca, he had also the happiness of being able to announce, on the authority of the statement of Count Walewski, that there was no intention of annexing Savoy and Nice. He said:—

“I am happy to be able to inform the House that the Emperor of the French has made no demand of that kind, and that there is every reason to suppose that he does not intend to make any addition whatever to the territory of France. This is most gratifying, because any addition to the territory of France, however insignificant, following on the war, could not fail to rouse the suspicions and jealousies of Europe.”—[3 Hansard, cliv. 1052.]

Now, the existence of that arrangement seemed to have been pretty well concealed until he himself gave his first notice of Motion in this matter. Into that notice of Motion he introduced the words pacte de famille. It then, perhaps, became known that this was a matter which could not any longer be concealed from Europe, and Earl Granville, speaking in another place, on the 7th of February for the first time disclosed—not, of course, in complete language, but in language which very well shadowed out the truth—the existence of something like the arrangement to which he had referred. Earl Granville said:—

“We have been told by the Imperial Government that there is no question at present of the annexation of Savoy; that one of a great many points discussed before the war was the annexation of Savoy, under certain contingencies, but that those contingencies not having occurred there is at this moment no question of annexation. The French Government adds, at the same time, that, in the event of Sardinia, with the addition of Lombardy and other provinces, becoming a powerful Italian State, they will feel themselves at liberty to consider what conditions they should attach to the sanction they might give to such an arrangement.”

Well, the matter, apparantly, now stood thus:—There was no doubt that before the war an arrangement was entered into that, in exchange for Lombardy, the Emperor of the French should become possessed of Savoy and the county of Nice. But the Emperor of the French having failed to conquer all Lombardy, according to the original programme, the contingency failed, and for a time France and Sardinia both acquiesced in the proposition that the circumstances under which Savoy and Nice were to be surrendered to France had not occurred. But later in the autumn, when it became obvious that the provisions of the Treaty of Villafranca were of such a kind that they could not and would not be carried into effect, the Central States of Italy began to provide for themselves and indicated an intention to become annexed to the kingdom of Sardinia. Then the Emperor of the French apparently reverted to his former proposal, and seemed to say that if Sardinia was to be aggrandized, though not in the way originally contemplated, then virtually, though not actually and in terms, there was that between himself and the King of Sardinia which would entitle him to insist on the pacte de famille. We had, happily, since been told that this annexation would not be carried into effect by the Emperor of the French without consulting the great Powers of Europe. The noble Lord the Foreign Secretary stated in that House:—

“Her Majesty’s Ambassador in France, having addressed the Emperor on this subject, was assured that the Emperor of the French would not proceed to a final decision on this matter of Savoy without consulting the great Powers of Europe.”

Now, if he were told by a plain man that he would not do a particular thing without consulting some other person, he might, perhaps, infer that he meant something more than the strict literal force of his words would imply, and that he would not only consult that third person, but would to some extent be governed by the advice he might receive. But when it was found that, contemporaneously with the assurance of the Emperor that he would consult the great Powers of Europe he asserted that a portion of Savoy was necessary to the Empire of France, one was led to fear that this consultation would rather be an indication on the part of France of what she meant to do, than a real question and inquiry from her as to what the other Powers of Europe thought right. When the inquiry, which, if he was not misinformed, would soon come from the Foreign Office of Paris, arrived, and the four great Powers were consulted on this subject in the way which he heard was now intended, he trusted that the answer of England would be so closely similar to the answer of every other Government that all Europe would know that the four great Powers were of one mind. It was often said it was well that this country should be allied with France or with some other state. The truth was that alliances did not depend on proximity, nor upon caprice. The one thing on which our alliances should depend must be a community of interest. Did we or did we not desire the same thing as any other power of Europe? He believed that England anxiously desired peace. Then it followed that the Allies of England must be those who also desired peace. Would the Emperor of the French persist in this scheme? Whatever might be the natural moderation or the good sense of that ruler, he was armed with a power which had annexed to it certain conditions. That power had annexed to it this fatal condition, that he must use it. And it was gravely to be doubted whether he would be able to resist the evil counsels which might prompt him to execute this project. If he did not resist, then we should at all events have so provided that he would no longer have it in his power to proceed privily or by stealth. All Europe would know that this act, if it was to be done, would be done in open violation of treaty; and we should then come to understand our epoch, and to perceive that the rights of nations were made to depend, not altogether upon the justice of their cause, but also upon their strength. The hon. Member concluded by moving an Address for Copies of the Correspondence which has taken place between Her Majesty's Government and the Governments of the Emperor of the French and the King of Sardinia in respect to the proposal for annexing Savoy and Nice to the Empire of France.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he had great pleasure in seconding the Motion of his hon. and learned Friend. He felt so deeply the importance of the subject they were now called on to discuss that he could not refrain, before entering on the observations he had to make, from tendering his thanks to his hon. and learned Friend not only for the very able and lucid manner in which he had brought the question before the House, but also for the opportunity he has afforded us of eliciting some opinions from the Government; and he presumed the Government are gratified at the opportunity which this discussion supplies of giving such explanations and assurances as may be calculated to place their conduct in this matter in a clear and intelligible light before the public, for, as they are well aware, their conduct in the matter, without some explanation from them, is liable to be canvassed, and indeed, probably from inadequate means of information, had been generally canvassed in the country, in no very favourable light. The question of Savoy not only affected the whole of Italy, but was of vast and vital importance to Europe. It not merely concerned the territorial limits or the geographical frontiers of Sardinia and France—not merely involved the independence of Switzerland, as regarded the three neutralized provinces of Chablais, Faucigny, and Genevois, but it touched the whole European comity of nations, inasmuch as it was the first attempt to make an inroad upon that charter of European tenure which was the basis of the existing territorial arrangements. It was an attempt, therefore, which either must be checked at once with a vigorous hand, or must be sanctioned by the consent of the other Powers; or else, if carried out without the consent of those Powers, it would infallibly lead to European convulsion. The Motion was brought forward in no spirit of hostility to the present Government. Up to this point he believed that Her Majesty's Government, following the policy pursued by their predecessors in a troublous and hazardous time, had been desirous of maintaining those friendly relations with other States which every Government of this country, irrespective of its politics, must seek to maintain. The Earl of Aberdeen, a veteran and distinguished statesman of perhaps, a bygone generation, had affirmed that the foreign policy of England had been more or less identical for the last thirty years—that was to say, that each succeeding Minister for Foreign Affairs had been obliged to adhere, in the main, to the policy of his predecessor. They all knew what was the policy of the Earl of Malmesbury in regard to Italy. That noble Earl had declared—and the country would, doubtless, be prepared to endorse his statement—that his own exertions, and those of the Earl of Derby's Government, saved Europe from a general war last year. The Earl of Malmesbury had also declared as publicly that the same exertions were instrumental in confining the struggle between Austria on the one side, and France and Sardinia on the other, within the limits of Northern Italy. The present advisers of the Crown, with a clear insight into the drift of affairs, had, no doubt, also been desirous to abstain from involving this country in the disputes of other nations who were our allies and friends. How came it then, that after having wisely determined on that course on the 4th of February, Earl Cowley communicated to M. Thouvenel a project of the English Cabinet for the definitive settlement of the Italian question? The heads of that scheme were, that Venetia should remain under the Austrian rule; that the inhabitants of the Central States of Italy should be again invited to decide upon their own constitution, and that if they pronounced for annexation with Savoy that Power should be authorized to accomplish their wishes ; and lastly, that France should withdraw her troops from Rome and other parts of Italy. He believed that the French Minister had given for an answer that he was not ready on the moment to give a reply ; but surely when he (Sir R. Peel) heard that foreign Governments were now giving or refusing their adhesion to what they called the English proposals, he was justified in asking whether we were abandoning that independent course of action which the Government of this country had hitherto wisely pursued. What had we to do with asking France to allow Tuscany to be united to Sardinia ? Why, what was the answer which France gave to our request ? She replied, " Let Tuscany be united to Sardinia, but I, France, will then take Savoy." His hon. and learned Friend had said that this question of the annexation of Savoy had been agreed on long ago. It might be so. But it was patent to every one that when Her Majesty's Government proposed to France that Sardinia should be at liberty to appropriate Tuscany, France had replied with the annexation of Savoy to France. Her Majesty's Government no doubt wished to give some practical effect to their Administration, and he greatly approved the exertions which they had recently made to extend and improve the commercial relations of this country ; but it was remarkable that the day on which the Commercial Treaty was signed was the very day on which the Emperor of the French first mentioned the annexation of Savoy to Her Majesty's Government. It looked very much as if this Commercial Treaty had a very important political bearing. He did not assert that it had such a bearing, but it certainly looked something like it. They had heard a great deal lately about the conciliatory spirit of the Emperor of the French, and he (Sir R. Peel) was as anxious as any one to preserve our friendly relations with France ; but what he wanted to know was, what was the cause of this sudden civility on the part of France. Was the Treaty a proof of the moderation of the Emperor, of his wish to disprove the libellous charges which had been so plentifully heaped upon him ? Was the Treaty a proof of his desire to open fresh channels of communication with this country, or was it merely a sop to enable France to carry out with undiminished vigour her schemes of aggression and aggrandisement ? The increase of intercourse with France was a matter of the greatest importance to this country, the channels where wealth and prosperity flowed with such increased vigour under the improved system of our commercial policy ; but he hoped the House would boldly say, and that the Government would avail themselves of that opportunity of stating, that the conclusion of the Commercial Treaty with France had no reference whatever to the political condition of Italy, nor would it be allowed in any way to bind the counsels of this country as regarded the future policy of France. He had lately read the very voluminous blue-book on the affairs of Italy which had been presented to the House, and he was proud to see that the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had conducted these negotiations with a dignity and a propriety worthy of the country, of his own character, and of the office over which he presided. The noble Lord must, however, remember that the friendly assurances of France were not always to be relied upon as an infallible proof of her sincerity. There was one notable instance which had made a great impression on the minds of statesmen of the day wherein it occurred. That country never made more earnest professions of friendship and amity to England than when she was about to join America in her struggle for independence. He did not mean of course, to draw any parallel between the professions of France at that time and those which she was making now ; but it was remarkable that at the very time that she was giving us these friendly assurances she talked about correcting her geographical frontiers. Correcting the geographical frontiers of France ! That was a most serious matter, and who was to decide upon it except the great Powers who had put their seals to the instrument which fixed those frontiers at the limit which existed in 1792 ? The extracts from the French newspapers which had been read by his hon. and learned Friend were very remarkable, especially as the press in France was not, as in this country, a noble engine for the circulation and communication of ideas, but was confined to the expression of the authorized intentions and objects of the Government. The Patrie of the 2nd of February, 1860, had the impertinence to say, — " The Sardinian authorities are everywhere encouraging the movement against the separation of Savoy." If the Emperor of the French wanted to take Ireland it was probable that our authorities would endeavour to prevent him.

Mr. Kinglake

"The Sardinian authorities are everywhere encouraging the movement against the separation of Savoy by putting down the almost unanimous wish of the inhabitants who are asking for annexation with France."

He should shortly have occasion to show that, so far from unanimously desiring to be annexed to France, the people of Savoy were unanimous in their desire either to remain subject to the present dynasty, or else, if possible, with the consent of the great Powers, to be annexed to Switzerland. The paper, however, went on to say—

"The people of Savoy have the same right as the people of Italy to declare their opinion in perfect security and complete independence."

The idea of a French newspaper making such an assertion when no less than nineteen of its contemporaries had been already, within the last few months, suppressed for declaring their opinions in what they thought security and independence! The article concluded.

"Their wishes are of so energetic a character that they have been manifested in spite of all obstacles and all difficulties. We have a right to demand the cessation of this intolerable state of things and equal justice for all."

The French ambassador in this country expressed himself excessively annoyed at that article, and he said that in a day or two there would be a soothing one in the Constitutionnel. This was the soothing article which appeared in that journal:—

"The report going the round of the journals relative to the annexation of Savoy and Nice to France is but the result of a presentiment of public opinion. The press has been struck by the attraction felt by the population of Savoy towards France, and by the justice of a measure which at this moment, when Piedmont is to be singularly aggrandized, would give France a geographical frontier. What Savoy wishes for, what France desires, does not appear doubtful."

That was a bold and hardy assertion, when he should be able to bring forward infallible proof that not only was the contrary the case, but that there was among the people of Savoy a stern determination on no account whatever to sacrifice what they called their national feeling to the political expediency of any party in France. His hon. and learned Friend had said that this question of the annexation of Savoy was not a new one, but that the agreement between France and Sardinia was signed on the occasion of the marriage of the Princess Clotilde with Prince Napoleon. Some treaty had, certainly, been signed on that occasion, although Her Majesty's Government were disposed to doubt it. The fact was, that this treaty was a pacte de famille. The Emperor, however, had well concealed his intentions until the day on which the Commercial Treaty was signed. Count Walewski, who was always flourishing beautiful phrases, said, "France draws the sword not to govern but to free," and the Emperor himself, in his proclamation to the Italians at Milan, on the 8th of June, 1859, declared,—

Sir Robert Peel

"Vos ennemis, qui sont les miens, ont tenté de diminuer la sympathie universelle qu'il y avait en Europe pour votre cause, en faisant croire que je ne faisais la guerre que par ambition personnelle ou pour agrandir le territoire de la France."

We might be inclined to place implicit confidence in what he said, but there was that unfortunate pacte de famille, and of all things which were hateful it was such an instrument as that. The last pacte de famille which produced any great convulsion in Europe was one concluded at Paris so far back as the year 1761 between Louis XV. and the King of Spain, and signed by the Duc de Choiseul and the Marquis de Grimaldi. Another such pacte was made between the first Napoleon and his brothers, but that more resembled an arrangement between a general and his lieutenants than one between sovereigns who stood on a perfect equality. But the pacte de famille of 1761 was of a different character. It consisted of 28 Articles. There was a reciprocal guarantee of mutual obligations, and, to use the words of Article 4, Qui attaque une Couronne attaque l'autre. Perhaps, however, the most important Article was the 21st, which stipulated that the Treaty was to be regarded comme un pacte de famille, et nulle autre Puissance ne pourra être invitée ni admise à y accéder. Such was the kind of pacte which had been formed between France and Sardinia, and he believed that no arrangements could be more dangerous to Europe. It demanded therefore the closest attention from Her Majesty's Government. Whence, he would ask, had the Savoy question originated, and how had it come on the tapis at that moment? It had a close and direct connection undoubtedly with that great Italian struggle which had been going on for the last twelve months. In consequence of the annexation of Lombardy to Piedmont, France had demanded the cession of Savoy. This had rendered the condition of Savoy one of great uncertainty, and that of Switzerland one of restless anxiety. The independence of Switzerland depended upon its neutrality, and its neutrality would be destroyed by the annexation of any part of Savoy to France. Now, the neutrality of Switzerland was guaranteed by the Act of Congress which was proclaimed on the 20th of November, 1815, signed by eight Powers, the principal directing influences being those of England and of Russia, and which declared the neutrality of Switzerland as being "dans l'intérêt de toute l'Europe," and Prince Metternich himself had declared "that the Powers regarded the perpetual neutrality of Switzerland as the only guarantee of her independence." So essential had the independence and neutrality of Switzerland been considered, that during the last forty years no foreign foe had ever ventured to put his foot upon Swiss territory, which had been allowed to rest in peace amid all the convulsions in which other countries had been plunged. Moreover, with the view of confirming the neutrality and strengthening the independence of Switzerland, the Powers gave to Switzerland, in addition to a geographical frontier, a military frontier on the side of Savoy. Chablais was that part of Savoy which immediately abutted on the Lake of Geneva, then came Faucigny, and beyond that Genevois. These three provinces were neutralized and rendered almost independent of Savoy. It was laid down that in the event of war no foreign troops should pass through those territories, which, on the contrary, were to be occupied by Swiss troops. Nothing, in fact, could be stronger than the desire of the Powers to establish both the independence and the neutrality of Switzerland upon a firm basis. The very existence of the Helvetic Confederation was bound up in the maintenance of its neutrality, and the moment France disturbed the existing treaty-arrangements by the annexation of Savoy the independence and neutrality of Switzerland would be virtually at an end. What would be the inevitable consequence? There were at present about 20,000 French and 20,000 Savoyards residing in Geneva. But if Geneva were surrounded by French territory and inhabited as would probably then be the case with 20,000 Frenchmen, what would be the position of that magnificent but diminutive Canton with 40,000 within the walls of its chief city. Again if France an-nexed Savoy, she would secure the possession of the Simplon, which would bring her into direct communication with Italy, and Germany would undoubtedly demand to be put in the same possession by the cession of the St. Gothard Pass. Thus endless complications of the gravest character would arise, and the probability was, that if the Powers now consented to the annexation of Savoy, France would in a short time claim the Rhenish provinces. He would entreat the House and the Government to put a check to such proceedings at once. The past was full of warning. In 1792 France annexed Savoy; in 1798 she annexed Geneva; in 1802 the Valais; and those three provinces remained integral parts of the Republic and the First Empire until 1814. Surely, instructed by experience, the Powers of Europe would not allow France to begin a new career of ambition and spoliation by the annexation of Savoy. He trusted they would pay some respect to what was called national feeling. La Patrie had declared that the Savoyards were all in favour of annexation to France. Nothing could be further from the truth. He knew that the feelings of the people were absolutely antagonistic to any connection with France. He had been asked—he admitted he might prove but a comparatively weak and inefficient champion—but he had been asked to advocate the interests of the Swiss people in this matter, and in the absence of any better champion he had undertaken the task. In former years he had resided in that country in charge of Her Majesty's Mission from 1846 to 1850, embracing a period of great political excitement, and through the favour of the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton he had had the advantage of becoming acquainted with the leading statesmen and most influential inhabitants of that country. He had a letter from one of the most distinguished statesmen in Switzerland, who frequently honoured him with his correspondence, one paragraph from which he would read to the House. It was dated on the 4th February, and stated—

"We have learnt that the treaty for the annexation of Savoy to France has been signed by Sardinia and France, and that no exceptional mention was made of those neutralized provinces which touch the Swiss frontier."

The neutralized provinces referred to were Chablais and Faucigny and part of Genevois, which were included in the system of neutrality by which the Powers in 1815 guaranteed the independence of Switzerland, and which were neutralized with the view of giving the Swiss Confederation a stronger natural boundary. The writer continued:—

“Moreover, if we are well informed, there are well-grounded reasons for apprehending that France intends to repudiate the neutrality of these provinces, sanctioned not only by the Treaties of 1815, but also by all previous treaties between Switzerland and the House of Savoy. These treaties went even further than a guarantee of neutrality, for the House of Savoy engaged never to detach these provinces of Chablais and Faucigny otherwise than to Switzerland. On the faith of these engagements we had hoped that, in the event of the cession of Savoy to France, reservation would be made for the incorporation into the Swiss Confederation of Chablais, Faucigny, and a portion of the Upper Genevois, which are essential to the maintenance of Swiss neutrality on that side, and command the Simplon. These provinces represent a population of about 150,000 souls, who, in the event of the cession of Savoy to France, earnestly desire to be incorporated into Switzerland.”

That was the opinion of a gentleman who occupied a high position in Switzerland, and who had been intimately connected with the politics of France and Sardinia. He knew that the Swiss people desired above all things the maintenance of the status quo. Such was also the feeling of the people of Chablais and Faucigny, but if a change must be made they would prefer to be incorporated into the Helvetic Confederation. They were attached to the House of Savoy, which they knew to be sprung from their mountain region, and they were anxious to remain as heretofore united under the sway of this ancient family, which had shone with such éclat in the history of Europe. Up to the 10th of February last, petitions, or rather declarations, had been circulated in those communes, signed by more than 920 of the principal inhabitants, thus stating what they desired:—

“Dans le cas inattendu d’une séparation de la Savoie, le Faucigny et le Chablais ne voudraient pas être Français, mais toléreraient plutôt leur annexion à la Suisse.”

Such a feeling was creditable to those people in the highest degree. But what would be the feelings of the people on the other side of the Alps if they knew that they had acquired liberty by the sacrifice of the liberty of these small but free communities? They were ready to thank the Emperor of the French for the assistance he had rendered them, but when they knew that a part of Europe which had hitherto been free, which had carried the cross of Savoy and the tricolour of Italy through all the recent battlefields, was to be absorbed in France they must feel the deepest regret that the first hour of their deliverance should be the first of slavery to these ancient provinces. He appealed with confidence to the Government. He believed that the House of Commons would support the Government in their desire to do what was right to the people of these provinces. He trusted that the directing policy of the Government would be in accordance with the acknowledged character of the noble Viscount, at its head, and that the noble Viscount acting in concert with the noble Lord the Member for London, would be able to conduct the Foreign Affairs of this country in a moment of critical emergency with conciliation as well as power. Never was such a policy more needed. The eyes of Europe are cast upon this country to see what course she will pursue. Italy is just bursting into liberty, almost realizing the magnificent lines of Byron:—

Sir Robert Peel

“ Italy !
Time, which hath wrong’d thee with ten thousand rents
Of thine imperial garment, shall deny
And hath denied to every other sky
Spirits which soar from ruin. Thy decay
Is still impregnate with divinity,
Which gilds it with revivifying ray.”

Beautiful words ! so expressive of the circumstances of the case at the present moment. It is that revivifying ray which now gilds the horizon of the Peninsula ; it is that hope of soaring from ruin which now animates the people of that country. I entreat you not to quench that ray, not to disappoint that hope. I appeal to the noble Lord at the head of the Government. I ask him to stand true to the character he has so long enjoyed, and which happily with undiminished vigour he is still enabled to maintain. I ask him to throw all the weight of his Government into the scale in favour of Italian freedom and independence. I trust that, acting in concert with France—to whom Italy really owes a debt of gratitude—he will be able not only to regulate the future of Italy upon a basis of honourable and independent existence, but also to secure the independence and neutrality of that ancient and magnanimous republic which, amidst the shock of surrounding nations, has stood, and happily still stands, as a beacon of political liberty and the home of the political exile. If the Government do not follow a statesmanlike and honourable policy in this matter they will not meet with the support of this House, but if they can assure the House and can prove that their policy has been not an unnecessary intermeddling with the affairs of other countries, or been formed in subservience to the views of other nations, but has been directed to bringing the legitimate influence of England to secure the independence and freedom of Italy and Switzerland, I take the liberty to tell them that they will secure to themselves not only the sympathy and affection of tens of thousands of people in those countries, but they will be able to count upon that best reward of their services, that best guarantee for the success of their policy, which consists in the confidence and approval of every friend of civil and religious liberty.

SIR GEORGE GREY: Sir, I do not rise for the purpose of expressing dissent on the part of the Government from the observations which have been addressed to the House by the two hon. Gentlemen who have moved and seconded this Motion, not only with remarkable force and eloquence, but in entire unison with the feelings which pervade this House and the country. This question is undoubtedly one of European interest, it is one to which public attention in this country and on the Continent has been much and justly directed, and it is one on which the Government are ready to admit the House has a perfect right to demand full information as to the policy which they have pursued as guardians of the public honour in negotiations with foreign countries. The Government, therefore, give a ready assent to the Motion of the hon. and learned Gentleman for papers, and they are willing to lay on the table, at an early day, all the papers which he desires, with the trifling but usual insertion of the word, "or extracts" after copies, &c. But I cannot help thinking that any protracted discussion would be more satisfactory when the House is in possession of the papers, and when hon. Gentlemen have had the fullest opportunity of seeing the course which the Government has taken in this matter both with regard to France and Sardinia. The hon. and learned Gentleman who made this Motion has expressed a hope that there would be a unanimous expression of opinion on this subject; but, though on the present Motion there is no opportunity afforded of formally recording our opinion, yet I am sure that no hon. Member who risks to address the House will differ from the two hon. Members in the general tenor and purport of the opinions which they have expressed. There is no man in this House, I am sure, who will not join with them in earnestly deprecating the annexation of Savoy, not upon the ground of any specific interest which this country has in that annexation, but because of the consequences to which it would lead, the mistrust it would occasion, and, as the hon. Gentleman has well said, of the unsettlement of Europe which it would create. I cannot but feel that the hon. Baronet who seconded the Motion, if he had read these papers, would not have assumed that certain things were possible with respect to which he desires a disclaimer from us. For instance, he wished us to disclaim that in entering into that Commercial Treaty we had any political object—that we were actuated by subservience to France—that the Treaty had any connection whatever with the annexation of Savoy. That disclaimer I am perfectly prepared to make on the part of the Government in the most explicit terms. Our hands are perfectly free, and when the papers are produced it will be seen that, notwithstanding the Commercial Treaty, the Government have explained to France, in clear and unambiguous terms, the views which they entertain with respect to the annexation of Savoy. One word as to the despatch of my noble Friend near me, to which reference has been made. The hon. Baronet who seconded the Motion objected to the proposals made by my noble Friend the Foreign Secretary for the settlement of Italy as being a departure from the neutrality which this country ought to observe, and as giving, in the proposal to annex Tuscany to Piedmont, a pretence to the Emperor of the French to ask for the annexation of Savoy. When the whole correspondence is on the table, however, the hon. Baronet, as well as the House, will see that the charge of departing from the principle of neutrality is unfounded, and that the despatch in question is in conformity with the policy which the Government have uniformly pursued, which was to leave to the people of Italy the right to choose their own form of government, and the liberty of expressing their opinions on the settlement of their own affairs. The policy of the Government has been uniformly directed to that end. The Government earnestly desire the peace and tranquillity of Europe. But one essential element in the tranquillity of Europe is the contentment and good government of the people of Italy, and those two objects can never be secured unless the people of Italy be allowed the opportunity of expressing their own wishes. It is to secure them this power that the efforts of Her Majesty's Government have been directed. That is a policy which I believe to be strictly in accordance with the intentions of the House and of the country, and I trust the result will prove that it has not been pursued in vain. Although, probably, other Members may desire to express their opinions on this subject, I hope we shall not be led, in the absence of the papers, into any protracted debate on the subject; but with such an expression of opinion as has been already elicited from the House, and as hon. Members may desire further to give, that we shall be allowed to proceed to that business which it was yesterday generally understood would occupy our attention.

MR. DISRAELI: Although this subject, Sir, has been brought under the consideration of the House in two speeches of singular eloquence and ability, both by the hon. and learned Gentleman and the hon. Baronet (Sir Robert Peel), I think that after the promise made by the right hon. Baronet who last addressed us, it will, on the whole, be more convenient that we should refrain from giving any opinion on the subject generally until the papers have been laid on the table. At the same time I must say that I was not surprised that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Bridgwater should have made this Motion, for although the Chancellor of the Duchy on the part of the Government, has expressed their extreme willingness and prompt readiness to afford all the information in their power, I must be permitted to say that the present quickness in producing papers—which must be very gratifying to those hon. Members who require information—is rather a novel disposition on the part of Her Majesty's Government, and had it been displayed at an earlier period of the Session would have been more satisfactory to the House. Hon. Members may not, perhaps, forget the inquiry which I made on the 2nd of this month with respect to these provinces of Nice and Savoy, and the unsatisfactory reply which I received from the noble Lord; and it was not until the chief Minister of the Crown, in another House of Parliament, had made an admission which seemed afterwards to be regretted, that I was enabled to come to this House and to urge an inquiry upon that admission which it was impossible any longer to meet with silence. What, however, was even then the answer of the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs? Why, he told us this—that communications had certainly passed between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of France on the subject of the possible annexation of Savoy to the French Empire, but they were dated so far back, I think, as last July; and certainly the impression conveyed by Her Majesty's Government was that the whole question had died away, that it was not one of that urgent and pressing interest which it is now universally recognized to be. The consequence was that the House was entirely thrown off its guard. An inquiry was made five days afterwards by an hon. Friend of mine who was in possession of authentic information, and it was not until he had produced that information that Her Majesty's Government were prepared to meet the House with the frankness with which I think it is always wise on these subjects for Ministers to treat the House of Commons. I thought it due to myself and others who proposed to inquire into this important matter to make these observations; but I shall scrupulously refrain from entering into the merits of the question. When the papers are in our possession I am sure we shall all feel that no more important documents could be placed in our hands, and they cannot fail to become the subject of grave deliberation.

MR. MONCKTON MILNES said, he concurred in the belief that another time might better be chosen for this discussion, but he wished to make one observation. He trusted the House, in the absence of authentic information, would be cautious in allowing itself to be led away by mere idle rumours of pactes de famille, or any other arrangement whatever; but would wait until the papers were laid before them. Until that was done he hoped they would not attach full credence to the theory of his two hon. Friends, which, though made in the best possible spirit, was, nevertheless based on mere assertions, and implicated not only the good faith and honour of the French Government but also the freedom and integrity of the King of Sardinia, who was represented as abandoning the subjects of his own hereditary possessions. He was informed, on authority as good as any which his hon. and learned

Sir George Grey

Friend had cited, that the reply given by the Sardinian Government to this proposition of annexation was conveyed in the simple and dignified words—"We cannot bargain away men," or, as it seemed the fashion that evening to express themselves in French, "Nous ne pouvons pas marchander les hommes." The free desires of the people of Savoy in no way tended towards a change in their political position, nor had they any wish to alter their political allegiance, and he did not believe that any change in their position would take place, unless they entirely concurred in the arrangement.

MR. BOWYER said, he was willing to believe what had been stated on the part of the Government by the right hon. Baronet (Sir G. Grey) that the correspondence, when produced, would prove that Her Majesty's Government had all through been opposed to the annexation of Savoy and Nice to France, but he thought official men were apt to attach too much importance to correspondence. What he complained of was that the general policy of the Government, however, in Italy had been marked by an abnegation of those principles of public law by which the relations of countries had hitherto been governed, and on which all civil politics must ultimately depend; and he was convinced that if Her Majesty's Government had not encouraged rebellion, annexation, demonstrations, and schemes of settlement in different countries by upsetting the treaties on which international law had previously been based, nothing would ever have been heard of this proposal for annexing Savoy to France. Few events in the recent history of Italy had given him more concern than the position in which the Sardinian monarchy was placed by the ambitious and unprincipled policy of Count Cavour. On both public and private grounds he felt great respect for and even attachment to the illustrious house of Savoy, and he saw with much pain the humiliating and dangerous position in which the King of Sardinia, the head of that house, was placed. No doubt a considerable increase of territory had been acquired in Lombardy. But it had been acquired by means of an unjust war, and he believed that this apparent aggrandizement would cause the ruin of that ancient and illustrious dynasty. The King of Sardinia had been involved in an unjust quarrel by promises of assistance on the part of France. A time would probably come when France would no longer be prepared to march armies into Italy to support the King of Sardinia; and Austria, backed by Germany, and possibly by Russia, would once more take possession of Lombardy, and perhaps march to Genoa and Turin. They were told that France had gone into Italy from a love of Italian liberty and independence, but the real motives were now apparent, and the tortuous policy which had dictated the whole proceeding. The consummation of the humiliation of the Sardinian Monarch was this project which had been assented to for the separation of the countries of Savoy and Nice from his Crown. He (Mr. Bowyer) remembered another King of Sardinia, bearing the same name as the present monarch—Victor Emmanuel, who with a very small force had gallantly defended the passes of Savoy against a French army for a considerable time. That gallant monarch, he felt sure, would rather have placed his head upon the block than relinquish the ancient inheritance of his house—the place where for nearly eight centuries his ancestors had been buried—and from which the name of their dynasty was derived. It would hereafter be a sarcasm to style them princes of the house of Savoy. In this question of annexation the House might discern an indication and example of the policy which the Emperor of the French was pursuing. A plan was adopted for transferring these provinces to France, and now we learn what the plan was; money was expended, secret agents employed, and public manifestations, or what were called such, in favour of France were made. He thought English statesmen should hear with distrust what was published of these manifestations in other countries. Before he left Rome, he was told by one of the Ministers that a public manifestation in favour of France would soon be made in that city. It did take place; but the thing was perfectly understood, how it was managed and where the money came from. Another strong French manifestation had been managed in Nice. It all indicated an ambitious policy on the part of the French Emperor, to which they ought all to open their eyes. He should rejoice in the good understanding between France and England. It was for the interest of both countries, and the rest of Europe that those countries should be on good terms; but he thought the cultivation of a friendly feeling was a very different thing to the policy of subserviency he had remarked, and with great regret, on the part of Her Majesty's Government. The Emperor of the French knew very well how to manage Her Majesty's Ministers. He knew he had only to talk liberalism to the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs about "civil and religious liberty all over the world," and to use other phrases of the same kind, and he could lead him as he pleased. Under this influence, Her Majesty's Government had been induced to sanction an unprincipled policy, a policy of intrigue, of annexation, a policy of everything that could disturb mankind; and which, if carried further, would unsettle the whole of Europe and lead to some great convulsion. He would not go into any discussion of the affairs of Italy; but he would mention one fact that showed the danger of playing into the hands of France. What occurred in Florence? There the Minister accredited by Sardinia to the Grand Duke of Tuscany, M. Boncompagni, who was in constant communication and on intimate terms with the Duke, that Minister, at the instigation of France and Sardinia, conspired to overthrow the Prince to whom he was accredited, and at whose Court he resided. He was made the means of conveying money to the officers of the Tuscan troops; he corrupted the army and brought about the revolution. When it was completed that Minister, accredited to the Court of Tuscany, became the head of the revolutionary Government established on the expulsion of the Grand Duke. He was afterwards appointed a sort of Viceroy over Central Italy. Not one word had been said by Her Majesty's Government in reprobation of such conduct. And by not protesting against such dishonourable proceedings they were abetting a system subversive, not only of all political security, but of the mere principles of honour between man and man, and without which they should all be picking each other's pockets, and cutting each other's throats. After this transaction, the next thing was the landing of French troops at Leghorn to assist the revolutionary party; and by this means the Emperor subverted the Governments of what were called the Dukes, and caused the insurrection in the Romagna. It was done only by a foreign invasion. The Government should have its eyes opened by such a system. The object of the Emperor was by keeping every state in a condition of uncertainty, and by fomenting revolutions, to obtain a paramount power in Italy. He now refused to have Tuscany annexed to Sardinia unless Savoy was annexed to France. He thus showed how false were his professions of disinterestedness when he invaded Italy. He said everything should be done in Italy without foreign intervention; yet he had 50,000 men in Lombardy, and a large military force in other parts of Italy. Wherever there was a movement in Italy, there some connection of the Emperor was found actively promoting it. Thus at Bologna there was Count Pepoli, a relation of the Emperor by marriage, and receiving a pension from him. The Emperor intended to make the Mediterranean a "French lake," and he would succeed in doing it. Yet they always spoke of him as their faithful Ally; but if he were not the master of 600,000 soldiers they would talk of him in a very different tone. The noble Lord at the head of the Government had of late years pursued a system of bullying the weak and truckling to the strong which was discreditable to this country. Violent attacks were made on the Government of the Pope and the King of Naples. The noble Secretary for Foreign Affairs and the noble Viscount had repeatedly spoken of that King with contempt and sarcasm. All this was directed against a Government supposed to be weak. All Governments known to be strong were treated with respect. They heard nothing said of the French deportations to Cayenne, of the French police, of the total destruction of all liberty of thought and speech in France. Nor did they hear anything of the suppression of liberty of thought and speech in Italy, where liberty was supposed to reign. They heard nothing of these things, done by the instigation of the Emperor of the French; but he must always be spoken of with respect; nay, he was eulogized in terms of the most fulsome adulation. He did not say this was not prudent; but he did not think it magnanimous; he did not think it even wise; and of this he was quite sure—it was not English. The people were beginning to open their eyes to this system. He had heard it said that this country had never since 1814 stood higher, so far as regarded her relations with foreign Powers, than she did at the present moment. Yet notwithstanding that statement, we were going to content ourselves with entering a simple protest against the march of French troops into Savoy. He saw nothing dignified in mere protestations which were no more than an admission of impotency. The reason why we pursued a course such as that was, that the Government had placed themselves altogether in the hands of France, partly because they thought the independence of Italy might result from her interference in its affairs, partly because they entertained the expectation that the Emperor of the French might do something against the Pope, and partly also because they felt an interest in the constitutional kingdom of Sardinia, and desired to see its territories extended. But, although the Ministers of England were so completely bound up with France, he did not think her people were so; and he, therefore, hoped we should adopt a policy more consistent with our interests and the welfare of Europe.

Mr. Bowyer

MR. WARRE contended that, as the happiest consequences had flowed from the withdrawal of the Austrian troops from the Romagna, so the withdrawal of the French troops from Rome would be likely to be followed by equally beneficial results. He did not, therefore, concur in the peculiar view of the question which the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just spoken advocated, while he was of opinion that the correspondence which the learned Gentlemen had criticized was of a nature to reflect the highest credit upon the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs. Again the panegyric bestowed upon the temporal power of the Pope by the hon. and learned Member was utterly devoid of foundation. He did not blame the Holy Father individually, but the system on which his Government was based. It was his firm belief that if the principle of non-intervention were carried out and Central Italy were left to emancipate herself, the freedom of a land whose prosperity the nation at large had so much at heart would, notwithstanding all the complications by which her progress to independence was beset, ultimately be secured.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, he would suggest that as the discussion had, in deference to the views of the Government, been carried on only within a certain limit, an early day, when the subject might be more fully entered into, should be fixed.

MR. KINNAIRD said, that he hoped that as the speeches which had been delivered that evening on the question before the House were calculated to produce a great effect on the country, the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs would inform hon. Members whether he would lay the papers relating to the question on the table of the House at an early day, in order that the discussion might be resumed as soon as possible.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: There have been certain observations made in the course of the present discussion, and certain questions raised, which I think require some explanation at my hands. I may in the first place state, in reply to my hon. Friend who has just spoken (Mr. Kinnaird), that the papers to which he refers are already in print, and will be produced within a day or two; and while upon this point I may remark that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bucks seems to think that I have shown reluctance to give information on this subject to the House. [MR. DISRAELI: I said you refused to produce the papers.] Well, the truth is, that when a question was asked upon this point by the right hon. Gentleman on a former occasion, I replied in accordance with what was the exact state of the facts as they existed at that time. Some days after that question was put to me a discussion with respect to the contemplated annexation of Savoy to France arose in the other House of Parliament, in which my noble Friend the President of the Council took part, and I placed in his hand despatches relating to the question, which I had received on the morning of the day on which the discussion came on, in order that he might be able to explain the position in which this question stood. The right hon. Gentleman will therefore at once perceive that I could not produce the papers for which he asked at the time at which he mentioned the subject in this House. I may say generally, with respect to the production of papers, that I think there are certain rules to which we ought to adhere. When in our correspondence with a Foreign Government we have stated the views of Her Majesty's Government it is not desirable to lay the despatch containing those views before the House, until the Foreign Government to which it is addressed has had time to receive and to return an answer to it, if it should deem it right to do so. I, it is true, addressed a despatch to Earl Cowley, to be submitted to M. Thouvenel, which has not been answered, but we have no difficulty in producing it, because it might have been answered before now if it had been deemed desirable to reply to it. I may now observe that I listened with great pleasure to the speeches of my hon. Friends who proposed and seconded the present Motion. I must at the same time say, with respect to that family compact to which one of my hon. Friends alluded, that we have no diplomatic information to the effect that such a treaty as he describes was entered into before the war broke out between France and Sardinia; and I believe both have repeatedly denied that any such treaty exists. That the question which is involved in this discussion has been and is still agitated I cannot deny; and I may perhaps now proceed to refer to some of the remarks which fell from the hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth (Sir R. Peel) with respect to it. He said very fairly, alluding to the condition of Chablais and Faucigny, that the Powers of Europe guaranteed the neutrality of those territories; that if they pass into the possession of France that guarantee will have been of no effect, and he expressed a hope that no such arrangement will be made. Now, I think if the subject were confined to that part of Savoy which borders on the Lake of Geneva, it would not be a matter of difficulty to obtain from France the cession of that territory to Switzerland. We did not however look to that object. What we wished was to preserve the whole of Savoy, and we did not discuss the particular question to which the hon. Baronet alluded, and on which, no doubt, Switzerland looks with intense anxiety. Another subject to which the hon. Baronet alluded was the four points to which Her Majesty's Government proposed for the settlement of the affairs of Italy. I beg the hon. Baronet to consider what was the state of affairs just immediately previous to the proposal of a Congress. The Austrian Government had declared that if a single Sardinian soldier should go into Central Italy they would at once march their troops to oppose them. On the other hand, the Emperor of France declared to the Austrian Ambassador at Paris, that the moment a single Austrian soldier crossed the Po, the French army would be marched to oppose them. Consider how critical, how dangerous to the peace of Europe, such a state of things must necessarily be. The remedy was to open the Congress. It was said this extremely critical and dangerous state of things cannot last much longer, because the Congress is about to meet, and will provide a remedy. But then it was agreed by France, in communication with Austria, that the Congress should be indefinitely postponed, and at the same time none of these declarations were withdrawn. There was the same danger, if occasion arose, that Sardinian troops might be marched by order of the King of Sardinia, of Austrian troops being marched to resist them, and of a French army being marched to resist the Austrians. Was it not natural for a Power anxious for the peace of Europe, that dreaded the renewal of the war, to make propositions which they thought might prevent the renewal of such a calamity? We did make those propositions. The first was, that neither France nor Austria should intervene in the settlement of the affairs of Central Italy without the consent of the other European Powers. We did not, it is true, obtain the assent of Austria to that proposition, but this we did obtain—a declaration, made both at Vienna and in London, that the Austrian Government wished no more to interfere in the affairs of Italy beyond their own frontier; that we might rely on it, although Austria would not give up claims she thought just, although she would not give up treaties which bound her to maintain the rights of certain Sovereigns, yet she had no wish or intention to maintain those treaties by force of arms. This alone we looked upon as a great gain and a great security for the maintenance of the peace of Europe. Then we went further in the fourth proposition, and said that if the States of Central Italy determined upon any form of government for themselves we should object to any attempt by force of arms to overthrow that Government, and if the Government they selected should be in favour of annexation to Sardinia, we should not object to that arrangement. This was in conformity with the whole principles we contended for from June to January—namely, that the Italian people themselves should decide with regard to their own government. The hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Bowyer), I am happy to see, has been able to speak his mind to-night. It must have been very painful to him, charged as he was with the whole sentiments of the Pope and the Cardinal, not to have been able to express his views before this time. We have now heard those opinions—we have now heard what the hon. Gentleman thinks of the “manifestations” of public opinion in Central Italy. He seems to think that those “manifestations” are not of much value. There are, no doubt, “manifestations” of no value, but there are also “manifestations” caused by bad government and which are apt to be symptoms of revolution. The hon. Gentleman has perhaps heard of a "manifestation" that took place once on Hounslow Heath. There was an adviser of the Sovereign in those days who was asked by the King what it meant. Such an adviser as the hon. Gentleman said it was nothing; it was only the soldiers shouting for the acquittal of the seven Bishops; but the King knew very well what that was; he knew very well what a "manifestation" meant, and he saw the danger which threatened his throne on that occasion. It is dangerous for Sovereigns to rely on such advisers as the hon. Gentleman, who seems to think that discontent is to be appeased and revolution prevented by merely telling Princes to go on with their Government exactly as it is. We have heard of Princes who had violated the fundamental compact under which they sat on the throne, and who withdrew from their dominions; and such appears to be the case of the Grand Duke of Tuscany—a case very similar to that which on one occasion happened in this country. Sir, with regard to this immediate question, I have one thing further to say. Whatever the more violent newspapers of France may say, although there has been a great deal of excited opinion in France in favour of the annexation of Savoy, I cannot but think that is a course which the Emperor in his wisdom will long hesitate before he finally determines to adopt it. I cannot but see—every one must see—that it would produce distrust for two reasons. The one is that such a policy would be in contradiction to the proclamation—that magnificent proclamation, I must call it, even at the risk of being accused of flattery—which the Emperor addressed to the Italian people of Milan; and the other reason it would create distrust is this—other encroachments of France have begun in small beginnings only on one side of the country, and yet have been afterwards carried by her armies to the territorial disturbance of Europe. I am afraid if Savoy be annexed to France, although there may be a meeting at Chambery in its favour, even although the Powers of Europe might give a reluctant assent, it would be the precursor of a long period of distrust and apprehension. I believe that it would not tend to the strength of France. A country such as France—inhabited by a race so warlike, and at the same time possessing within itself such vast resources—with such wealth, such union, does not depend for its security, its independence, or even its power, upon the question whether its frontier is advanced somewhat nearer to the top of the Alps, or somewhat nearer to the banks of the Rhine. It depends on its own resources, on the spirit of its people, upon the unconquerable spirit of independence which rules in that people, upon its warlike qualities, which from time to time have been called forth, and perhaps never more than last year excited the admiration of every nation in Europe. Such is the security of France. We have known what has happened to France in our days. In 1792, before she acquired Savoy, when her people was in a state of disunion and apparent anarchy, when she was attacked by a formidable league extending from Turin on the one side to Berlin on the other, she was able by her own innate strength and the careful military disposition of her forces to repel the invader and even to conquer the very territories from which she had been attacked. The tide of conquest which then began rolled on until at length her frontier extended from Hamburg on the north to Rome on the south. Was she then more secure? On the contrary, three years after her frontier had been so extended her enemies entered the capital of her dominions. It is, therefore, I say, not the right policy for France—it is not the secure policy for France, to attempt to extend her frontier. Her present ruler, without emulating those brilliant conquests which his uncle made, has, as is well known, established his throne by the sagacity and prudence of his character. Having watched that character—seeing the mistrust likely to be excited, seeing the apprehension and even the hostility that would arise if the Emperor persevered in this project, I cannot but hope that the project will be abandoned, to the general satisfaction of Europe.

Lord John Russell

Motion agreed to.

Address for "Copies or Extracts of the Correspondence which has taken place between Her Majesty's Government and the Governments of the Emperor of the French and the King of Sardinia, in respect to the proposal for annexing Savoy and Nice to the Empire of France."

CUSTOMS ACTS.

REPORT.

MR. MASSEY brought up the Report of Committee on the Customs Acts.

MR. DISRAELI said, he wished to ask when it was the intention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to give an explanation on the subject of the additional Article of the Treaty which had been laid upon the table that evening.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he would do so in Committee. He wished them to move, in accordance with the understanding come to on the previous evening, the Amendment of the Resolution adopted in Committee by substituting for the "31st March, 1861," the words "31st December, 1860." The resolution had reference to the duties to be charged on wines, for a given time from the present in lieu of the duties and drawbacks of Customs now charged or allowed. As the Resolution originally stood it imposed the 3s. duty "until March, 1861, inclusive."

First Resolution read 2^o, and amended, by leaving out, in line 4, "March 1861," and inserting "December 1860," instead thereof; and by leaving out, in line 10, "March 1861," and inserting "December 1860," instead thereof.

Resolution, as amended, agreed to.

Subsequent Resolution agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. MASSEY, Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, and Mr. LAING.

CUSTOMS ACTS.—COMMITTEE.

House in Committee, according to Order; Mr. MASSEY in the Chair.

(In the Committee.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that in rising to move the third Resolution, he wished, in the first instance, to make the explanation for which the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire had very reasonably and properly called with respect to the nature of the additional Article laid on the table that day as an appendix to the Commercial Treaty with France. The object of that Article was very simple, and was fully explained in its recital. The Treaty proceeded on the principle that in cases where a commodity was liable to Excise duty in England, the same commodity, when imported from abroad, should be liable to a Customs' duty equal to the Excise duty chargeable upon it when produced at home, and likewise comprehending an allowance for any money charges that might be entailed on the home-producer by the operation of the Excise regulation. He would not then enter at length on an explanation of the point that arose, but would simply state the fact. Upon a strict investigation it appeared that the differential duty of 2d. established in our law between colonial and home manufactured spirits, which prima facie constituted the proper allowance to be made to the British distiller on account of the cost to which he was put by the indirect operation of the Excise regulations, did not, however, amount to a full compensation for those regulations. It, therefore, became necessary to make some provision for putting the British distiller on a footing as nearly as possible of equality with the Foreign distiller, now that he was about to be subjected to a general, and perhaps a sharp competition. The state of the case was accordingly made known to the French Government, who met it in a spirit of the utmost liberality, agreeing with the greatest readiness that the general principle of the Treaty, which recognized compensation for Excise regulations as well as for Excise duty, should be applied to this particular case with greater accuracy than in the body of the Treaty as it stood. On that account the change had been made in the scale of duties upon spirits, which he should explain more specifically when they came to vote on the Resolution relating to that subject. The additional Article of the Treaty reciting the grounds of the proceeding, likewise recited that the duty on French brandies and other spirits should be raised to a point beyond that indicated in the body of the Treaty, and of course, also, to the point indicated in the amended Resolution now on the table. He should then move the third of his amended Resolutions,—

Mr. Disraeli

„That the duties of Customs chargeable upon the goods, wares, and merchandise, herein after mentioned, imported into Great Britain and Ireland, shall cease and determine, namely, 'Agates, or Cornelians, set.' ”

SIR EDWARD GROGAN said, that as far as the explanation of the Chancellor of the Exchequer went, it was satisfactory, but he had hoped it would go a little further, and would have indicated a desire to do still more justice to the spirit trade.

MR. MASSEY said, he would remind the hon. Member that the question now before the Committee was upon the Resolution, which related to agates, cornelians, &c., and had nothing to do with the spirit duties.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that he wished to repeat his inquiry whether the article of the Treaty now before them was not appliable to the admission of the produce of the whole world, as well as to the admission of that of France? On a former occasion the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had, in answer to his question, informed the House that the article was applicable to the admission of French produce only, and not to the admission of the produce of all the world. However, he (Mr. Newdegate) had referred to competent authority on the subject, and had by that authority been assured that, as the Treaty stood, Her Majesty would remain under an obligation to the Emperor of the French to admit the commodities mentioned in its schedules free of duty, whether they were the produce of France or of any other part of the world, the Emperor of the French admitting in return only the produce of the United Kingdom, not including even the Colonies. Now, it appeared to him that that was an absurd position, for if it was the desire of the British Government to admit the produce of all parts of the world, why had they put themselves under an obligation to the Emperor of the French in order to do that which they might have done without his assistance? The Emperor of the French was not in a position to stipulate on the part of all the world; and if he assumed the right to do so it would be very wrong of Her Majesty's Government to admit any such right on his part. Indeed it was a manifest absurdity; and it appeared to him that the matter should be re-considered by both Governments. Supposing that Parliament consented to the provisions of the Treaty, what would be the position of the Emperor of the French? He might say to the other nations of the world—to the Zollverein, to Spain, or Austria—"Do not trouble yourselves to negotiate with England: she is bound by treaty obligations to me not in any case to exclude your produce for the next ten years, even if you exclude from your markets every article of her produce and manufactures." It was but Christian charity to suppose that that was an oversight on the part of the negotiators. For ten years, however, if the Treaty stood, England would not be able to obtain a release from her obligations; and, therefore, if that House was anything more than a mere record-office they would not accept such a stipulation.

The CHANCELLOR of the EX-CHEQUER said that the hon. Gentleman seemed to think that by the first words of the 5th Article of the Treaty Her Majesty had contracted an engagement with France to abolish the duty on the importation of certain articles, not only when they were imported from France, but also from any other country. In fact, to name one country by way of illustration, that Her Majesty would be bound to receive any of the articles mentioned in the Treaty on the terms therein specified, if they came from Japan. [An hon. MEMBER: Or from Austria.] The Government were advised that that was not the real effect and construction of the Treaty. In the answer which he had given to the hon. Gentleman on a former evening he had stated what they were advised would be its true effect and construction. It was undoubtedly true that in the fifth and other Articles it was not stipulated that the commodities, the duties upon which were to be abolished or reduced, should be the produce of the dominions of His Majesty the Emperor of the French; but the words were general, and it was a canon both of law and good sense that where general words were used they should be construed with reference to the declared scope and purpose of the instrument. That was in this case set forth in the preamble, where it was declared that the high contracting parties "are equally animated with the desire to draw closer the ties of friendship which unite their two peoples, and the wish to improve and extend the relations of commerce between their respective dominions;" and the doctrine upon which the Government had proceeded was, that this preamble indicating clearly the intention of the instrument—which was indeed plain in every line—it was not open to any one to hold a construction so exaggerated and unsupported as that of the hon. Gentleman. He admitted that his construction involved an absurdity, and it was another received doctrine that a construction which involved an absurdity should never be put upon any instrument unless it was required by the words of the instrument. In this case no such necessity arose. The words of the fifth Article must be read with the words of the preamble, which showed plainly that this Treaty referred exclusively to commerce between the respective dominions of the two high contracting parties, and left no room for the construction proposed by the hon. Gentleman.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he could assure the Committee that he had not brought this matter forward without having previously consulted high legal authority on the construction of the whole Treaty, to ascertain not only the effect of the words to which he more particularly referred, but also to ascertain whether there were other words in any other part of the document which would be held to mitigate the absurdity of which he had spoken, and he was advised that there were not. He hoped the Attorney General would, by favouring the Committee with his opinion, be able to relieve him from the impression on his mind.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that he understood the difficulty arose this way. The 5th Article of the Treaty was, "Her Britannic Majesty engages to recommend to Parliament to enable Her to abolish the duties on the following articles." The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Newdegate) thought this amounted to an engagement, not only with France, but with every nation in Europe. Were it not for the circumstance that a high legal authority had given an adverse opinion, he (the Attorney General) would not have found any difficulty in the clause. The Treaty was a contract between the two nations alone. France did not contract on behalf of all the nations in Europe, neither did Great Britain bind any other nation in Europe. It would be a great absurdity for France or for Great Britain to contract on behalf of the great Powers of Europe, without any engagement with them to do so. The result was that the Treaty as a contract could not bind any other Power in Europe; its obligations rested with the two Powers alone. The Treaty was between two parties—they were the domini—they could alone release, alter, or discharge, that contract. The key to the construction of the Treaty was plainly enough given in the preamble, in which the motive which animated the two high contracting parties was declared to be a desire to promote the mutual interests of the two countries and draw closer the ties of friendship between them.

MR. AYRTON said, he would submit that although the commerce of England with other nations than France was not affected by the Treaty, yet France had obtained by it the right of introducing into England the articles produced by those countries mentioned at fixed rates. The objection stated went only to this, that if we wished to obstruct the introduction of the manufactures of other countries, we could only do so directly, as indirectly such manufactures might be introduced into this country through France.

Mr. Newdegate

MR. J. L. RICARDO said, he did not think it at all likely that France would be the indirect means, for instance, of bringing Spanish wines into our markets to compete with her own. The French people would have good reason to laugh at so silly a discussion upon so great a subject, and he trusted they might be allowed to pass on to the discussion of matters of real importance.

MR. SELWYN said, he thought that this point was of too much importance to be treated so lightly as hon. Gentlemen opposite seemed disposed to treat it. He himself did not feel satisfied with the explanation of the Attorney General, and thought his hon. Friend the Member for North Warwickshire had good reasons for objecting to the mode in which some of the articles were framed. The hon. and learned Gentleman appeared to have lost sight of the distinction between the 1st and 5th Clauses of the Treaty. His observation amounted to a condemnation of the language of the first Article; because, if all the subsequent Articles were limited by the preamble, the words "from the United Kingdom" in the engagement of the Emperor relative to the importation of goods must be surplusage. Where one found in two articles a marked difference of language it was natural to suppose a difference of meaning intended. He thought the Committee ought to have some more satisfactory explanation from the Government upon the point.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he thanked the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Selwyn) for supplying him with an argument, which, in his answer to the hon. Member for North Warwickshire, he had omitted. There were in this Treaty correlative engagements; and if there were any ambiguity in the expressions used the language of the one would supply the meaning of the other. It was clear the engagement in the fifth Article was a correlative engagement to that contained in the first. England contracted on behalf of her manufactures, and France on behalf of the productions; and the more formal and exact expression used in the one case helped the Committee to determine what was the nature of the correlative engagement in the other—the one being a consideration for the other. Again, there was no better rule of interpretation than this,—that where there was ambiguity in the words the rational interpretation should be adopted rather than the unnatural and absurd? And it would be absurd to say that we, in consequence of what France did in our behalf, should introduce articles to rival and compete with the articles admitted from France.

MR. HOWES said, the Resolution before the Committee referred to "articles to be made free of duty (under treaty) ;" and the words of it were,

"That the duties of Customs chargeable upon the goods, wares, and merchandise hereinafter mentioned, imported into Great Britain and Ireland, shall cease and determine."

It did not say from France ; and the inference might be that the productions not only of France but of any other part of the world were meant.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that discussions of this kind arose frequently from the fact that hon. Members did not attend to what passed before them. He had already stated that the words "articles to be made free of duty under treaty" were no part of the Resolution. They did not enter into the mouth of the Chairman of Ways and Means at all ; he did not put them to the Committee ; and he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) had stated to the Committee more than once that these words were simply put over the Resolution for the convenience and information of hon. Members. They referred to articles to be made free of duty and also to articles under the Treaty ; but they were not meant to bear any such construction as the hon. Member (Mr. Howes) had sought to give them.

MR. CRAWFORD said, there were certain silk manufactures carried on in Spain. Supposing a French merchant purchased in France goods that had been manufactured in Spain, he would be clearly entitled to export them to this country under the Treaty ; but, supposing an English merchant bought Spanish manufactured goods in this country, he would not be at liberty to export them in France under the Treaty, because they were not articles of British manufacture.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that was a new point, and he should think, though he had not had an opportunity of consulting any authority upon it, that his hon. Friend was right—that, inasmuch as the importation of Spanish manufactures from France might be understood to be a matter pertaining to the commercial intercourse between the two countries, such importation, on a fair and liberal construction of the Treaty, might fairly come within its spirit. That might be so. On the other hand, it was quite clear that the rights of England with respect to exportation to France were limited, by express and perfectly intelligible words, to British productions and manufactures.

MR. J. L. RICARDO said, that the case put by the hon. Member for London would be impracticable, even if his construction of the Treaty were correct, because if Spanish goods passed through the French Custom-house before being sent here, they would have to pay the French Customs duties, as well as any duties levied here. In this way, for instance, Spanish wine would have to pay two duties.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, the first Article of the Treaty only applied to articles of British production and manufacture imported "from the United Kingdom into France." According to the interpretation put upon the Treaty by the hon. and learned Attorney General that Article was correlative to the fifth, and he, therefore, wished to know whether the words of the latter Article were to receive the same interpretation as if the words "from France into the United Kingdom" had been inserted in it ; so that as Australian produce were excepted from the importation of British goods into France, Algerian productions would similarly be excepted from the imports into England ?

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he thought, from comparing Article 5 with Article 1, that Her Majesty had clearly contracted with the Emperor of the French to admit the produce of all the world. Article 6 made the case still stronger. He believed the difficulty arose from careless wording, and a too slavish adherence to the terms of the letter of the noble Lord the Secretary of State. The Attorney General's only argument was that it could not have been intended to bear the construction which he (Mr. Newdegate) had put upon it. There was no doubt of that, but if Parliament sanctioned it the result would be as he had stated.

MR. W. EWART said, he could not suppose that the Emperor of the French had intended to enter into a contract by which he should open the floodgates for the commerce of all nations. Such a construction was inconsistent with the expressed objects of the Treaty. He wished for information upon one point. It appeared that Spanish goods could not go from England into France, but they could be imported from France into England. He would refer to Articles 7 and 8, which contained the same extended views with regard to France and more restricted with respect to England.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that he based his interpretation not upon an hypothesis as to intention, but upon the intention as it could be collected from the words of the instrument. Supposing the case which was present to the mind of one hon. Member, that the Emperor of Japan were to send a ship freighted with manufactures and products of Japan to England, and we were to decline to admit it upon the terms of the Treaty, the Emperor of the French would have a ground of complaint of infraction of the Treaty and a casus belli. ["No!"] That really was so monstrous a proposition that it did not need contradiction. The nature of the Treaty was a larger contract on the part of France than on the part of England in this particular. All things coming from France were to be imported into this country provided they came within the description contained in Article 5. That was a concession made for the benefit of French colonies. Any production which had found its way into France might be imported in French bottoms into this country. On the other hand, the articles to be imported into France were articles of British produce or British manufacture, our system being much more liberal than theirs. The benefit of the Treaty, however, ensured to France alone, who would have no right to ask for its extension to other nations.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, the hon. and learned Gentleman had not answered the question. What he wished to know was whether the produce of the French colonies was to be admitted direct from the colonies into this country; and, if so, whether the produce of British colonies would be admitted into France?

MR. AYRTON observed that the case put by the hon. Member for Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) had not been fairly dealt with by the Attorney General. The case was rather, supposing a French subject with a French vessel had bought a cargo of goods in Japan, would he be entitled to the benefit of this clause?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL, in reply to the hon. Member for Horsham (Mr. S. FitzGerald), said, that, if the assumption was correct that the first Article did not extend to British colonial productions, then by the same rule Article 5 would not extend to French colonial productions. He must not, however, be considered as subscribing to that interpretation.

Mr. W. Ewart

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD: The property of French colonists coming direct from a French colony?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL repeated that every production coming from France itself would be entitled to admission into this country provided it came in under the description in the Article. With respect to the case of French colonial productions coming direct to the United Kingdom from the colony, if the right hon. Gentleman's construction was correct, they could not enter. But having regard to the preamble of the Treaty, his (the Attorney General's) construction was, British colonial productions, being a production of part of the British dominions, would be admissible into France direct from the colony, and the same rule would apply, of course, to French colonial productions, because the contract was, that the relations of commerce should be extended between the respective dominions of Her Majesty and the Emperor of the French, and that term must include the colonies of each. As to the case put by the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton), he would say that if a French ship went to Japan, and there took in a cargo of Japanese commodities, and imported them direct to London, she could not be said to come from any port of the French dominions, and, therefore, was not entitled to the privileges of the Treaty.

MR. AYRTON said, he would admit that it was not enough in the case he had put that the goods should be imported in a French ship; but suppose they were also imported by French subjects.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, there was nothing in the Treaty about French ships or French subjects; the reference was to the dominions and the produce of the two countries. As far as he understood the discussion, there was a disposition to complain that the terms set up in behalf of France were in a certain respect wider than those established on the part of this country, and that this constituted a grave defect in the Treaty. The history of this matter was this:—The intention in the first instance had been to provide for the produce of England and France, irrespective of any question about goods imported from the two countries. As far as he could remember, he believed that the enlargement of the terms on the side of France must have been assented to by the English negotiators at Paris without express reference to the Government at home. He did not hesitate to say, however, that if that were so, the Government were perfectly prepared, as a matter of principle, to stand by the terms of the Treaty as it stood, because they did not instruct the negotiators to introduce into it any limitations whatever, except those which were necessary either to secure equality for our own producers or which were required by the exigencies of our revenue. That was a question of principle, and the Government would have thought it wrong to take their stand upon any other limitations, or to refuse to France any commercial privilege except such as they were compelled to decline from one of those two considerations. But this was hardly a point for discussion now. It entered into the whole spirit of the Treaty; it constituted the essential difference between this and other abortive treaties made with different countries in former days; and at the proper time the Government would be prepared to defend the arrangement in this point of view. For the present, he hoped the Committee would proceed with the business more immediately before them.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, the question was not one of principle. An opinion had been given by the Attorney General as to the interpretation of the Treaty, and he wished to know whether, under the 5th Article, it would be competent for French subjects to introduce the products of French colonies into the United Kingdom direct from those colonies when, in the correlative clause, no such privilege was given to English subjects.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he found the question was expressly answered by the 18th Article, in which the Emperor of the French contracted, on behalf of one of the colonies of France, that its products should be imported into the United Kingdom direct from that colony. According, therefore, to the well-known maxim expressio unius est exclusio alterius, although French colonial products might be imported from France into this country, and British colonial products might be imported from the United Kingdom into France, the only exception in favour of direct importation from a French colony was in the case of Algeria, while direct importation from a British colony into France was prohibited.

MR. BLACKBURN observed that under the 13th Article the ad valorem duties were to be converted into specific duties, the medium prices during the six months preceding the date of the Treaty being taken as the bases for such conversion. He wished to ask whether it had not been discovered in Manchester that, prices in the last six months having ruled some 50 per cent higher than on an average of 10 years before, the specific duty would be not 30, but 45 per cent; and whether a deputation had not represented this unexpected result to the right hon. Gentleman.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the hon. Gentleman was a good deal in advance of him in his knowledge of what was going on at Manchester. He had not heard, and certainly he had great difficulty in believing, that prices had ruled so high there within the last six months as to have advanced 50 per cent on the average of the last ten years. No such deputation had waited upon him, and no representation had been made to him on the subject. It should be remembered that this commutation of the ad valorem duties applied to French as well as to English commodities, and the Government had great reason to be satisfied, and more than satisfied, with the fairness of the arrangement made as to the general provisions of the Treaty. No rated duty could be fixed on these articles without the consent of both Governments, and, of course, it would be the duty of the British Government to see that no rated duty should be imposed higher than the duties prescribed by the Treaty.

MR. TURNER remarked, that the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Blackburn) must have a very exaggerated idea of the prosperity of Manchester if he supposed that during the last six months the price of goods had risen 50 per cent. Certainly, the Manchester manufacturers were prosperous, but not to that extent. At the same time, any conversion of ad valorem into specific duties, on the bases of prices within the last six months, would establish a very erroneous duty, because there had undoubtedly, during our time, been a considerable advance in prices. He had an objection to Article 13, relative to charges on operations in warehouses as it was his belief that it would operate most injuriously, and in fact it would be almost impossible to carry it out.

MR. BLACKBURN observed, that after all he was not so very far wrong in the observation he had made; for it appeared, from the statement of the hon. Member for Manchester, that the average price there, during the last six months, had been over the average price of the last ten years; and he could assure the Chancellor of the Exchequer that some gentlemen had come up from the Manchester Chamber of Commerce to have an interview with the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. HALIBURTON said, that with reference to the 18th Article of the Treaty, which specified that the arrangements of the Treaty were applicable to Algeria, both for the exportation of her produce and the importation of British goods, he wished to ask whether the same advantage was to be given to any of the British Colonies as was there given to Algeria?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that whereas we stipulated for the productions of the United Kingdom generally, France stipulated for those of France, and also, by a separate Article, for those of Algeria also. To that extent Algeria was a favoured colony.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, it would appear that the Government did not originally contemplate any favour being shown to any of the colonies of France, but the negotiators having shown a favour to Algeria the Government did not think it worth while to demand any corresponding favour for the Colonies of Her Majesty.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the noble Lord was entirely mistaken. The Government gave their entire approval to the 18th Article, because France was in a position to deal for Algeria, but England could not deal for her Colonies in the same manner. The great colony of Canada, for instance, had lately been raising her duties on manufactured goods, to the great dissatisfaction of many persons in England, who considered the duties established as protective duties against British manufactures. How would it have been possible, then, for the British Government to stipulate that certain French articles should be admitted free of duty into Canada? The exclusion of the British Colonies from the Treaty was a practical testimony to the liberty they enjoyed.

MR. HALIBURTON said, he understood then that England had no power to grant privileges to her own Colonies. The privileges of a colony were not to be considered, because they could not deal on behalf of a colony.

MR. BLACKBURN asked whether, if a cargo of goods were shipped from Ceylon to Britain, and thence to France, they would come under the same regulations as the produce of England itself?

Mr. Blackburn

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he must answer that question with some hesitation and reserve, as the question was not approached by the Treaty.

MR. BLACKBURN said, that admission proved that the words in Article 1, respecting "British manufactures imported from the United Kingdom into France" did not include the produce of the British Colonies.

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR asked whether Her Majesty's Government contemplated making a supplemental treaty with respect to the British Colonies?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER replied, that was a matter to be decided by the Colonies themselves. At present it was the intention of the Government to go through with what they had in hand before entering on any other question.

"Apples, raw."

MR. BENTINCK said, he believed that the Treaty was a Gordian knot, which could only be unravelled in one way, and the result, sooner or later, must be an appeal to the sword. The apparently unimportant article now under consideration really raised an important question. The question of apples was one of considerable importance. The whole race of Free-traders—as well the original and consistent Free-traders, like the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright), as the recent converts of the doctrine, such as the Chancellor of the Exchequer—had lately taken the line of ignoring the existence of the rural districts altogether in their financial arrangements. It was well that the attention of the inhabitants of the rural districts should be called to this, for unless, like other interests, they combined together for their own protection, they might very soon find the best part of the burden of taxation shifted to their shoulders. Apples, and other articles of that sort cultivated, were mainly produced by men who had but small patches of land—two or three acres—and who had little other produce on which to depend for their subsistence, and he could not understand on what principle the right hon. Gentleman now voluntarily proposed—for he had not heard of any meetings of the apple-growers or the apple consumers to petition for a reduction—to submit them to a competition with the foreign producer.

MR. RIDLEY said, he had expected a dissertation upon Norfolk biffins from the hon. Gentleman, but he was surprised at his observations on the Treaty. The hon. Gentleman, however, might depend upon it that, if any differences should arise between the two great nations, parties to this Treaty, which could not be settled except by the sword, the hands of the country would be strengthened, not weakened, by the Treaty.

MR. W. EWART said, he was the Member of a Commission which had discussed the question of removing the duty on apples, and it was then shown that it would be largely for the benefit of the poor. The foreign apples came in at a time when the English were out, and therefore the home-grower would feel but little injury.

“Apples, of and from British Possessions.

Arms as denominated in the Tariff.

Brass, manufactures of.

Brocade of Gold.

——— of Silver

Bronze, manufactures of, or of metal bronzed or lacquered.

Canes, Walking Canes or Sticks, mounted, painted, or otherwise ornamented.

——— Umbrella and Parasol Sticks.

Caoutchouc, manufactures of.

Cherries, raw.

China or Porcelain Ware, Plain, Painted, Gilt, and Ornamented.”

MR. J. L. RICARDO said, the mode of levying ad valorem duties on these articles had been a subject of great alarm among his constituents in Staffordshire. He, therefore, wished to ask whether the ad valorem duties which, under the provisions of Article 13, were to be converted into specific duties, would be calculated upon a medium price taken upon an average of different articles, or upon a medium price taken upon each specific article, inasmuch as plates differed from each other in cost, according to their style of manufacture, almost as much as pictures.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the hon. Member's question was certainly of great importance, and he would give what explanation he could, but that explanation must be founded upon the language of the Treaty, and upon that only; and, therefore, upon evidence which was as much before the hon. Gentleman as before himself. It might be that, upon a rigid examination of the Treaty, parts would be found requiring explanation; but the Supplementary Convention referred to in Article 13, would not touch any points in which there was likely to be a conflict of opinions or interests. It was emphatically declared in the Treaty that in no case was the duty on the great bulk of British manufactures to exceed 30 per cent ad valorem. It was proposed by Article 13 that the ad valorem duties should be converted into specific duties by a Supplementary Convention, but if those specific duties were not settled, that ad valorem duties should continue to be levied. Where they were agreed upon the fairness of the rated duty it would be passed; and if not, they had the remedy of retaining the ad valorem duty. In dealing with the question of rated duties it would be the duty of the English negotiator to satisfy himself that in no one article would the duty imposed exceed the value, and if it amounted to 30 per cent of the rated value, it would be the duty of the English negotiator to refuse it. Everything that had taken place was calculated to show that nothing could be fairer or more straightforward than the views and intentions of the French Government with reference to these duties; and he entertained a very strong impression that there would be but very little difference on the subject between them when the Treaty came to be carried into execution.

MR. ALDERMAN COPELAND said, he wished to call attention to the great difference that existed between the English and French china and porcelain with reference to quality. The French had as many as seven descriptions, while we recognized only three—namely, coarse ware, common china, and porcelain. It was desirable that in any Supplementary Convention these distinctions should be clearly ascertained. If the French Government were disposed to meet the thing in a fair spirit, they would adopt the American system; let the English manufacturer put his price on the commodity, with his invoice certified by the Consul, and take it on the 5 per cent principle. It should also be recollected that the manufacturers in the interior of England had large imposts in the way of inland carriage, and that France imported some 15,000 tons of clay, and a corresponding quantity of stone from this country for her manufactories on the coast of France.

Clocks, as denominated in the Tariff.”

“Corks, ready made, and Squared for Rounding, after 31st March, 1862.”

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That ‘Corks, ready made, and squared for rounding, after the 31st March, 1862,' stand part of the proposed Resolution."

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, he rose to propose that the article of cork should be omitted from the Resolutions. He did so in the interest of the cork-cutters of England, who were a small but an important branch of the skilled industry of the country. Those hon. Gentlemen who deprecated interference with the Treaty on the ground that it might give offence to France need be under no alarm in the present instance, as there was nothing in his Amendment which could interfere with the interests of that country. France could not produce sufficient cork-wood for her own consumption, and therefore why it should have been introduced into the Treaty he did not know. In 1842 he had advocated the cause of the cork-cutters in this country, whose interests were nearly destroyed by the reduction of duty at that time. There was this peculiarity in their case, that they relied entirely on the material which came from Spain and part of Portugal. The people of Catalonia, where the best corks were produced, from the moment the duty was abolished, had petitioned their Government not to allow the exportation of the raw material, and the Government consented to their request. The supply, which was not of equally good quality, was then derived from Andalusia and Portugal; but it was well known that since the present Treaty had been published the people of Andalusia in like manner were about to petition against the exportation of the raw material. If the Spanish Government consented to that petition, no raw material could come in here, and these men would be ruined. But if the English Government would secure them a supply of the raw material from Spain, they were ready to compete with any part of the world. Under the new tariff Spanish wines could be imported at the lowest duty. The least they could expect, then, from Spain was that its Government would allow this raw material to be exported. In addition to the duty, a penny was to be levied on every package; this would fall very unequally on the raw and manufactured article. By the duty and the tax together the raw material would be taxed 8s. 4d. per cent, and the manufactured article only 6½d. per cent. The trade could not stand against that. As he had said, they did not object to free trade, provided they could obtain a supply of the raw material: but unless that could be done they would be ruined as well as many other industries, such as floor-cloth, shoe-sole makers, life boats, and other interests, into whose operations the cork manufacture entered. He should move that the words "Corks ready made and squared for rounding" be struck out of the Resolution.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he believed there were some parties interested in maintaining the duty on the partially manufactured article. If that were not the case, he had no objection to removing at once the duty on corks squared for rounding. But that might be discussed hereafter. As to the penny package duty, he was not aware that all cork was imported in bales; but the penny would be a very simple matter of adjustment. The Government did not intend to levy a penny on all packages quite irrespective of value. As far as any restraints existed on the exportation of the raw material from foreign countries the Government would use every exertion to obtain the removal of restrictions; and he thought that the concession from Spain, in consideration of other concessions contained in the Treaty, might in fairness be asked and expected. This was not the first time they had heard of the cork trade in debate. There was no article which, in the legislation of 1842, had excited so great a degree of attention as that of cork wood, and he was quite ready to admit that the waste as between the raw material and the finished article was, perhaps, greater in the case of cork than in that of almost any other commodity. But if those circumstances afforded a sufficient reason why the trade, of whose interests his hon. Friend was the advocate, should be protected, he could only say that we must be prepared to adopt as a permanent rule the principle of Protection. But how, let him ask, stood the facts of the case? Why, the particular trade in question had been greatly enlarged since the principles of free trade had begun to be partially applied. In the years 1841-2-3 we had imported on an average into this country 2,606 tons of cork wood; in 1856-7-8, 5,114 tons, or nearly double that amount; and in 1858, 6,579 tons, or little short of the amount which had been imported when a monopoly existed. Nay more, an increased export trade in corks had since then been established, for whereas in 1841 we had exported only 92 barrels of British-made corks, we had in 1857-8 exported nearly double that amount—or 163 barrels. His

hon. Friend, however, contended that the question was one in which France had no interest; but the fact was that France supplied us with three-fourth of the total quantity of cork imported, while Spain and Portugal between them supplied us with only one-seventh. Catalonia, he might add, was not the only country on which we depended for our supply of cork wood; it was grown in France, in the southern provinces of Spain, and in Morocco, in which countries, as far as he was aware, no restraint upon the exportation of the article existed. It would therefore, he thought, under all the circumstances of the case, be most unjust to levy a duty upon the importation of cork from France, who threw no difficulty whatever in the way of the export of the raw material, because it so happened that Spain, in respect to one of her provinces, had prohibited its exportation. Under these circumstances he could not assent to the Motion of the hon. Gentleman. All that he could do for the meritorious persons whose cause his hon. Friend had advocated was to follow the precedent which had been set in cases where the immediate repeal of a duty would too sharply affect a particular duty—that was, postpone the operation of the law for a certain time, which in this case he could not fix at a later date than the 1st of April, 1862.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he was glad to perceive that the hon. Member for Finsbury had at last found out that free imports did not, in all cases, mean free trade. He regretted, however, that the hon. Gentleman entertaining the views which he had just submitted to the Committee, should have deemed it to be his duty to vote a few evenings before in favour of the general scheme of the Government. But be that as it might, he (Lord J. Manners) had no hesitation in following the example of so venerable an authority on the subject of free trade as the hon. Member in voting for the retention of so innocuous a duty as that to which this Motion related, bringing in as it did some £7,000 or £8,000 a year to the Exchequer, and which had not been made the subject of complaint from any quarter.

SIR FRANCIS BARING said, he hoped the Committee would consider the question in a spirit of fairness, and without any desire on the part of hon. Members to twit one another with their departure from the principle of free trade. Some time ago he had felt it his duty to deal with the question before the Committee; and the consequence was that a deputation of cork-cutters had waited upon him for the purpose of stating to him their views of the proposed abolition of the duty. He could add that they had discussed the subject with great fairness and intelligence. The fact was that they did not object to free trade; they only asked for free trade. They were ready to compete upon equal terms with the foreign manufacturer; but those terms, they contended, would be denied to them if corks were allowed to be freely imported into this country while the raw material of which they were made was not allowed to be exported from the district in which it was grown in the greatest perfection. That was not free trade, it was protection to the foreigner. The right hon. Gentleman said that there had been an increase in the trade since the reduction of the duty in 1842; but he (Sir F. Baring) would explain to the Committee what it was that had really taken place. In 1842 there was a considerable reduction of the duty upon manufactured corks. Immediately afterwards the Spanish Government prohibited the exportation of the cork wood from Catalonia, where the best material was grown. The result was that the manufacture of best corks in England had ceased. It was true that the manufacture had since that time largely increased in this country, but it was confined to the production of the coarser descriptions of the article. Spain still allowed the coarser material to be exported, and the cork-cutters here, by their industry, had been able to keep up and increase their trade. But he would ask was the present proposal fair—was it common justice to our own people? Was it fair that the manufacturer abroad should have a monopoly of the best kinds of the raw material, and that he should then be allowed to import the manufactured article into the English market free of every duty? The Chancellor of the Exchequer said that they might feel assured the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs would use his best exertions to get rid of the prohibition of the export of cork wood from Catalonia. He (Sir F. Baring) supposed that some exertions were used when the prohibitory duty was imposed, but, so far from their having any effect, he believed the Spanish manufacturers were pressing upon the Spanish Government to extend the prohibition to the coarser material. If that were done the unfortunate cork-cutters would be in the old Scriptural position of having to make bricks without straw. They did not wish to interfere with any country from which the raw material was freely exported. [The CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Hear, hear!] If the right hon. Gentleman would only take off the duty on manufactured corks, the produce and manufacture of the countries where there was no prohibition of the raw material, that would meet the case. He hoped that some consideration would be shown to persons who, in common justice and fairness, were entitled to it.

MR. BENTINCK said, it appeared to him the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had put the case in so clear a manner that it did away with the necessity of arguing the subject in any other light. He might mention, however, that he had received many communications from various parts of the country, representing the great hardship which was about to be inflicted on these poor people. The whole Treaty was a system of protection to the foreigner and of free trade for the Englishman, and it applied most grievously to the cork-cutters. They could not rely on the noble Lord's (Lord J. Russell's) influence with the Court of Spain, seeing that he had been led to believe that the Spanish Government would not permanently occupy any portion of the territory of Morocco, which it now appeared would be done. He wished to hear, before the division which he hoped would take place, some reason, other than a blind adherence to a vicious principle, why they should reduce to absolute starvation some thousands of their fellow subjects, including great numbers of women and children.

SIR EDWARD GROGAN said, that he had presented a petition from Dublin signed by persons engaged in the cork trade, in which they stated that if this provision of the Budget were carried out their trade would be abolished. In consequence of the tariff of 1842, the manufacture of the finer article had totally ceased, and it was only in consequence of the reduction of the duty on glass, causing a larger quantity of corks to be used, that the cork-cutters had been able to maintain their trade.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, the proposal they were going to vote upon was whether they should put a high duty on manufactured cork coming, not from Catalonia, but from where it might. Again, I do not see that if the duty were kept on manufactured corks from Catalonia, it would not afford that benefit to the cork manufacturers which the hon. Member for Finsbury was anxious to afford.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, that with permission he would withdraw the Amendment as it now stood, striking out "cork" in the third Resolution, and propose instead the addition of these words after 1862—"the produce of countries from which the export of cork wood is free."

Amendment proposed, after "1862," to add the words "the produce of Countries from which the export of Cork Wood is free."

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, he believed that this would so alter the issue that it would require some consideration how it should be met. They were about to give a great encouragement to the manufacture of corks by increasing the consumption of wine. He should like to know how the proposition of the hon. Member for Finsbury would be reconcilable with our obligations under the favoured nation's clause. He did not know whether we had such a clause in our treaties with Spain. The fact was simply this: the manufacturers of cork in this country wanted to have a protecting duty of 33 per cent, and nothing less than that would satisfy them.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS said, he thought the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. M. Gibson) had just adduced the strongest argument in favour of the Motion of the hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. T. Duncombe). If the cork trade was about to be extended by the increase of the consumption of wine, that was a reason why they should try to procure a full supply of the raw material. With the greatest pleasure he would support the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman for that reason. He had presented a petition from persons engaged in this trade, and their statement was that they were now obliged to confine themselves entirely to the manufacture of the rougher description of cork, Spain having shut them out from the finer descriptions, and now the Government were proposing to admit the finer material in a manufactured state, which would altogether exclude the British cork-cutters from competition. It was of no use to say that the Foreign Minister would remonstrate and negotiate with Spain. The Government had had the same means of obtaining concessions from Spain as from France, but they had never asked for them; and it was idle now to talk of such negotiations after the steps the Government had taken, and which had given Spain everything she could desire. The time for remonstrance with Spain was passed, and therefore he with the more pleasure supported the Amendment. Indeed, the most effectual remonstrance with Spain would be the adoption of this Amendment, by which she would be excluded from participation in the benefits of this remission, unless she consented to the free export of the raw material.

Francis Baring

COLONEL SYKES said, he would support the claim made by the British cork trade.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, that in his opinion the reasons of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade were frivolous. He (Sir J. Fergusson) had received strong remonstrances from constituents of his own, complaining of the proposal of the Government. He hoped the hon. Member for Finsbury would not shrink from going to a division in which he should receive his most cordial support. The Government would justly incur odium if they resisted the fair demands of a deserving and industrious class.

MR E. P. BOUVERIE said, he wanted to know was the export trade from abroad free? ["No, no!"] It was free from Andalusia, and other parts of Spain. He did not think his hon. Friend the Member for Finsbury could insist on his proposition, seeing the changes that were taking place. He was opposed to introducing a monopoly in their tariff for the sake of one trade. By so doing they would necessitate certificates of origin, and thus introduce into the Custom-house arrangements the very complication they were so anxious to avoid.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he did not understand that it was the desire of either the hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. T. Duncombe), or the right hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir F. Baring), to prevent the Government from fulfilling the Treaty with France as it affected corks; and he was not able to say that the Amendment as it stood would satisfy the conditions of that Treaty. He was not aware of any restriction upon the export of corks from France, and understood it was practically free, but there might possibly be some nominal duty, which would render the Amendment, if carried, an obstacle to the fulfilment of the Treaty. The Resolution before the Committee went further because, acting on the general principle which they believed to be sound, they had not stopped at their engagement as it stood in the Treaty, but they had proposed that universally the import duty should be free irrespective of their engagement with France. Our manufacturers complained that in certain cases there was a prohibition on the export of cork wood to this country. The question whether we ought to take notice of the law of other countries in fixing the regulations of our own tariff was a question of the deepest and most vital importance, and he hoped the Committee would come to no hasty conclusion upon it, and that they would not come to a conclusion with reference to the article of cork without having considered where the principle was to lead them, because, as he understood it, the proposition was that they must inquire into the legislation of every foreign country, and unless they were satisfied with the terms of the legislation, they were not to give that nation the benefit of introducing the article. That was the doctrine at issue. It was a question, however, of such range, entering so largely, not only into the propositions of the Government, but into the whole of the proceedings of the British Parliament for the last eighteen years, that it was essentially necessary the House should have a full opportunity of considering its effects, both as a principle of commercial legislation, and also with regard to the present state of our international engagements. He did not think it was a question that could be fairly raised on the present occasion for the simple reason that nothing could be more inconvenient than that the question of the fulfilment of the French Treaty should be mixed up with the question of the importation of corks from Spain, in one quarter of which the exportation of the raw material was prohibited. Were the House, on a question of this kind, to prevent the Government from fulfilling their engagements with France? He had not objected, as he might have done, to the hon. Member for Finsbury, substituting a second Amendment for his first. Under these circumstances he hoped the hon. Gentleman would permit him to alter his original Motion so as to present to the Committee neither more nor less than was sufficient to fulfil our engagements with France. The Resolution would then be to this effect—That on and after the 31st March, 1862, cork ready made, and squared for rounding, the produce or manufacture of, or imported from, France or Algeria, should be admitted. It would be competent to the hon. Gentleman to move an Amendment on that. With regard to the time of making the second, and more general proposition, that cork should be admitted free of duty after the 31st of March, 1862, it would probably be more convenient to postpone it till another evening. At the same time, if his hon. Friend the Member for Finsbury, wished it, he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) would not scruple to make the general proposition immediately; but, in the first place, he would propose that Resolution, which would enable them to carry out their engagements to France.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, he must decline to withdraw his Amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN: You do not withdraw it?

MR. T. DUNCOMBE: No.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I cannot suppose my hon. Friend understands the case. He found occasion to alter his Amendment. It was in my power to prevent it, but I made no objection whatever. I now propose, not for any purpose of convenience to myself, but for the general convenience, to separate the question of the importation from France under the Treaty and the general question, including the importation from Spain, and request permission to alter the original Resolution.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE: The right hon. Gentleman says he might have prevented me from altering my Amendment. Why, then, did he not take a vote of the House upon it immediately?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I speak to order. The hon. Gentleman has said that I could not have prevented him from altering his Amendment without a vote of the House upon state what is the point of

d not under-e Member for endment. I n to meet the n it was put
n. Gentleman
ify that intensh I put from is now before

Exchequer

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, that the right hon. Gentleman had raised an important constitutional question. Were the Committee at liberty to make alterations and amendments in the tariff; and, if, so, were those alterations fatal to the Treaty? He had asked the right hon. Gentleman a few days ago whether the House of Commons was to have the power of altering the Treaty, but could get no answer to his question. He repeated the question a day or two afterwards in another shape, and then the Chancellor of the Exchequer refused to answer it, because, he said, if he did he could not reply to the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli), although that was incorrect. The Chancellor of the Exchequer now asked whether the Committee were about to prevent the Government from fulfilling the conditions of the Treaty? It therefore came to this, that all these discussions were perfectly useless. The people of England had now been told by the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the Resolutions and decisions of the British Parliament must be subservient to the French Treaty. Now, he maintained that the French Treaty should and ought to be subservient to the British Parliament, and with that view he had moved his Amendment. He said they were about to do an injury to industrious traders by taking off the protective duty, without giving them the raw material by which they carried on their trade. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade told the Committee the prohibition of the exportation of cork wood was the work of Catalonia; but who was responsible for that prohibition? The Government of Spain, and it was that Government he wanted to bring to book. Persuasion, they had been told, would be tried by the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, but he had more confidence in a vote of that House than in the persuasion of the noble Lord. If the House agreed to his Amendment, France, which had no corks to send us, would induce Spain to let England have the raw material.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS said, he wished to remind the House that the course proposed to be taken by the Chancellor of the Exchequer was that which he last week in solemn terms told them could not be followed. When it was proposed to consider the Treaty before the reductions of duty, the right hon. Gentleman said that if the House went into Committee on the Treaty, and considered the reduction stipulations in the Treaty, they would be considering the reduction on French produce only, whereas by considering the Budget first, the Government would be proposing to reduce the duty upon the produce of every country whatever. Yet now, having got the House into Committee on Customs Acts, the right hon. Gentleman changed his field of battle, and asked the Committee to consider the duty on French produce alone, whereby to-morrow morning they might find French corks bearing a different duty from the corks of other countries.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the course of which the hon. and learned Gentleman complained commended its own reasonableness. The Government had made certain arrangements with France, and they had now to consider how to ratify those engagements. The Government thought they were paying the greatest respect to the House by assuming that if those engagements were to be ratified it would be in the shape which the House had for years adopted—namely, by recognizing no distinction between produce of the same kind in reference to the country from which it came. They were now met, however, by an objection which raised a peculiar assumption, not known to the legislation of the House of late years—that it was the duty of the House to take cognizance of the state of the law of other countries when it fixed the duties to be levied upon our own produce. As that doctrine had no reference to the Treaty with France, he had asked the hon. Gentleman (Mr. T. Duncombe) to allow him to separate those two questions. Let the House first consider the Motion which submitted the engagement with France, and after that let the hon. Gentleman raise another Motion upon which he might raise the proposition he wished to enforce with reference to Spain. The hon. Gentleman refused him the courtesy of withdrawing his Amendment, as he hoped, under a misapprehension. He proposed now to make the same proposal, but to divide it into two parts, so as to separate that which belonged to the Treaty from that which belonged to general legislation. If, however, the hon. Gentleman would not permit him to amend the Resolution for the convenience of the Committee, he had no alternative but to divide against the hon. Gentleman. If, after the statement he had made, and the willingness he had expressed to give the fairest play and the fullest opportunity of raising the question, the hon. Gentleman persisted in dividing the House, he trusted that he should be supported by the Committee on a division, whatever the opinion of the Committee might be upon the question which the hon. Gentleman wished to raise.

MR. CROSSLEY expressed his opinion that there had been a good deal of dust thrown upon the cork question during the discussion; but he (Mr. Crossley) said that it simply resolved itself into the question of protection or no protection—protection meaning a favour shown to one man by the robbery of some one else. They had to deal with cork makers and cork users. Which was the more numerous class? Why should the less numerous be protected at the cost of the more numerous class? The Protectionists thought they were strong in the House that night, and therefore were making an effort to protect the makers of corks by causing the users of them to pay a larger price than they were worth in the market of the world.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, he did not think that the question was one of protection or no protection. If it were, he confessed he should prefer following the hon. Member for Finsbury as a Free-trader rather than the hon. Member who spoke last or the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He thought the hon. Member for Finsbury was quite as old, as consistent, and as good a Free-trader as any other Member of that House. The point at issue was, whether, when we admitted the manufactured article from abroad, we should also extend that privilege to those who prohibited the exportation of the raw material. No doubt, the Chancellor of the Exchequer's proposals were perfectly intelligible. Their only fault was that they were wholly contradictory. The right hon. Gentleman now wished to take the Resolution with especial reference to the French Treaty. Only half an hour before, when a similar question was raised by the hon. Member for Warwickshire, the right hon. Gentleman said the Treaty was not before the Committee.

MR. CLAY said, he thought that the hon. Member for Finsbury would best serve the cause of the cork-cutters by acceding to the offer of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He should vote against the admission of corks from Spain while she prohibited the exportation of the raw material, but he could not vote against the admission of corks from France, which made no such prohibition.

MR. HOPE said, his opinion coincided with that of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Clay) and he should follow the same course.

MR. AYRTON said, he wished to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he proposed to allow a French subject, in a French ship, to bring manufactured corks from Spain into England? If that was the proposal it would defeat the object of the hon. Member for Finsbury, but if it was proposed to prevent the bringing in of corks from Spain, directly or indirectly, upon the same terms as with France, he apprehended that the objection of the hon. Member would be met.

SIR WILLIAM MILES inquired whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer would bring forward the general question with respect to Spain immediately after the other points had been disposed, because, if so, he would earnestly appeal to the hon. Member for Finsbury to withdraw his Motion.

MR. NEWDEGATE asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether it would not be more convenient to adopt at once some terms which would apply to the Resolutions generally the rule he now proposed to apply to the article of cork. If he did distinctly limit the privilege of free importation to the produce of France and French possessions the same difficulty would arise with regard to every article.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he had three questions to answer. With regard to that put by the hon. Member who had last spoken, he had not the least hesitation to state that if at any time a practical inconvenience arose which would involve a difference of principle between the trade with France and the trade with other countries there would be no objection on the part of the Government to adopt the suggestion of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate); but in the absence of any positive ground for such a course he should not depart from the usual proceeding. The hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets asked would limit the ity to cork the plied in the ne-disclaimed these origin of goods highly protective difficult and fertile that we had an impossible to report of France

France, the im-
le. To the third question, he would say that he had already given a positive pledge to go on with the general question immediately; but if hon. Members looked to the clock, he thought this would not be a convenient course to-night. But if it were the general wish of the Committee, he would concede his own opinion and do so. He certainly did not think it would be a convenient course to adopt the proposal of the hon. Member for Finsbury. At the same time he admitted that it was highly desirable that hon. Gentlemen should have an opportunity of considering a proposal so novel; and therefore he distinctly promised to offer no obstacle to its discussion after that portion of the Resolution that bore upon the Treaty was disposed of.

MR. S. FITZGERALD: What will be your proposal?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I propose to add at the end of the Resolution these words, "The produce or manufacture of or imported from France or Algeria." And then, subsequently, "Cork and cork woods without restriction."

SIR HUGH CAIRNS said, he wished to point out that the words "produce or manufacture" might meet the view of the hon. Member for Finsbury, but that the use of the phrase "or imported from" would still admit Spanish corks. All Spain would have to do would be to transfer her corks to some French port, and that would be corks imported from France in the words of the Resolution. He would suggest to the hon. Member for Finsbury to give up his Amendment altogether, rather than to accede to the proposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I think the objection of the hon. and learned Gentleman to our proposal applies with greater force to that of the hon. Member for Finsbury. For, take the words of my hon. Friend and I defy any fiscal regulation to prevent the evasion of the restrictions which he means to propose. I should like to know, supposing his Motion carried, how we are to prevent corks manufactured in Spain from passing through France into England. My hon. Friend's Motion is, that we should not allow corks to come into this country duty free from any country which forbids the exportation of the raw material. Well, supposing it to be true, as the hon. Member affirms, that Spain does intend to prohibit the exportation of the raw material of corks, what would be more easy than that Spanish corks should come in through France, and then the object of my hon. Friend would be completely defeated. I think that nothing can be more intelligible or fairer than to say that, there being no prohibition in France against the raw material, we should not prohibit the importation of the manufactured article from France to England. But then, having agreed to that provision in the Treaty, the House might go on to consider whether or not it is consistent with our legislation, or whether it is practical, to adopt the proposal of the hon. Member for Finsbury, and say, with regard to Spain or any other country, that unless they allow the free exportation of the raw material, you will not allow the manufactured article to come in duty free. Every one must see the inconvenience that will be produced if, when a cargo of corks arrives in England, we shall be obliged to wait in order to ascertain, either from Andalusia or Catalonia, whether any duties had been levied on the cargo. It is obvious such a regulation would lead to altercations between the Custom-house authorities and the importers; and, besides baffling the ingenuity of the Customs' officers, it would produce the most serious confusion in mercantile transactions.

MR. PULLER said, he would recommend the adoption of words in the fifth Article, similar to those employed in the first Article of the Treaty with reference to English goods—namely, “Articles of British production and manufacture imported from the United Kingdom.” By this means they would get rid of the difficulty.

SIR FRANCIS BARING agreed that it would be much better if there were no distinctions with regard to produce. However, that was not the fault of England; and he hoped that the existing prohibitions would not be long maintained. Indeed, he had no doubt that if the House showed itself in earnest, and the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs were able to lay before the Spanish Government a Resolution of the House of Commons exempting cork the manufacture of Spain from the benefits of the present Resolution unless they took off the duty on the exportation of cork wood, that the Spanish Government would be induced to do so. On the one side they had the inconvenience which had been pointed out, and on the other the Resolution of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, which would have the effect of ruining some very industrious men, unless they were provided with the raw material. There could be no doubt that the greater part of the cork imported from France now came from Spain. Unless the words “corks the produce of Spain” were added, the Resolution of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as it stood, would do nothing for the cork-cutters of this country, and, therefore, he thought it would be better to divide and settle the question at once.

MR. CONINGHAM said, that this was a question of free trade or protection. If the Government gave way upon this matter there would be similar discussions upon every other Article; he should therefore support the proposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, he thought that the most convenient course would be for the Committee to divide upon his Amendment, after which the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer might, if he pleased, move the addition which he had suggested.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, that the simple fact was that the proposal of his right hon. Friend was consistent with the French Treaty, and the Amendment was not. If carried, it would be necessary to have a supplemental treaty.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE replied, that the noble Lord at the head of the Government had informed them that if any alteration were made, a supplementary treaty would be required. Why should they not have it? Indeed, they would require one with regard to spirits, and they could easily include corks. The Emperor was too sensible, too wise, and too just a man not to accede to it.

Question put, “That those words be there added.”

The Committee divided:—Ayes 118; Noes 191: Majority 73.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that although he was not bound by an offer to which his hon. Friend had agreed, he thought the best course he could now take was to move the insertion of the words which he had expressed his willingness to adopt before the division took place. [“No, no!”] He believed some Gentlemen had voted in the majority who would not have done so if they had thought that the whole question was going to be decided by that vote. He would therefore now propose the insertion of the following words—“The produce or manufacture of, or imported from, France or Algeria.”

Amendment made, by adding the words “the produce or manufacture of, or imported from, France or Algeria.”

Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, it would be impracticable to proceed to any contested questions at that period of the evening, and perhaps the most convenient course would be that corks other than those imported from France should be dealt with after the Committee had concluded the Resolutions which related to the Treaty.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he was induced, by the expression "contested questions," to ask how far, in the opinion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Committee was free to deal with any of the Articles of the Treaty. It would appear, from the language held by Members of the Government, that every item to which the Committee was asked to consent was mixed up with the Treaty, and that the Committee was not at liberty to discuss it. That being so, it was a mere idle waste of time to consider the items one by one; at all events, it was desirable that the Committee should have a distinct declaration from the Government whether it was or was not free to reject any of the Articles of the Treaty which it might think impolitic.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That 'Cotton Manufactures, as denominated in the Tariff,' stand part of the proposed Resolution."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that he would move that part of the Resolution which related to cotton manufactures, not with the intention of raising a debate upon it, but for the purpose of enabling him to answer the question of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Droitwich (Sir J. Pakington). His right hon. Friend must see that his inquiry turned upon and involved the largest constitutional principles, and that it was not in the power of any Minister or Government to answer it in any form which could carry the slightest authority for the Members of that House. It was the duty of every hon. Member to answer it for himself. The Constitution had committed to the Crown the absolute power of concluding and ratifying treaties and of binding the faith of the country, but it had done so subject to the obligation of applying to Parliament for its sanction in cases where legislation was required, and likewise subject to the general responsibility of Ministers even in cases where legislation was required. In the present case legislation was required. The contract into which the Crown had entered was an incomplete contract until it was submitted to and sanctioned by both Houses of Parliament. The consideration of high policy and convenience, which might render improper the exercise of even private judgment upon questions of secondary importance when the consequence was to defeat the application of a treaty or to create a necessity for new negotiations, was a matter that would occur to the mind of every reflecting man, but not one upon which he could for a moment presume to interfere between each hon. Member and his own sense of what was right and prudent.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he accepted the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer as highly satisfactory. At the same time he trusted that when the Committee resumed the discussion of these Resolutions no more would be said of the bounden duty of Parliament to pass the Articles of the Treaty without any alteration whatever.

MR. BALL moved that the Chairman should report progress.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL remarked, that he had not heard any one say that it was the bounden duty of Parliament to pass the Articles of the Treaty without alteration. Parliament had a perfect right to do what it pleased in the matter. It might begin with the wine duties and reject that and every other Article of the Treaty if it thought fit. The question was whether it would be prudent to take any step which might prevent the Treaty being carried into effect, or involve the necessity of fresh negotiations. That question, however, was entirely in the discretion of Parliament; its power to deal with the Treaty was undoubted.

SIR MINTO FARQUHAR maintained that the Treaty had been drawn up in such a manner as to impose upon Parliament the necessity of adopting it word for word as it had been placed upon the table. If such was not the case, why were they told, when they objected to any of the Articles, that they were interfering with what were called the obligations of the Treaty? The discussions of the Committee were not free.

MR. NEWDEGATE asked, whether the words "cotton manufactures" included articles of clothing made up.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER replied that they were. He trusted the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire would withdraw his Motion.

MR. BALL said, he thought the right hon. Gentleman, after answering questions all night, must be physically incapable of proceeding further at that hour.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he could not accept the favour which the hon. Gentleman offered him. The greatest favour the hon. Member could confer upon him would be to allow him to go on with the Resolutions. They might have a chance of taking these Resolutions to-morrow, but probably that would not suit the convenience of Members. He trusted there would be a disposition on other days, except in cases where business of a very urgent nature was involved, to proceed with these Resolutions. He hoped to be able to bring them on again at some period on Thursday evening, provided he could do so at a reasonable hour. He wished to take the sense of the Committee of Ways and Means to-morrow as to the duty of 8s. 1d. on British spirits, as it was desirable for the convenience of the revenue that effect should be given to that vote immediately after it was delivered.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, if he rightly understood the right hon. Gentleman with regard to the order of proceeding on Thursday it amounted to this, that as soon as any discussion that might arise on the Reform Bill was concluded, the right hon. Gentleman should proceed with his Resolutions, and, as far as hon. Members on that (the Opposition) side of the House was concerned, there would be no objection to that course.

MR. WHITESIDE said, he wished to ask when it was intended to bring in the Irish Reform Bill?

MR. CARDWELL stated that it was his intention to bring forward the Irish Reform Bill on Thursday evening, after his noble Friend the Foreign Secretary had introduced the measure relating to England.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he wished to know whether they were to have three Reform Bills on Thursday?

MR. MACAULAY said, he wished to know how far the Committee was free to discuss the propositions of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Part of the Resolutions now before the Committee stated that the Queen had recommended Parliament to do so and so, and he wished the Government to state how far the House would be free to discuss those propositions. It was also stated that the Emperor of the French was willing, he had no doubt in consequence of what had passed in the House, to modify that part of the Treaty which related to coals. He hoped, therefore, the Government would admit not only the constitutional right of this House to discuss the Treaty, but the willingness of the French Emperor to make any modification of the duties which the House of Commons might suggest.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, it was obvious if the Emperor of the French was absolutely bound to make certain relaxations of duty and to remove certain prohibitions, and if the Queen was only bound to recommend to Parliament the abolition of the duties on a great number of articles, and Parliament rejected that recommendation with respect to any considerable number of those articles that that would not be a fulfilment of the engagements of the Treaty on our part. With regard to the Customs' duties, Parliament must consent to them before the requirements of the Treaty were fulfilled. It would be competent for the Emperor of the French to say, if the House of Commons should refuse its sanction to certain articles, that he was free from the engagement. He might, or might not, in that case choose to make another Treaty, or to modify the existing one; but he would be entirely free from the obligations imposed upon him by the present Treaty.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he must complain that in every previous instance in which he had put a question, bearing on this point, the answers of the Government had been evasive. He would not even except the answer given a short time before by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He (Sir John Pakington) had not asked any question about constitutional practice, but whether the Committee was free to reject certain items in a list of articles, with respect to which items many hon. Members were of opinion that we were about to throw away revenue, extravagantly and rashly, without any corresponding benefit to any class or interest in the country? The question was, whether the Committee was free or not to discuss the wisdom of certain provisions and to reject any of the articles which they might deem impolitic or unwise?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, that was a question, not only for the decision of the Committee, but for the decision of the French Government. The right hon. Gentleman appeared to think it would be foolish to throw away revenue on many of the items in the Treaty. He would not dispute that question with the right hon.

Gentleman. All he (Lord John Russell) contended for was, that if any material items were rejected by Parliament, the engagements on the part of the Queen would not be fulfilled. If such an item as that relating to artificial flowers, for instance, were rejected, he should certainly be surprised if the Emperor of the French were to say that in consequence of that decision he could not go on with the Treaty. But, supposing persons were to say in France, as they did say, that it was entirely a one-sided Treaty, and that it made France the slave of England—there was no doubt that was said—no one could tell to what risk the Treaty might be exposed. Cannon balls might be required to enforce it. It was, therefore, a matter of discretion with Parliament on the one hand and the French Government on the other, but as a matter of discretion the Government certainly did recommend Parliament to sanction the engagements which had been entered into.

Mr. WHITESIDE said, he had understood that the effect of the Treaty would be to unite the two nations; but if cannon balls were required to enforce it, surely the effect would be to separate them. It was a pleasant prospect to contemplate the possibility of such a specific being rendered necessary. The fact appeared to be that, supposing the Treaty to contain 250 Articles, and the House adopted 249, rejecting but one, then the Emperor of the French was at liberty to consider himself relieved of all his obligations respecting it. This was certainly an agreeable kind of arrangement.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Chairman do report Progress,"—put, and agreed to.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again on Thursday.

House adjourned at half-after Twelve o'clock.

F L O R D S,

February 29, 1860.

Met, and having gone
on the Paper,

at a quarter before Four o'clock, till To-morrow.

11

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, February 29, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—2^d Spirits (Ireland) Act Amendment.

3^d Administering of Poison.

WAYS AND MEANS.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read. House in Committee.

Mr. MASSEY in the Chair.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he rose to move the following Resolution, namely:—"That, towards raising the supply granted to Her Majesty, in addition to the duty now payable on spirits distilled in the United Kingdom, there shall be charged on every gallon of such spirits at proof which, on or after the 29th of February, shall be distilled or be in the stock of any distiller, or in any duty-free warehouse, or removing to such warehouse the additional duty of one penny." It was not necessary for him to enter into any statement then, because, in point of fact, the duty of 8s. 1d. upon British spirits had reference to the duty which was about to be fixed on foreign spirits, and to the general arrangements consequent on the adoption of that plan. The most convenient period for considering the effect of this Vote would be when the Government made the proposal with regard to foreign spirits. Of course if that proposal was not adopted, then the present one might be open to modification—the simple object of it being to preserve the revenue from loss by any anticipated delivery from bond in the interval before the Committee had adopted the final Resolution.

Resolved,

"That, towards raising the Supply granted to Her Majesty, in addition to the Duty now payable on Spirits distilled in the United Kingdom, there shall be charged on every gallon of such Spirits at proof which, on or after the 29th of February, 1860, shall be distilled or be in the stock of any distiller, or in any duty-free warehouse, or removing to such warehouse, the additional duty of one penny."

House resumed.

Resolution to be reported To-morrow.

Committee to sit again on Friday.

QUALIFICATION FOR OFFICES ABOLITION BILL.

SECOND READING.—ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [1st February]. "That the Bill be now read a second time."

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, when the Bill was last under consideration, he had moved the adjournment of the Debate, because the Measure proposed to alter the present state of the law, under which no person could be excluded from a corporate office on the ground of religious belief. The law in respect to admission to those offices was analogous to the system adopted in regard to the admission of Members to that House. The constitution of this country was Christian, and that fact was expressed by the connection which existed between the Church and the State. The constitution both of the Civil Corporations and of this House recognized that fact by admitting the various sects of Christians according to their denominations, with a distinct provision as to the admission of Jews which constituted an exception from the general rule. He trusted that that principle would never be changed, for upon it was founded the greatness of the country, and the high moral character which it possessed in the eyes of the whole world. By virtue of that principle the meanest subject had the right of appealing to the great code of morality if any injustice were done to him. For the law and the State both being Christian, any violation of Christian morality was inconsistent with the character of both. His reason for objecting to the present Bill was, that it appeared to ignore, or depart from, that principle upon which legislation had hitherto proceeded, and which recognized the fact that the laws of England were based upon Christianity. The Bill seemed to lay the foundation of an internecine war between the various powers of the State, for it proposed to abrogate the declaration taken on admission to corporate functions against the use of the civic power for the purpose of attacking the Church. For those reasons he had moved the adjournment of the Debate when the Bill was moved at a late hour of the night. In the present thin state of the House, however, it would be absurd for him to enter into so great a question. He should, therefore, content himself by expressing his dissent to the passing of the Bill, and his hope that on some future occasion the House would feel disposed to consider more seriously the grave question it involved.

Question put, and agreed to ;

Bill read 2^a and committed for To-morrow.

MASTERS AND OPERATIVES BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. MACKINNON, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said, the object he had in view was the establishment of a friendly tribunal, to be called a Council of Conciliation, and to be constituted of an equal number of masters and operatives, to which all disputes between those two classes should be referred. If the Motion which he had made last year had been adopted by the House, all the misery which had resulted from the recent strike would have been spared. Considering the extraordinary privations which had been caused by that strike, he could not help thinking that some measure of this sort was absolutely necessary, and he could scarcely see what objection would be raised against it. In every strike there were four classes who suffered—first, the masters, whose capital and property were sacrificed; next, the workmen, who were exposed to misery and privation by reason of the loss of their wages; next, the small shopkeepers, whose ordinary class of customers were the working men; and, lastly, the public at large. The Preston strike had entailed a loss of £2,400,000, and it was calculated that the average loss to the community by strikes throughout Great Britain was about £1,000,000 a year. Under these circumstances, it was most extraordinary that Parliament should continue to refuse to provide a remedy for these strikes. He had heard it said that the reason why Parliament refused to legislate was, that it relied on the 5th of George IV., entitled an Act for settling disputes between masters and workmen; but that statute was totally inoperative. There was a mutual dislike, and more strong on the part of the operatives, to refer questions to an unknown set of men, nominated by a justice of the peace. Going before a justice, too, in the opinion of most of the men bore the character of a criminal proceeding, and when resorted to by the workmen not unfrequently ended in their dismissal. If the parties named refused to act, all decision was left to the justice, and many of the cases raised required special knowledge of the particular trade, which a magistrate could not be expected to possess. Mr. Hammill, in his evidence before the Committee, stated that the most disagreeable duty which he had to perform was the disputes between the Spitalfields weavers and their masters. Large bodies of operatives throughout the country had declared in favour of this Bill, and last Saturday a meeting was held in St. Martin's Hall, Long Acre, attended by about 2,000 builders and brickmakers, at which resolutions were passed approving its provisions. The conduct of the workmen during the late strike was, considering their fearful privations, deserving of all praise, and therefore their desires on this subject should meet with the kind consideration of this House. The evidence before the Select Committee of the year before the last proved that the equitable councils of conciliation had worked wonderfully well in France for fifty-four years, and had prevented many disputes there between workmen and employers; and he had it on the authority of M. Van de Weyer, the Belgian Minister, that the same had been its effect in Belgium. It had been said that the idea of this Bill had been stolen from the French law, but that was not the case. It was taken from the practice of the House of Lords and the House of Commons. When they differed, delegates were appointed to meet in conferences and settle the questions in dispute; and why not give the same privilege to the workmen and their employers? How did strikes arise? The workmen, feeling themselves aggrieved, met together and sent to their employers, perhaps, a violent and impudent message, insisting on the raising of their wages or the shortening of their time of work. The masters had a meeting in their turn; they were excited at the insulting message they had received, and they sent back a point-blank refusal. Then there was a collision between the two classes, and a strike followed. It was impossible that the present system, which perpetuated hostility between the different classes, could be suffered to continue; and it was the duty of the House to pass such a Bill as would restore a feeling of confidence between employers and employed, and to lay the foundation of a future means of accommodation on equitable terms in the event of difficulties unhappily arising. As objections might very possibly be taken to the details of the measure, if the House would give it a second reading, he proposed to refer it to a Select Committee.

Motion made, and Question proposed—
 "That the Bill be now read a Second Time."

Mr. SLANEY, in seconding the Motion

Mr. Mackinnon

for the second reading, said both workmen and masters owed a deep debt of gratitude to the hon. Gentleman by whom the question had been brought forward for the unwearied pains which he had taken in endeavouring to provide a remedy for the great and increasing evils from which the country was suffering. Not merely were the working classes increasing from year to year in numbers and importance, but the different subdivisions of labour and the various degrees of skill required by the new kinds of manufactures which were constantly introduced gave rise to a complexity of interests more or less conflicting, and rendered it absolutely necessary that some mode should be devised whereby disputes could be adjudicated upon in a friendly spirit, and to the satisfaction of both parties. In all cases where controversy arose a great want was felt of some power which could interfere at the outset to prevent dissatisfaction from spreading and gaining a dangerous height. There could be nothing more valuable than some machinery by which workmen, who in moments of excitement were led by mischievous persons to commit acts of which they afterwards repented, and which entailed lasting injury on themselves, their wives, and families, should be induced to adopt the reasonable course of laying their complaints before a friendly council, impartially chosen, which would be the medium of accommodating exorbitant demands on either side, and in whose well-considered decision they would both be disposed to agree. In every part of the country vast buildings were to be found filled with the industrious classes, on whom this council would confer an inestimable boon, in elucidating points which might be in issue and in deciding whether complaints or demands were really founded in justice. Among those in a better position in life vexatious and expensive suits in courts of law were constantly avoided by a reference to arbitration. This Bill was in effect a proposal to extend the benefits resulting from such a course to the industrious poor, with whom the loss even of a few days' work was attended with more serious consequences than were felt by the rich who expended time or money in litigation. If the House rejected the measure, they would in effect be giving scope to angry passions, and encouraging the violent, the hasty, and the uncompromising of both sides, whose pride was interested in keeping up dissensions. On the other hand, by adopting the Bill they would be adding weight to the efforts of the moderate men who, from their practical acquaintance with the subject, were the best fitted for dealing with those difficult and delicate questions which were always involved in trade disputes. As it stood, the measure was merely an enabling Act, and his hon. Friend proposed to refer it to a Special Committee, in order that any provisions to which objection might be taken should be modified. He could not believe the House would refuse its assent to a proposal for the establishment of such a tribunal, when made with the view of lessening those great and growing evils to which the industry of the country had hitherto been subjected, and which, though it might not altogether prevent the occurrence of strikes, would lead, in his opinion, to a great diminution in their most pernicious effects.

MR. WALTER said, it was not his intention to offer any opposition to the second reading of the Bill, because he believed that its provisions were, to say the least, harmless, and because the hon. Member by whom it had been introduced was willing to refer it to a Select Committee. But he must guard against its being supposed that he for a moment acquiesced in the opinion which had been expressed that such a Bill would have the slightest possible effect in preventing the periodical occurrence of strikes, and those serious differences between masters and workmen of which the country had such lamentable experience. The hon. Gentleman seemed to have become involved in some confusion of ideas with respect to the meaning of the word "dispute," for he had given a definition of that term which, he believed, altogether differed from the view that he really intended to convey to the House. In one portion of his speech he had alluded to a certain class of disputes which arose between masters and workmen as to questions of fact. It was easy to perceive that in trades of a complicated character differences of opinion must often arise as to the mode in which a workman had performed his task, which would involve other questions as to the amount or proportion of wages to which he was entitled; and for the consideration of technicalities and difficulties of this nature some council, such as it was proposed under this Bill to frame, might be a very fit tribunal. But the points on which strikes turned were not matters of fact, but questions of opinion, and originated in much deeper passions and feelings than were excited by mere disputes as to the mode in which a contract had been fulfilled. Those occurrences, of which the House had lately heard so much, arose, on the one hand, from a desire on the part of workmen to obtain a larger amount of pay than employers thought proper to give; and, on the other, from an equally natural desire in the minds of employers to keep down wages, and not to submit to what they considered the exorbitant demands of those who were in their service. It was not to be supposed that a measure like the present would have any effect in settling disputes of this serious nature, which in reality involved the question of free trade, and the right of both parties to agree upon their own terms. He therefore hoped that when it got into Committee the hon. Gentleman would endeavour to define those disputes as to which it was supposed the Bill might exercise a beneficial effect, and would not suffer himself to be persuaded that it could really terminate the differences between masters and men which eventuated in strikes. With this reservation he had no objection to the Motion for the second reading.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the hon. Gentleman in former Sessions had not felt it necessary to take a vote upon this measure, but the events of last summer and autumn had probably induced him to think the present a more favourable time for asking the House to entertain the question. But it was precisely because the great builders' strike of last year had excited attention and given rise to anticipations in some quarters that legislation would take place that it peculiarly behoved the House not to give its assent to any measure on this subject, unless it were fully convinced that it would prove effectual as a remedy. If any hon. Member could conscientiously say he believed the propositions contained in the Bill would prevent the evils generated by a "strike," he ought to give his vote in favour of the measure; but otherwise he would probably agree with him that it was better not to raise false expectations and hopes throughout the country, unless the House had power to pass some measure which, in a moment of great excitement or difficulty, would arm either the parties themselves or the Executive Government with the means of carrying out some reasonable agreement. The Bill consisted of two parts. The first clause gave powers to workmen and masters to appoint certain persons to hear and determine cases in dispute between them; but in what respect did this differ from the existing law, which sanctioned the appointment of arbitrators. The clause therefore was either useless or imperfectly expressed. The second portion of the Bill provided that any number of masters and workmen, being independent householders, at a meeting specially convened, might agree to petition Her Majesty for licence to form an equitable council of conciliation, possessing all the powers enjoyed by arbitrators; and, if the licence were granted by Her Majesty or by the Secretary of State for the Home Department, that a council—to consist of not less than two masters and two workmen—should be elected for a year. What object would be achieved by these enabling powers he was at a loss to understand; but if the machinery which it was proposed to create was to have any practical effect, it must be to make the Government to a certain extent responsible for the formation and working of these councils. Application had been made to the Government in the course of last summer to interfere in the dispute between the masters and workmen, and he refused to act in any way as an arbitrator, being perfectly convinced that if he undertook any such office he should have completely failed. The question was rather a trial of strength between the parties, or had reference to minute technical relations of trade, and in either case a Member of the Government was a most unfit person to become a mediator. Believing that the Government ought never to interfere unless it could do so with usefulness and effect, he had refused to do so, and the result convinced him that he had exercised a proper discretion. The same reasons induced him now to think that the Government would be outstepping its office in promoting the formation of these councils, which could only raise expectations that would not be fulfilled. When a strike occurred persons were ordinarily exasperated against each other, and if expectations of accommodation were held out by the Government which were afterwards disappointed, that exasperation would be naturally, and he would add justly, increased. His hon. Friend the Member for Shrewsbury (Mr. Slaney) with that benevolence for which he was distinguished, said, in seconding the Motion, that he wished the disputes between masters and men to be adjudicated on in a friendly spirit and in a manner satisfactory to both parties. When disputes occurred it was the wish of everybody that such a tribunal could be found by which that could be done; but in practice, where parties were envenomed by hostile feeling, he had never yet known any means of bringing them to an immediate agreement with perfect satisfaction to both. He therefore feared, if the House were now to give its assent to the second reading of this Bill, they would be only encouraging false hopes and fostering delusions among those whom they were most desirous of leading into the right way. But if the House believed that any good could arise from inquiring into either the facts or the law of the matter, he should not object the appointment of a Committee, with the understanding that it was to be in no way confined to the objects of the Bill, or contingent on its adoption. If the question went to a division, he should feel it his duty to move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months; but he trusted his hon. Friend would render that course unnecessary by withdrawing his Motion for the second reading.

Sir George Lewis

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, the origin of strikes had been described by the hon. Member for Berkshire (Mr. Walter) as a matter of opinion, and by the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down, as a trial of strength between the two parties; but he would ask the House whether such reasons adequately accounted for a strike like that in Lanark, for example, in the year 1856, when there were 40,000 men on strike, and by which masters, operatives, and shopkeepers suffered to the extent of £300,000 in a month; or for that in Preston in the year 1852 or 1853, where the operatives alone incurred a loss of £520,000. Could such facts as these be caused by mere opinion? If it were a mere trial of strength, it was a battle of giants. During the building strike last year, they heard a great deal from the journal which had the largest circulation in this country about the acts of folly committed by the men; the wives and families of thousands were reduced to destitution, some died, and others actually killed themselves rather than give in. Was it likely that all this suffering was incurred for a mere matter of opinion? Men in general give up their opinions; nay, even desert their principles rather than lose their money; much less would 40,000 men combine to starve for nothing; or see their families perish around them for a mere tournament of strength. Or was it not rather probable that the men felt there was some principle at stake which they thought it necessary to uphold? It was easy to say that one man forced another to stand out, but if the majority believed that they were not right in doing so, they would soon force the minority to yield. Persons said the workmen were led astray by demagogues. But had the persons who hazarded such statements ever gone to see the men who were out on strike? He came to London for the purpose, and went to one of their committee-rooms in the Strand, and more reasonable and moderate men he had never met. They expressed their ideas well—in better English than he had sometimes heard in that House. He had also gone to the Paviers Arms in the neighbourhood of that House, where he had found men equally intelligent and equally reasonable, and he did not hear an angry word or a malicious sentiment till a hot-brained fellow named Potter made his appearance; and he, it is true, cast about his words “like a Fury slinging fire.” Strikes arose from a want of sympathy and of proper understanding between the masters and workmen, which gradually engendered a mutual suspicion and estrangement, so that when some trivial circumstance took place, which might be easily settled by arbitration, it acted like a spark and produced an explosion. Some masters, for instance, would affix a notice to their gates intimating that after a certain date the rate of wages would be reduced; and this at once led to a strike; while others consulted their workmen, showed them that the reduction was reasonable, and the matter passed over quietly. The right hon. Gentleman has said that the existing law (namely, the Act of George IV.) is sufficient; but the blue-book issued by the Committee which sat in 1856, showed that nearly all the witnesses who were examined disapproved of the existing state of the law, because the first step to be taken in the event of any dispute was to go before a justice of the peace, which looked like a criminal proceeding. The justice was then to appoint the arbitrator, who was thus chosen after the difference on which he was to decide had arisen; instead of being appointed, as the Bill proposed, once a year, by which means greater impartiality would be secured. The right hon. Gentleman (Sir George Lewis) had called on any Member who conscientiously believed that the Bill would have the effect of preventing strikes to support the Motion for the second reading. He would be that Member; and he was strengthened in his view by the evidence to which he had referred. The eligibility of these councils of arbitration was not a matter of opinion, but one which had been tested by experience. They existed both in Denmark and in Norway, and their operations had been attended with most perfect success; in Belgium they were likewise to be found, and no strikes were ever heard of in the large manufactories of that country. In France they had their conseils des prud'hommes to deliberate on cases in which differences arose; and M. Van der Weyer distinctly stated that of the enormous number of cases, amounting to 15,000 or 18,000, which were heard every year, the vast majority were settled in a manner satisfactory to both parties, and but very few were followed by any subsequent litigation. The principle had likewise been voluntarily adopted in this country in various branches of industry; and, indeed, it appeared even better adapted to this country than to others, as foreign countries did not possess, to the same extent, the power of self-government. He was surprised at the opposition of the right hon. Gentleman (Sir George Lewis), for if workmen in Manchester or Leeds living in £6 houses were, by the gift of the franchise, to be enabled to choose their representatives and to have a voice in State affairs, on what principle could he refuse to allow them to select a council for the management of those interests in which they were exclusively concerned? Boards of arbitration had been voluntarily established with perfect success. After the great strike of 1839 among the carpet-weavers in the north of England the masters expressed a wish that the trade should be governed on just and impartial principles, and proposed that a meeting of delegates should be annually held, at which they themselves would attend, and confer with the delegates from the operatives in regard to their mutual interests. After this board of arbitration was established the men two or three times demanded an increase of wages, which was held to be reasonable; and on another occasion, when they had manifested great anxiety to obtain it the board disallowed the claim, and the men acquiesced in the decision. This board entirely obviated all strikes. In Kidderminster, as long as a similar board was in existence, there were no strikes. In Macclesfield the board continued in existence for three years with the most perfect success, and was only dissolved owing to the want of legal power to enforce its decisions. In the Staffordshire Potteries the Courts of Arbitration worked so well and so amicably, that it never even became necessary to appoint the arbitrator provided by the rules. In Stoke-upon-Trent, similar arrangements were equally efficacious in preventing strikes, and most of the masters had now given their adhesion to such a plan. The compositors in London settle the disputes between masters and men in a similar manner. The masters and operatives of the boot-making trade met, after a long dispute in 1853, and their differences were speedily terminated. The shipwrights in Sunderland had such a board, and it met with a similar success. And in Price's Patent Candle Company disputes are avoided by a like conciliatory system between the masters and the employed. The ex-mayor of Nottingham, who was examined before the Committee of 1856, deposed that councils of arbitration, if established by law, would be acceptable, not only to the men, but to the employers, and certainly tend to obviate strikes. M. Chevalier, who was at present the great authority on political economy, viewed the system of equitable councils of conciliation as "one of the noblest creations of the present century." Mr. Mill, a writer on kindred subjects in this country, devoted two entire chapters to this question, in which he expressed himself even more strongly. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary was anxious that this Bill should be withdrawn, and that a Committee should be appointed. He, on the contrary, hoped that the hon. Member would persevere in his Motion, as a Committee had already sat and collected evi-ngly recommended that the character should be at the present moment, when, a ruling might be said to be made between masters and men, ought to be put in preventing a recurrence of strikes, from which so much has resulted. All are loud in their praise and in enlarging on the benefits of pay to men, women, and children; on the loss of trade, and loss of profits, and loss by unused capital, machinery, and buildings. All therefore allow that there exists a great evil, which calls for a speedy remedy. Such has now been proposed in the Bill before the House. Many witnesses have testified their approval of such boards of conciliation and arbitration. Similar boards have been tried with success in Denmark, in Norway, in Belgium, and in France. Such boards have accomplished their object wherever voluntarily established in this country. And, besides, the Bill before the House did not bind either class to submit to any new regulations; it was merely permissive in its character. The councils were only to last for a year, at the end of which time, if they proved unavailing, they need not be renewed; but if, as he firmly believed would be the case, it was found that they had done much to prevent strikes, the House would have no difficulty in renewing them for a longer period.

Mr. EDWIN JAMES said, he hoped the House would accede to the very reasonable proposal that the Bill should be read a second time, and then referred to a Select Committee. To the principle of the Bill—the establishment of some system by means of which the disputes between masters and operatives might be satisfactorily arranged—he could see no objection that could be raised; while he was at the same time disposed to think that the machinery which it provided would be found unworkable. He should also observe that, in his opinion, the operation of the Bill, should it pass into a law, would not prevent strikes, although it might put an end to those early animosities and differences between masters and men which so often eventuated in strikes. He was of that opinion because he coincided with the hon. Member for Berks (Mr. Walter) in believing that strikes had their origin in causes far deeper than legislation, such as that to which the House was asked to assent, could remove. During the recent lamentable strike in London the workmen, it appeared to him, had put themselves into a false position by demanding to be paid for labour which they did not perform; but it must, upon the other hand, be admitted that the masters had adopted a retaliatory measure which was equally unjust—he meant the imposition of the document which they required the workman to sign. An arrangement of the dispute had, however, been brought about by the kind interposition of a noble Lord, so that if such a tribunal as that proposed in the Bill had been in existence, it was probable the strike would never have taken place. He trusted that the appeal which—on behalf of hundreds of thousands of men who had passed through a great struggle and endured great privations with the utmost fortitude—was made to the House in the present instance would not be made in vain, and that they would at least affirm the principle, that they did not begrudge the time spent in endeavouring to adjust by some mode the differences between masters and their workmen.

MR. HENLEY remarked, that the Bill presented a difficult question to the House, and great care should be taken in legislating on the subject. The object which the promoters of the Bill had in view was one which it was desirable to accomplish, but he, at the same time, agreed with the hon. and learned Member who had just spoken in thinking that its machinery would be completely useless for that purpose. The definition of terms which it contained was extremely vague, and it would, as a consequence, be impossible to say whether, in the recent building strike in London, the persons to be elected under its provisions should be chosen from among the Irish labourers or some of the other men belonging to the several trades concerned in the strike. He must also observe that the fact which had been stated by the noble Lord the Member for Huntingdonshire (Lord R. Montagu) that voluntary arrangements were in a large number of cases effected between masters and men with a perfectly satisfactory result, inclined him to the opinion that it was undesirable to proceed in any careless and hasty system of legislation in the matter. Another point to which he wished to call the attention of the House was that, if the proposed councils were to be empowered to settle differences, and then, as was intended, the authority to enforce their awards was to be vested in somebody else, great inconvenience would be the result. He, for one, should, as a magistrate, object to have that sort of ministerial authority placed on his shoulders; nor did he think it quite right that he should be called upon to pass sentence of imprisonment in a case which he had not heard, and upon the merits of which another tribunal had decided. The result of acting upon the provisions of the Bill in that respect might be that he would render himself liable to an action for false imprisonment. He should, however, raise no objection to the proposal that the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee; but if, upon the other hand, the Government on their responsibility should maintain that the Bill ought to be thrown out, he should vote with them.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE observed, that while admitting the desirability of some tribunal by which disputes between masters and men might be settled, he did not think the operation of the Bill would be to remove those causes by which a strike was brought about, or to lead to the settlement of the differences which in those cases prevailed. There were, however, other questions—such as the amount of work done—he was ready to admit with which councils of conciliation might satisfactorily deal. He must at the same time say that the machinery which the Bill provided was of the crudest and weakest description possible. He thought it unfair to throw on the Secretary of State the responsibility of negating a proposal of masters and men for the establishment of such a tribunal in a particular locality; and he doubted whether good would arise from reference of the Bill to a Committee of the whole House, although he was of opinion that benefit might result from a reference of the whole subject to a Select Committee. On the whole, he would suggest to the hon. Member who had brought the measure forward, whether it would not be better at present, in the absence of decided suggestions for remedies of the admitted evils, that the recommendation of the Secretary of State should be complied with.

MR. BLACK maintained that the Bill, if it passed into a law, would, instead of promoting conciliation, lead to the contrary result; inasmuch as the very fact that the operatives knew that there were tribunals to which disputes between themselves and their masters might be referred for settlement might lead them to start objections which, under other circumstances, they never would have contemplated raising. It was true that the great bulk of the operatives were sensible men, but there were among them agitators whose office it appeared to be to excite discontent. He was convinced, therefore, that the Bill would be productive of more harm than good, and he thought that the appointment of a Select Committee to consider the subject would only tend to excite hopes which could not be realized.

MR. POLLARD-URQUHART said, that any measure on the subject must be tentative. He hoped, therefore, the House would consent to the second reading, in order that an attempt might be made in Committee to remedy the defects in detail of the measure. He had read several pamphlets of late on the subject of strikes. They were aware that the amount of wages depended on the ratio of supply and demand; but they seemed to imagine that strikes were the only means of raising wages where the masters desired to keep them unduly low. He thought that courts of reconciliation could be constituted, which would have a beneficial operation; and he hoped the House would allow the Bill to go into Committee.

MAJOR EDWARDS supported the second reading, and advocated the appointment of a Select Committee.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID said, that his vote for the second reading might depend on the answer which the hon. Member should give with regard to the powers of the proposed courts of arbitration. He objected to the power which the Bill apparently gave to one party to compel another to appear before the proposed councils, a power which he believed could not be safely entrusted to a committee of working men.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he very much doubted whether the law as it stood was not sufficient to meet the object which the Bill proposed to effect. He had had some experience in strikes, and had always found it an easier matter to deal with the men themselves than with their committees. At present, however, there was an uneasy feeling among the working classes, and he should be sorry to see the House close its doors against the complaints of the workmen. There were, moreover, certain matters connected with the details of trade in which it was expedient that the men should have more power of producing evidence before some board than they at present possessed. He must, however, deprecate the passing of the Bill as it stood. In the machinery for electing the councils of conciliation, they did not, in his opinion, go sufficiently amongst the body of the people. The councils, also, ought to have the power of enforcing their decision.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, there were two matters involved in the Bill, first as to what questions were to be submitted to the new councils of arbitration, and next, what would be the power and operation of such tribunals. With regard to the questions that were to be referred to the new tribunal—were all the same as those which could be decided by arbitration under the existing law, with the exception of the question of wages. The statute of Geo. IV. strictly excluded all interference with the rate of wages, without the mutual consent of masters and workmen. The question of wages, however, was included in the new Bill. The principal change was in the constitution of the tribunal itself; and he thought the change likely to produce more mischief than good. The machinery of the existing law was very simple, and he had not heard any fair case of complaint against the tribunal of justices, or the powers it exercised. Then, if the existing tribunal was not open to objections, why should Parliament be required to set it aside? The machinery devised by the present Bill was very cumbrous, and was likely to cause a great deal of agitation that did not now exist. It would create a controversy between two classes without any good result to compensate for it. He hoped the House would reject the Bill.

Mr. Black

SIR MORTON PETO said, he trusted the House would not adopt the advice of the hon. and learned Gentleman; it would create an impression that they closed their doors against discussion on any question that affected relations between the working classes and their employers. Still, as to the measure itself, he thought it would not promote the object its hon. Mover desired. The noble Lord (Lord R. Montagu) had correctly stated that councils of conciliation existed in Denmark, Norway, and Sweden. He had had to conduct large works in Denmark; there the several trades were regulated by "guilds," and under them there were councils of workmen and masters. But he had found it so impossible to carry on any work, liable to the interference of these guilds, that he always made it a condition precedent, that the guilds should have no power of interference; and he did it quite as much in the interest of the workmen themselves as his own. In Denmark a workman could not remove from one parish to another to get work till he obtained a certificate from the minister and two churchwardens, declaring that he had conducted himself properly in that parish. Such regulations were of a nature that England could never adopt. He thought the existing law was effectual, as the magistrate had the power of appointing arbitrators. If the Bill before them had been law at the time of the recent strike, it would not have prevented or in any way affected it as had been argued, because the half a dozen masters would have been found voting one way, and the six workmen the other, so that the whole reference would have come to a dead lock. He hoped the second reading of the Bill would be postponed, in order to refer it to a Committee with large powers; it would sift the whole question, and its decision would be satisfactory to the country.

MR. MACKINNON said, he wished to express his obligations to the noble Lord (Lord R. Montagu) for his able and interesting speech, and to the hon. Member for the suggestion he had just made; no man had more practical experience of the subject. He would postpone the second reading of the Bill until that day month, and then move that it be referred to a Committee.

MR. FRANK CROSSLEY observed, that the tendency to strikes among the workmen was becoming every year much less in proportion as the master and workmen understood better their mutual relations; and he regarded the Bill as one which would not prevent those collisions that had occurred in times past, and which, in his opinion, might to a great extent have been avoided if the masters had met their workmen in a spirit of calm deliberation.

Amendment and Motion, by leave withdrawn. Second Reading deferred till Wednesday, 28th March.

ADULTERATION OF FOOD OR DRINK BILL.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read,

MR. WISE said, that in the absence of his hon. Friend (Mr. Scholefield) he rose to move that the House go into Committee on this Bill. An inquiry had been ordered three Sessions ago, into the subject of the adulteration of food and drink. The Committee made its Report in 1856, and subsequently the matter was discussed in the House, but nothing had been done. The Committee, however, had established the fact that adulteration was practised wherever it was possible. It had, in truth, become such a science, that other countries, France, Germany, Holland, Spain, the United States, and Belgium had been compelled to take very strong measures to put a stop to this degraded and disgraceful system. Adulteration was in the highest degree an injustice and hardship on the poor; that fact alone should be an inducement to the House to go into Committee. The wealthier classes were able to protect themselves, the poor could not do so. The Report of the Committee proved that by the systematic adulteration of articles of food and drink, the public health was endangered, pecuniary frauds were extensively practised, and the moral character of the country deeply affected. It was no answer to the demand for legislative interference to say that the purchaser might protect himself. Least of all was that an answer in the case of the poor man who had enough to do to earn his bread without spending time in analysing it. He believed that many more persons died actually poisoned, than was generally supposed. Nux vomica and arsenic were common elements in articles consumed by the people. And as there were punishments for the makers of base coin, so ought there to be punishments for those who poisoned the public. The system had hitherto remained unchecked; the maxim had been caveat emptor; it was high time it should be caveat vendor. The Report of the Committee enumerated:—

“The leading articles that were more or less commonly adulterated; these are, arrowroot, adulterated with potato and other starches; bread, with potatoes, plaster of Paris, alum, and sulphate of copper; bottled fruits and vegetables with certain salts of copper; coffee with chicory, roasted wheat, beans, and mangel-wurzel; chicory with roasted wheat, carrots, sawdust, and Venetian red; cocoa with arrowroot, potato-flour, sugar, chicory, and some ferruginous red earths; Cayenne with ground rice, mustard husk, &c., coloured with red lead, Venetian red, and turmeric; gin with grains of Paradise, sulphuric acid, and Cayenne; lard with potato-flour, mutton suet, alum, carbonate of soda, and caustic lime; mustard with wheat-flour and turmeric; marmalade with apples or turnips; porter and stout (though sent out in a pure state from the brewers) with water, sugar, treacle, salt, alum, cocculus Indicus, grains of Paradise, nux vomica, and sulphuric acid; pickles and preserves with salts of copper; snuff with various chromates, red lead, lime, and powdered glass; tobacco with water, sugar, rhubarb, and treacle; vinegar with water, sugar, and sulphuric acid; jalap with powdered wood; opium with poppy capsules, wheat-flour, powdered wood, and sand; scammony with wheat-flour, chalk, resin, and sand; confectionary with plaster of Paris and other similar ingredients, coloured with various pigments of a highly-poisonous nature, and acid drops, purporting to be compounded of Jargonnelle pear, Ribston pippin, lemon, &c., with essential oils containing prussic acid or other dangerous ingredients. The adulteration of drugs is extensively practised; and when it is borne in mind that the correctness of a medical prescription rests on an assumed standard of strength and purity in the drugs or compounds employed, and how frequently life itself depends upon the efficacy of the medicines prescribed, it is difficult to exaggerate the evils arising from this prevalent fraud. The adulteration of drinks deserves also special notice, because your Committee cannot but conclude that the intoxication so deplorably prevalent is in many cases less due to the natural properties of the drinks themselves, than to the admixture of narcotics or other noxious substances intended to supply the properties lost by dilution. Though adulterations prevail more or less in all districts, it may be assumed, as a rule, that the poorer the district, the greater is the amount of adulteration. Nor have the poor the same power to protect themselves against such frauds as their richer neighbours; they are necessarily limited to such means of purchase as are afforded by the immediate locality in which they reside, and are, moreover, too often bound to one dealer by the facilities of credit which he affords them."

The House would see it was a subject worthy of some consideration; and in Committee they would be able to say whether the clauses of the Bill were adapted to secure the object they must all have in view. One fact alone was almost enough to persuade the House to go into Committee. Dr. Hassall in his evidence described a kind of spurious tea called "Lie Tea"—a very fit name for it, though it was given by the Chinese—used to adulterate other qualities; and it was found that much of what was sold to the poor as tea contained no tea whatever. One sample was brought before the Committee, by which, though it excited a smile, they were much disgusted. Large quantities of tea were mixed with silkworms' dung; it was called and sold as "gunpowder tea." Of course the Committee did not venture to taste it, but they were assured its flavour was very peculiar; yet it found a large market in the poor parts of the metropolis, as the silkworms' dung gave it the appearance of

The only other article he was wine. The facts not a question, but at this moment in respect of another. Challice in his evidence was not necessary for the poor suffering from sickness; they were getting pure wine; the adulteration. I have seen many instances where I have recommended port can be procured at publichouses, as a welcome stimulant and agent, it has produced pain, acidity, griping, irritation, and mischief, instead of good. It is a matter of notoriety, I believe, that a composition is sold as a substitute for port wine. I believe the astringency imparted to the liquid is by alum; I believe there to be an infusion of logwood; I believe there to be also juice and sugar; it is a chemical combination entirely different from port wine."

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

Mr. VINCENT SCULLY said, he highly approved of the object of the Bill, and would concur in any means that would put an end to the adulteration of food and drink; but after an examination of the provisions of the measure, he had reluctantly arrived at the opinion that it would not secure the object intended; and that no alteration would make it do so. It would do no more than introduce a useful principle, that it was the duty of the Government to interfere to prevent adulteration. In the interests of Ireland he should be glad to support an effective measure; the trade in Irish butter was seriously injured by the importation of foreign butter adulterated with tallow, flour, and water. Beef suet was exported from England for the purpose of adulterating foreign butter, which could be sold in this country at a lower price than the genuine Irish. The consequence has been that the importation of Irish butter had declined from 10,000 casks weekly to 3,030. The Bill provided no means of stopping this adulteration. He would suggest an effectual remedy. Instead of a parish analyst, they should have a competent board of analysts, connected with the Board of Trade, or the Board of Health, who should be empowered to enter any shop, and analyze every commodity for sale. They might take the parish beadle and churchwardens, if it was thought proper, to assist them; but they should have the power of making their visits without notice; their reports to be lodged with the chief of the Board, with marks 1, 2, 3, and 4, according to the ascertained quality of the goods; these numbers to be inserted in the London Directory every year, attached to the tradesman's name. In this way shopkeepers would soon find it their interest not only to sell unadulterated articles, but to get as high on the list of excellence as possible. To show that this scheme was not impracticable, he instanced the article of Cork butter, which, it was well known, was classified and branded according to quality No. 1 up to 6; and the various qualities were sold according to the brands, without looking at the butter.

MR. CAVE said, he thought some protection was required for the poor, especially in villages where there was perhaps only one shop they could deal with; yet it was just in such cases that the provisions of this Bill would most likely become inoperative. It was requisite that the purchaser should go before a justice and complain that the article sold was adulterated. He should like to see a poor man enter the shop he had been dealing with after such a complaint. The plan suggested by the hon. Member for Cork county was rather a strong one, but it was carried out at this day in France—a country from which we had taken lessons of late. Officers went all over the country, going into every shop and analyzing every article, with summary power of destroying everything which did not come up to the standard. This was a very effectual process, as he could himself bear testimony. In one town where he had lived there was no milk one morning for breakfast; it turned out, on inquiry, that the milk was found, on application of the lactometer by the octroi authorities, to be very much adulterated, and the cans were emptied into the gutter. There had been many complaints of the milk before, but after that its quality was very much improved. The salaries of the analysts would require to be very large, or they would be apt either on the one hand to be bribed, or to become the instruments of oppression on the other. He should be glad to see the objections he had stated to this Bill removed; but he feared it would be inoperative, so far as protection to the poor was concerned.

MR. JOHN LOCKE said, he thought, although the Bill did not contain all the provisions that might be desired, the first clause was a great improvement on the present law. There was now no power to go before a magistrate and obtain a summary conviction for any of the offences set out in the first clause; it was necessary to adopt the cumbrous machinery of an indictment. There was much force in the objection raised by the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cave) that the working classes were not anxious to carry tradesmen before the magistrates; but still less were they willing to incur the inconvenience and expense of proceeding by indictment, as they were obliged to do under the present law. He thought the first clause would be rendered more efficacious by a slight change in the phrase “pure and unadulterated.” He would substitute “or” for “and;” and in this way they would make provision for cases in which articles were mixed, such as coffee with chicory, which the present law did not meet. The word “warranted” should certainly be struck out, as it would give rise to endless difficulty. This was a question of great importance, but if they passed no other clause of the Bill except the first, even in a modified form, it would be a step in the right direction. He hoped the Bill would be allowed to get into Committee.

MR. PEACOCKE said, that he sincerely hoped some measure would pass on this subject. The Committee, of which he had the honour to be a member, had sat a year and a-half. They saw the great difficulties of the question, and this was not the least, to define what adulteration really was. He hoped in Committee that difficulty might not be found insurmountable.

MR. HARDY said, he had no wish to prevent the Bill getting into Committee, although he had opposed a somewhat similar measure on a former occasion, and would still have objections to urge against some of the provisions contained in this Bill.

LORD FERMOY said, he feared the Bill, if enacted, instead of being found by the poor to be a protection, and used by them to prosecute tradesmen selling adulterated provisions, would eventually be a dangerous weapon in the hands of rival traders against each other. What the hon. Member for Cork county (Mr. V. Scully) said as to the branding of butter, was quite correct; but there was no analogy between Cork butter and adulterated food; and the very fact of a tradesman having got the highest certificate for a cask of butter one day, might be used by him as a cloak to sell a more adulterated article the next. He had no objection to going into Committee, but he foresaw considerable difficulty in carrying out a really good principle.

MR. WALTER observed, that the difficulty suggested as to the mode of enforcing the provisions of this Act, might be got over by a very simple expedient. The principle involved in this Bill appeared to be analogous to that which already existed in the law respecting false weights and measures. The Bill was intended to apply to articles, in respect of quality, securities which the law now provided in respect of measures. He saw no reason why the same machinery should not be used for remedying the grievance complained of in one case as in the other; why the inspector of measures, for instance, should not be the authorized person to procure samples of the different articles of food sold in any shop or in stock, to place them before the analyst, and, if found adulterated in quality, to lay them before the magistrates in the same way as in a case of false weights or measures—without throwing the disagreeable duty on the poor customer or rival tradesmen. The real difficulty, as already suggested, would be to define what adulteration was. His belief was, that there was, perhaps, no single article of food unadulterated, except eggs and meat. Tradesmen had not yet found out the way of getting into eggs, and butcher's meat was, no doubt, sold in a tolerably pure state. But with respect to groceries, everybody knew they were nearly all adulterated, more or less. It might be doubted, however, whether bread, not being made of flour only, might not be considered as adulterated in the eye of the law, and introduce entire confusion into the trade.

MR. AYRTON expressed a hope that the House would proceed to consider the provisions of the Bill in Committee. He had himself opposed the measure which had been introduced by the hon. Member for Birmingham last Session; but he found that many of the objections he had entertained against that Bill had been removed in the one which was then under their notice. Its provisions were threefold; first it provided that it should be penal to mix with articles of food anything injurious to health. Well, no man could claim a right to sell articles injurious to health, and he could see no objection to that provision. Then there was a clause to the effect that where a tradesman undertook to guarantee articles of food as pure and unadulterated, when they were not so, he should be liable to a penalty. That provision, however, left it to a tradesman to carry on his business as he pleased. If he chose to sell his goods without a guarantee he could do so. As matters at present stood, it was not pretended that London bread, London milk, and London gin, were sold as pure and unadulterated articles. A third peculiarity of this measure was that it established a board of local analysts, instead of having recourse to Government interference. In so doing the Bill did not create a new offence, but gave the people a summary remedy for an existing offence when committed to their prejudice. If the argument as to borough magistrates sitting in judgment on tradesmen were sound, it was quite time to put an end to borough magistrates altogether. Those magistrates heard cases against working men; and why should they not also administer justice where tradesmen were concerned? If subject to the jurisdiction of the bench, why should not the working man also have its protection against the misconduct of those who assumed to be his betters? It might be that the poor would not be able often to enforce this power, but it would be something gained if it were known that they possessed it. Moreover, if rival tradesmen also aided in the punishment of each other's delinquencies, the mischief might be borne for the good that would accompany it; for when rogues fell out honest men might come by their own. It had been an established principle of our jurisprudence from the earliest ages that the local authorities should take cognizance of the sale of food. The corporation of the City of London held an inspection of markets, its officers being authorized to seize and destroy all unwholesome articles. In the present day, every shop in the metropolis was a market overt, and new machinery was required in place of the ancient to put down imposition and fraud.

Mr. Walter

MR. CLIVE said, he was by no means opposed to going into Committee; on the contrary, he thought they should have been in Committee an hour ago.

House in Committee.

Clause 1.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he thought the Bill would be inoperative, inasmuch as in every case of sale in which any article of food or drink with which to the knowledge of the seller any ingredient or material calculated to injure health had been mixed, it would be necessary to prove not only that there was something injurious to life and health in the article sold, but also that the seller knew it to be so; and how was this to be done? In case of alleged adulteration, also, it would be necessary to prove not only that the commodity was adulterated, but that the vender was aware of it. The second part of the clause required that the tradesman should have given a warranty that the article was a pure one; but a mere representation that the article was of a certain character was not a warranty; and it would be unreasonable to expect that a tradesman would give a written engagement that an article was of a certain quality. Take the article of cayenne pepper, which was repeatedly sold as adulterated. It would be necessary first of all to inquire of the tradesman whether he guaranteed the article, then to analyze it; and if anything deleterious was found, to prove that the tradesman knew it was there, and knew it to be injurious. There was a peddling legislation that was more mischievous than leaving things in their original mischief. He believed if this Bill were carried into effect it would create such confusion in London that no shopkeeper would pass a quiet life. Legislation was a difficult art; there was no royal road to this science, and this had never been rendered more evident than by the provisions of this Bill.

MR. CLIVE said, he quite agreed with the hon. and learned Gentleman as to the probability of the first part of this clause being inoperative. They were all aware of the difficulty of proving knowledge on the part of the vender; but still the offence was now cognizable by law, and he saw no objection to allow a summary conviction rather than an indictment. But he was entirely opposed to the second part of the clause which related to the furnishing of a warranty to the purchaser of an article. If that were to be a mere implied warranty it would have no force, as the difficulty of proof would be insuperable; and if an express warranty were meant, no person would give it. The whole question would therefore remain just as at present. He was afraid the first clause would tend to bring into discussion before the magistrates every transaction between man and man; and that it would produce the greatest possible irritation and uneasiness to tradesmen, without affording any protection whatever to the poorer classes, and it would be absurd to expect that an express warranty would be given in cases of that description.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, he would admit that there was very great difficulty in legislating on questions of sumptuary law. The poorer classes required some protection from the system of adulteration; but the difficulty of providing that protection was demonstrated by the provisions of this Bill. The hon. Member for Cork county (Mr. Scully) had pronounced a eulogium on Irish butter, the produce of the fat fields represented by his hon. Friend; but, first of all, this Bill did not extend to Ireland; and, in the next place, Irish butter only came in here in the form of little pats. There would therefore be great difficulty in instituting the classification recommended by his hon. Friend. The principle of the Bill no doubt was good, and he should be glad if it could be safely carried out, but it appeared to him that the effect of adopting the machinery of this measure would be to give employment to informers, and to give rise to great confusion and annoyance. It would be no easy task to bring home a guilty knowledge to the vender. Suppose the case of French wines imported under the new Treaty; the analyst might detect some article injurious to life or health, the answer of the seller would be that he knew nothing of it—he received it from France or his wine merchant as a pure and wholesome wine; he was not aware of any deleterious quality it possessed, and should not be held responsible. This not being a charge against the manufacturer, but against the seller, the difficulty of proof would be very great. Then as regarded the second part of the clause, there was great difficulty in the warranty. What was a warranty? Not a mere representation. The auctioneer who described a picture as a Canaletti and Reynolds did not warrant the picture to be painted by the artists whom he named. He thought that the word warranty as it stood in the clause was quite unwarrantable, and could not be maintained.

MR. HARDY said, he thought that there was insuperable objection to the early part of the clause. It was not only very difficult to prove the scienter, because the tradesmen must be shown to have known not only that something was mixed with a given article, but that that something was injurious and deleterious, but then the scienter had to be tried, not in the ordinary way by a jury, but by the magistrates. Such a jurisdiction would be most dangerous, and as the borough justices were often tradesmen themselves the anomaly might be produced of one set of tradesmen sitting in judgment on the knowledge or intentions of their rivals. The animosities and the scandal which such a state of things would engender might be easier conceived than described. Again, the remedy provided by the Bill, such as it was, would be confined to the metropolis and the other towns of England, its machinery being inapplicable to the whole of the rural districts, as well as to Scotland and Ireland generally. Moreover, where nothing was done that was positively injurious to health, why were they to make a different law for the sale of articles of food from that which extended to the sale of calico, cutlery, and similar articles? The State ought not to pretend to protect the buyer by a warranty in the one case more than in the other. Besides, if a shopkeeper sold anything noxious to health he would commit an offence under the measure introduced by the Home Secretary, for sending before a jury persons who had administered to others hurtful things knowingly and, therefore, maliciously. Useless Bills like the present were prejudicial to the progress of sound legislation.

Mr. PEACOCKE said, he believed that much of the objection urged to the clause would be obviated by the omission of the words "knowledge of such persons," and also of the word "warranted." He should, therefore, propose that they be omitted. A person guilty of selling a deleterious article through negligence might be fairly subjected to a fine.

Mr. AYRTON said, that the omission of the words would make the clause wholly inoperative, and the Motion then before the Committee was that Clause 1 be omitted. The Bill was only explanatory of the actual state of the law; and with regard to the technical objection as to the difficulty of proving the scienter, that objection would apply equally to the whole common law of England. So, also, the objection brought to the jurisdiction of the country magistrates would equally apply to every other instance in which they were concerned. But it had always been part of the common law of England that the cognizance of the quality of articles offered for food should be submitted to local authority. He hoped the hon. Gentleman would not persevere with his opposition.

Mr. ROEBUCK said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary for the Home Department whether the clause as it stood would be sufficient to enable a man of good character to prove that he was not guilty of that offence, or whether, therefore, it would be most unreasonably and unwittlingly made to apply to every person who had sold an article which was injurious to health, even by the putting of a halfpenny into the bottle? They could not say the seller ought to have been more cautious, because the only sufficient precaution he could take would have been to eat the pickles himself. A tradesman was once accused of selling flour mixed with plaster of Paris. The man stoutly denied the charge, but the analyst proved the fact of the admixture. To test the matter further, however, the tradesman then took a bushel of the grain, put it into a mill and ground it, and still the analyst found plaster of Paris in the flour.

Mr. HENLEY said, the clause as it originally stood would be inoperative, but the Amendment would make it mischievous. What authority was to decide—not on what was injurious, but on what was "calculated" to be "injurious" to the health of the particular person buying an article? Fancy a couple of magistrates sitting in judgment on that grave question with the conflicting evidence of half-a-dozen doctors before them. Take the common article of wine. Suppose the analyst, a teetotaller—a quite possible case—found 40 per cent of proof spirit in it, or even more, owing to the doctoring it had undergone after passing through the Excise, there might be great difference of opinion whether that wine was not "calculated to be injurious" to some particular person far gone in some disease. How was the tradesman, when he looked into a man's face, to know whether or not the article was calculated to injure him. The magistrates would be equally puzzled to determine such a question. He thought if the country was to be subjected to such an ordeal as the Bill would create, their desire to remedy what no doubt was a great mischief would be leading them much too far.

Mr. JOHN LOCKE said, the difficulty stated by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Henley) was purely imaginary. Indeed he thought the right hon. Gentleman had misunderstood the meaning of the clause. As it at present stood it would not be supposed to apply to the case of an individual in a particular state of health. The object was to prevent the sale of any article with which was mixed some material which was injurious to health, and following the dictates of common sense the clause would necessarily be construed as looking to the influence of the article upon the health of the community generally, and not to what might possibly be injurious to the right hon. Gentleman's ideal sick person. The question of knowledge, as in other similar cases, would have to be decided by inference, and considering that difficulties would arise under this Bill which did not arise under the present law, he thought that the word should be retained in the clause.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, he must submit that they were a little splitting hairs in the matter. The wording of the clause would, however, be improved by the substitution of the words in the Nuisances Removal Act "injurious to health" for the words "calculated to injure health." He, therefore would propose that alteration. One of the commonest questions which Courts of law had to decide, even amid very conflicting evidence, was whether a particular thing was or was not detrimental to health. He would further suggest that words should be inserted extending the clause to "the manufacturer for sale" as well as to the seller. The manufacturer had often a more intimate knowledge of the adulteration than the actual seller.

MR. SCHOLEFIELD said, it was not necessary to mention the manufacturer specially, because, as he manufactured for sale, he would be included in the general category of sellers.

MR. WISE said, he could not consent to the omission of the words "knowledge of such persons;" because those words meant a knowledge that the articles were sold for what they really were. He would call attention to an Act of the 6 & 7 Will. IV. relating to the preparing of flour and the making of bread in the metropolis. By that statute any baker might make bread of wheat, barley, oats, Indian corn, peas, beans, rice, or potatoes, or any of them; but there was an important proviso attached to that provision—namely, that in the case of wheaten flour being mixed with the other articles named, the baker was bound to put a large Roman "M" on each loaf, signifying that it was mixed. That was what he understood to be comprehended in the word "knowledge" in connection with such a matter.

MR. PEACOCKE said, that fearing that he might endanger the passing of the Bill if he sought to make it more stringent, he would withdraw his first Amendment for expunging the words "the knowledge of such persons."

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. CLIVE repeated that he had no objection to the first portion of the clause, which was not likely to be attended with any great effect; but he could not consent to the adoption of that portion of the clause which related to the warranty.

MR. SCHOLEFIELD said, he wished to amend the clause, in accordance with the suggestion of the hon. and learned Member (Mr. E. James), by inserting the words "injurious to health," instead of the words "calculated to injure health."

MR. HENLEY said, he thought it rather hard upon the House that the Government, having such a bad opinion as the Under-Secretary of State had just expressed of this legislation, should, nevertheless, permit it to go on. Sanitary questions were a fertile source of contradictory swearing on the part of medical men and other witnesses, and a notable instance of this might be found among the numerous complaints made before magistrates against the keepers of pigsties.

MR. SCHOLEFIELD said, he hoped the Under-Secretary of State would take the sense of the Committee whether they should go on with the clause or not. If, as that hon. Gentleman thought, the clause would be useless or inoperative, it would be only wasting time to discuss it word by word.

MR. HANKEY said, he trusted that the Bill would be withdrawn, because it would be quite impossible to act upon it. In innumerable shopwindows in that metropolis they saw "pure unadulterated gin" advertised, and yet everybody knew that the article did not answer the description thus given of it.

MR. PEACOCKE said, he would remind the Committee that if this clause were rejected the whole Bill would fall to the ground. He thought that the Government ought really to state their intentions. If they objected to the Bill, the fairest course would have been to oppose the second reading. It was remarkable that the name of a Member of the Government (Mr. Villiers) appeared on the back of the Bill.

MR. CLIVE said, he did not object to the first part of the clause, because he believed it to be inoperative. He would not object, in cases where a conviction under the criminal law could now be obtained before a jury, to give power to magistrates to deal with such cases.

LORD EDWARD HOWARD thought this was especially the time for such a Bill, when we were about to admit nearly all articles freely into this country. If the Bill were abandoned, it must be taken that all attempts to prevent adulteration in food in this country would fail. If this, the third Bill introduced after the labours during two years of a Committee, were rejected, he could only say, God help the poor.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he thought the argument of the Under-Secretary of State was a curious one. He would ask him whether he would permit a man to be tried for murder before a magistrate?

MR. HANKEY said, that with a view to stop the further progress of a measure which he considered impracticable, he would move that the chairman should leave the Chair.

MR. MONSELL said, he should resist the Motion. Nearly all who had spoken had admitted that the object of the Bill was a desirable one, and the only argument against it was that it was impracticable. He believed that in nearly every other country in Europe some such law prevailed, and he could not see why that which was practicable and useful in Paris and Brussels should be impracticable in London.

Motion negatived.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. JOHN LOCKE said, he would then propose to substitute the word "or" for "and," so as to make the clause read, "pure or unadulterated."

MR. ROEBUCK said, that he could not understand the distinction between pure and unadulterated.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY proposed to omit the words "to the knowledge of such person" in the clause, so as to prevent persons from sheltering themselves under an assumed ignorance that the article they sold was adulterated.

MR. HARDY objected to conferring upon two magistrates the power of deciding what amounted to a breach of warranty. Why ought they to distinguish between articles of food and other articles? In ordinary cases a jury was called in to decide between parties, and upon what principle ought they to confer jurisdiction upon magistrates with respect to the articles of food?

MR. AYRTON replied that no difficulty was found in conferring powers upon magistrates to punish workmen for breach of a civil engagement with their employers. It was only fair, therefore, to give the workmen a turn, and deal out to them the same measure of justice as was dealt out to tradesmen—their employers. Let them, too, have the benefit of the same summary procedure. He thought there was reason to complain of the little assistance which the Government were rendering to the passing of the Bill. The Under-Secretary of State appeared in his place only for the purpose of criticising the Bill and throwing difficulties in its way, when he ought rather to be dedicating the powers of his astute mind to their solution. After the decided opinion on the part of the House last Session, with reference to the objects of this Bill, he thought it would have been becoming in the Government if they had sought to give expression to that opinion.

Lord Edward Howard

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON said, he wished to express a hope that the hon. Member for Birmingham would consent to adopt the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. V. Scully.)

MR. SCHOLEFIELD said, that the words "with the knowledge of such persons" were really introduced for the protection of tradesmen. At the same time, he thought it possible their insertion might render the Bill harmless, and consequently inoperative. On the other hand, as a tradesman would be liable to be punished for a second offence, the plea of ignorance would only avail him once, and therefore he thought the clause had better stand as it was.

Amendment withdrawn.

Motion made and Question put, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided: — Ayes 116; Noes 25: Majority 91.

Clause 2.

MR. EDWIN JAMES suggested that it be postponed, and inasmuch as it implied the adoption of the 3rd and 4th, by which its machinery was to be carried out.

Clause postponed.

Clause 3.

MR. HARDY said, he wanted to know why the operation of the Bill was to be confined to the metropolis and towns while the rural districts were excluded.

MR. SCHOLEFIELD said, the reason was very plain, that he wished to discourage opposition to the Bill, the Bill being somewhat of an experiment, and for that reason also he had omitted reference to Ireland.

SIR BALDWIN LEIGHTON said, in order that the Bill should be made to extend to the rural districts, he would move the insertion of the words "Courts of Quarter Session in every county" before the words "in Town Councils of every municipal borough."

MR. AYRTON said, the Amendment proposed would not harmonize with the rest of the Bill as it stood.

MR. SCHOLEFIELD said, the words in question might be introduced in the report.

MR. MONSELL thought the Amendment an excellent one.

SIR BALDWIN LEIGHTON said, he would bring up his Amendment on the report.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, he wished to move a verbal Amendment, in order to raise a question as to the appointment of two analysts for each district, to be paid out of the rates by the vestries. This was extremely objectionable. The analysts would give their certificates ex-parte. A poor man who bought 3*d.* worth of ginger would have to pay 2*s.* 6*d.* for a certificate; and, moreover, the tradesman would be thereupon subject to a penalty. Besides, the Bill was merely optional with the borough or town to appoint analysts. Let offences be punished, but let them be punished in a legal and proper manner. Let there be proper evidence, and upon that evidence, but not otherwise, let the magistrates convict.

MR. CLIVE said, that, according to the provisions of the clause as it stood, there was first to be a public analyst; in the next place, the parties could employ analysts themselves; and in the third place, the magistrate could employ a skilled person. God help the magistrate who might have to deal with the conflicting evidence of all the analysts. He thought the clause required alteration.

MR. JOHN LOCKE remarked that he did not think that Clause 2 was open to the various objections cited against it by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Marylebone. Analysts were not forced upon districts which did not care about eating or drinking nasty, unwholesome food. There ought to be some competent person who would give an opinion upon the quality of food. Neither would the proceedings be ex-parte, because under the second clause, notice must be given to venders so that they should have every opportunity of meeting the adverse testimony.

MR. SCHOLEFIELD said, he had introduced the clause at the express desire of the Select Committee, who thought that the appointment of analysts was essential to the satisfactory and successful working of the Act.

LORD FERMOY said, that the mode of seeking a remedy under the Bill was very roundabout. The appointment of public analysts would be an inducement to men of that profession to go about looking for business, and that would lead to vexatious proceedings against tradesmen. If, however, they were found to be desirable, they could be appointed afterwards.

MR. MONSELL said, he thought the clause necessary for the protection of the poor, who could not afford to have their food and drink analyzed by private chemists.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY remarked, that he objected, not to analysts, but to the proposed mode of their appointment.

MR. STEUART mentioned that the Highland and Agricultural Society of Scotland had appointed an officer to analyze adulterated manures. He saw no reason why their example should not be followed in the case of food and drink.

MR. AYRTON said, the vestrymen had the matter in their own hands. It was in favour of the tradesmen of the district that the vestries and ratepayers should have the appointment of analysts. The clause was merely permissive.

MR. ROEBUCK asked, for how long was the analyst to be appointed, or was he to become a fixed officer? Should they not fix a term?

MR. SCHOLEFIELD said, he contemplated the appointment of an officer who would be removable at the pleasure of those who had appointed him.

MR. PEACOCKE was not in favour of the appointment of analysts in the manner proposed, as public inspectors were not to be appointed. He did not see how the clauses, as they stood, could be any protection to the poor man.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 58, Noes 34: Majority 24.

Clause agreed to.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

ECCLESIASTICAL VESTMENTS BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR said, he rose to move for leave to bring in a Bill to enforce uniformity in the use of ecclesiastical vestments by priests and deacons of the United Church of England and Ireland.

MR. HUNT said, he wished to ask Mr. Speaker whether it was competent for the hon. Gentleman to bring in a Bill of this sort? He thought Bills of this kind ought to emanate from a Committee of the whole House.

MR. SPEAKER stated that the Standing Order which required that Bills relating to religion should be introduced in a Committee of the whole House had been held to refer to religion in its spiritual relations, doctrines, professions, and observances, and not to the temporalities and government of the Church. Accordingly, the Church (Ireland) Temporalities Bill, and many others of a similar kind, had been brought forward for the first time in the House itself, and not in a Committee. The question, however, might certainly be open to some doubt. If the Bill proposed to be introduced by the hon. Member for Poole should be regarded as a measure relating to religious observances, it ought undoubtedly to be originated in a Committee; but on the other hand, if it should be held to be a matter of church government, designed for the purpose of enforcing decency and order, then, in his opinion, a preliminary Committee would not be necessary. That was a question for the consideration of the House, but for the reasons he had stated he should not think himself that the hon. Member for Poole was out of order in proposing to introduce his Bill in the House itself.

MR. A. MILLS said, he hoped the hon. Member would be permitted to lay his Bill on the table. Nobody could be injured by the House being allowed to see it.

MR. COLLINS said, he would oppose the introduction of the Bill.

MR. SPEAKER said, if it were opposed it could not be brought in after a quarter to six o'clock.

Leave given.

Bill to enforce uniformity in the use of Ecclesiastical Vestments by Priests and Deacons of the United Church of England and Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. DANBY SEYMOUR and Lord FERMOY.

Bill presented and read 1^o.

House adjourned at Five Minutes before Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, March 1, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1^o Administering of Poison; Attorneys, Solicitors, Proctors, and Certificated Conveyancers.

THE ATTORNEYS AND SOLICITORS

(No. 2) BILL.

ATTORNEYS, SOLICITORS, PROCTORS, AND CERTIFICATED CONVEYANCERS
BILL.

BILL PRESENTED. FIRST READING.

LORD CHELMSFORD, having presented Petitions from the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association, and John Turner, against the Attorneys and Solicitors Bill, said, the presentation of these two petitions was a fitting introduction to the Bill which he was now about to lay upon the table, and to which he hoped their Lordships would give a first reading. It was not his intention to explain its provisions, but only the circumstances under which he thought it proper that it should be introduced. In the course of last year the Incorporated Law Society prepared a bill which was substantially the same as the one he had now the honour to present. The Society was composed of the most eminent solicitors, and from its members gentlemen were selected by the Judges to assist the Masters in the examination of candidates for admission to the roll. It would appear to be most peculiarly their office to propose any amendment of the law affecting the important body to which they belonged. The Bill which they prepared was sent to the different law societies, to many eminent solicitors, and to the learned Judges of the Courts, and it received the sanction of them all. It was also submitted to his noble and learned Friend on the woolsack, then Lord Chief Justice of the Court of Queen's Bench, and not only did it meet with his entire approbation, but his noble and learned Friend introduced it in their Lordships' House. It passed through its different stages, and went down to the House of Commons, but, owing to some objection by the Board of Inland Revenue—which was, however, now entirely removed—the Session came to an end before the Bill had received the Royal Assent. It was intended to propose the same Bill in the present Session; but some delay was necessary to arrange with the Board of Inland Revenue to simplify the machinery for collecting the duty on certificates. Pending that delay an hon. and learned Member of the other House introduced the Bill to which the petitions referred. It consisted—not of 28, as did the other Bill—but of 13 clauses, 11 of which were selected from the Bill of the Incorporated Law Society, which was sent down to the Commons last Session. The two new clauses were, in his opinion, extremely objectionable. The period of the articles of clerkship was five years, and a person could not be admitted as an attorney unless he had served those five years; but it was proposed in the Bill of the Society to admit gentlemen who had taken degrees at the Universities after a service of three, under articles of five years,—of course subject to the usual examination. One of the new clauses in the Bill petitioned against, proposed to give to persons who had served as clerks for ten years, no matter in what subordinate capacity, the same privilege which was proposed to be given to gentlemen who had taken degrees at the Universities. The other clause was even more objectionable. It was proposed that if the three years' service expired between any of the terms, the person should be entitled to be admitted at the previous term; so that, supposing the three years' service expired on the 31st of October, he would be entitled to be admitted early in the previous June, or after a service of only two years and seven months. He suggested that the second reading of the Bill from the Commons should be deferred until their Lordships' opinion had been ascertained on this Bill, and if that were not acceded to by the noble Lord who had charge of the Bill, he should move as an Amendment that it be read a second time that day six months. The noble and learned Lord concluded by moving the first reading of the Bill proposed by the Incorporated Law Society—"a Bill to amend the Laws relating to Attorneys, Solicitors, Proctors, and Certificated Conveyancers."

THE LORD CHANCELLOR was understood to express approval of the Bill.

Bill presented, and read 1st.

ANNEXATION OF SAVOY TO FRANCE. QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY said, that the last time he asked for the production of papers relating to the annexation of Savoy, the Government was not disposed to give any further information upon it. Since that time it appeared that a change had come over them. He hoped it was because a better understanding existed between the Governments of France and England. He wished therefore to ask the noble Lord the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs when they might expect that the papers upon the subject of Savoy would be laid upon the table of that and the other House of Parliament?

LORD WODEHOUSE said, that the papers had been moved for in the other House of Parliament, and would, he expected, be laid before both Houses on that day week.

ACCIDENTS IN THE STREETS.

ADDRESS FOR RETURNS.

THE MARQUESS OF WESTMEATH, in moving an Address for certain returns as to the number of persons killed, or injured by being run over by carriages in the metropolis, referred to the provisions of the Lord Chancellor's Bill for the Consolidation of the Criminal Laws of England and Ireland with regard to accidents on railways, and expressed his surprise that the man who altered a point or put a stone upon a railway for the purpose of causing an accident should not be punished as severely as the man who took away life by any other means. A great number of persons had been killed by accidents in the streets of the metropolis, and any one must see the reckless manner in which one-horse vehicles were driven by irresponsible persons. He wanted to know why all those persons should not be made amenable for furious and wanton driving, as well as the drivers of public carriages. These accidents must be wanton; they could not be accidental, because any person with eyes in his head must see a person who was crossing the street. The Act of Parliament making these persons liable for injury to life or limb proceeded upon the old assumption that the wantonness of the injury was to be proved by the friends and relatives of the person killed or wounded. The onus probandi, however, ought, he contended, to lie upon the person who committed the injury, because prima facie no person could plead a justification for deliberately killing a fellow-creature. He moved for a Return of all Cases which have come to the Cognizance of the Metropolitan Police, whereby, since the 1st of January, 1858, up to the present time, any Person has been run over and killed by any Carriage within the District and the Superintendence of the said Force. The like Return as to every Person maimed or otherwise injured by the same Means. Similar Returns from the City of London, and certified by the Police Authorities within the same.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, there did not seem to be any objection to the returns asked for by the noble Marquess, and he had no doubt they would yield very useful information. He hoped, however, that the noble Marquess would excuse him from entering into a lengthened explanation of the Bills to which he had referred, which were measures certainly of great importance, but which had been already read a second time by their Lordships, and had been referred to a Select Committee, where every suggestion relative to their improvement would receive its due weight.

Motion agreed to.

House adjourned at a quarter before
Six o'clock, till To-morrow,
half-past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, March 1, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1^o Representation of the People; Representation of the People (Ireland); Representation of the People (Scotland).

GREAT YARMOUTH ELECTION.

House informed, that the Committee had determined,—

“That Sir Edmund Henry Knowles Lacon, bart., and Sir Henry Josias Stracey, bart., are duly elected Burgesses to serve in this present Parliament for the Borough of Great Yarmouth.

“And the said Determination was ordered to be entered in the Journals of this House.”

MR. JOHN POPE HENNESSY.

Mr. SPEAKER acquainted the House that he had received a Telegraphic Message addressed to him by Mr. John Pope Hennessy in Ireland:—Message read, as followeth:—

H. B.
58, Threadneedle Street, March 1, 1860.

John Pope Hennessy,
Cork.

The Right Hon. the Speaker of the House of Commons,
London.

My Committee had escaped my recollection.
Yours of Westmeath

lection. I most respectfully apologize to the House. I hasten to London without delay.

DUBLIN CORPORATION WATER BILL. SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. MAGUIRE moved the second reading of the Bill. There were 24,000 houses in Dublin, of which only 12,000 were supplied with water. The corporation had decided by a majority of two to one that it was their duty to furnish the people with a better and more wholesome supply of water, an article of which they had stood much in need for a great number of years.

SIR EDWARD GROGAN said, there was a conflict of opinion in Dublin on this. The corporation had voted in favour of it, and he had received a petition from a number of most respectable firms requesting its postponement. Under these circumstances, he and his colleagues were ready to leave the matter to the decision of the House.

MR. WHITESIDE said, the Bill was a gross job, to which the University of Dublin and many of the most respectable inhabitants were opposed. The Bill proposed to take the water supply from the river Liffey, but the inhabitants of Dublin did not wish to be poisoned. He now understood that the promoters gave up that scheme, and intended to enter into a contract with the canal companies for the supply of water. As the Bill had been framed with the view of taking the supply from the former source, he wished to know from the Chairman of Committees whether it was competent for the promoters to make so essential a change in the Bill. He suggested that the Bill should be postponed till the next Session.

MR. MASSEY said, if the fact was as stated by the right hon. and learned Gentleman, it was so substantial a departure from the provisions that the Bill could not be allowed to proceed further. But as the Bill was one of great public importance, and deeply interesting to the people of Dublin, it would be a hard measure to postpone the scheme till next Session. He ventured, therefore, to suggest that the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Maguire) should ask leave to withdraw the Bill, and then ask leave to introduce another in which the intention of the promoters would be clearly expressed.

MR. M'CANN, as a rate-payer of Dublin, supported the Bill, the great object of which was to provide for the poor of that city an abundant supply of good water.

MR. LEFROY urged the withdrawal of the Bill, on the ground of informality.

MR. CARDWELL said, he did not think the House should reject a measure of such importance on the ground stated. Moreover, he perceived that the Bill gave alternative power to take water either from the Liffey or from the Canal Company. It would be unfair to the Corporation of Dublin to reject their Bill so summarily, and he would therefore suggest that it should be postponed for a week, with a view to its amendment.

MR. BRIGHT protested against the hon. Chairman of Committees being called on to express an opinion upon such a subject, a course which looked somewhat like dictation to the House.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he would withdraw his Motion for the Second Reading of the Bill until that day week.

Second Reading deferred till Thursday next.

FOREIGN DUTY ON HERRINGS. QUESTION.

MR. W. MILLER would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether (the comparatively moderate rates of Import Duty charged by Belgium, Russia, and Prussia on British Herrings being respectively 1s. 6d., 2s. 10d., and 3s. per Barrel, worth about 25s., encourage a large trade in that article to the Countries chiefly from the Scotch Fishing Stations, but the French Import Duty being 52s. 6d. per barrel, or prohibitory) any negotiation has taken place, with the view of obtaining a remission or reduction of such Duty on the part of the French Government; and, if so, whether the Correspondence relating thereto may be ordered to be printed?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, no correspondence on the subject had taken place between Her Majesty's Government and the French Government.

RUMOURED AUSTRO-RUSSIAN TREATY. QUESTION.

MR. STEUART said, he wished to put a question to the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in consequence of a paragraph he had seen that morning in a late edition of a leading journal. He wished to know, Whether Her Majesty's Government has received any information of the existence of an Austro-Russian Treaty?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Sir, I have to state that Count Rechberg, the Minister for Foreign Affairs at Vienna, has positively denied the existence of any such document.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE BILL. LEAVE. FIRST READING.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: I rise, Sir, on behalf of Her Majesty's Government to ask leave to bring in a Bill further to amend the laws relating to the representation of the people in England and Wales. But before I enter into the subject it is necessary for me to make a few remarks. I wish to disclaim entirely any intention, by the measure I ask leave to introduce, to frame a new Constitution. I disclaim such a project for two reasons. One reason is that I have no wish to alter the Constitution of this House; the other is that, if any such alteration were sought, I should feel totally unable to propose anything that would stand in the place of the ancient and glorious Constitution of this country. And I have this further to say, that if I propose a Bill to amend the representation of the people, it is not as a confession that the Reform Act of 1832 has failed; it is rather because that Act has succeeded. I do not think that any Act was ever passed by this House that has had more complete success, or with which so few faults have been found as the measure of 1832. And when I compare the present state of this country with what was its state some years before the Reform Act, I cannot but congratulate this House that by that measure so much discontent has been allayed and so much satisfaction been given. I do not allude to our material wealth, or the great increase that has taken place in our prosperity, because that progress may be attributed to other causes. But it is that the people since 1832 have been more generally satisfied with the institutions under which they live. If I compare the year 1820 with the year 1860 I remember that in the former year Lord Castlereagh had introduced measures which he himself designated as measures of severe repression; they were measures intended to restrain the press, to prevent public meetings in the open air, with other restrictions upon the liberty of the people of the same kind. These restrictions were thought necessary by the Government of that day; and I think that, according to the system of Government then pursued, such measures may be considered necessary. But looking at the state of the country in 1860 I find a generally prevailing spirit of loyalty to our institutions—a spirit that wishes to preserve and extend, not to destroy them. Sir, with this preface I proceed to say what we propose to do, in some degree at least, to supply the omissions and remedy the defects of the Reform Act. In doing so, I shall pass on at once to the questions on which I mean to ask the opinion of the House.

Sir, there is one point that has more than once attracted the attention of the House, and on which it has clearly pronounced its decision. It is the franchise in counties. During the progress of the Reform Act through this House it was decided that freehold and leasehold tenures should no longer give the sole title to a county vote; but that an occupation, merely, of the annual value of £50 should also confer on the occupier the right of voting. That was an obvious change in the nature of a county franchise. That claim having been sanctioned by Parliament, those who since that time have looked into the subject, with the view of amending the law, have very naturally said, "If an occupation merely is to give a title to a vote, it should no longer be restricted to a £50 holding; the occupier of a £20 or £10 holding is as fully entitled to a vote, and would form as good a class of electors as the occupier of a value of £50." That view of the question has been more than once adopted; in principle it was adopted by the late Government. Therefore, in the Bill I now introduce we propose to add to the county franchise an occupation franchise of £10 a year. But we propose also to take further securities than were taken in the Bill of last year, that this shall be a bond fide franchise. It is obvious that under the plan of a £10 holding might be covered with small tenements which could not be properly called a dwelling-house. We propose that where there is a dwelling-house no sum shall be taken as value in respect of the building other than a dwelling-house of not less than £5 shall be required to be assessed on such building. We propose, therefore, that the building not being a dwelling-house should be assessed at not less than £5 per annum. However, that in the case of a building the annual value shall be not

I now proceed, Sir, to the consideration of a question which has occasioned far more disputes, which gave rise last year to warm debate in this House, and with respect to which various opinions were expressed—I mean the question of lowering the borough franchise. It appeared to me, I must confess, that the late Mr. Hume had good reason to complain, some time after the Reform Bill of 1832 had come into operation, that a £10 franchise in boroughs drew too arbitrary a line; that a number of persons were in consequence of the line being so drawn deprived of the right of voting who might fairly enjoy the privilege, and that in that respect an injury was done to our system of Parliamentary representation. The longer the time that has elapsed the more distinctly have I perceived that that complaint was founded in justice. It has been said that the franchise in boroughs was in 1832 purposely framed to exclude the working classes from the right of voting; but to that statement I cannot subscribe, although I am ready to admit that it was framed with the view generally of giving weight to the middle classes in this country, whose information and character appeared to us at that time to be such as to entitle them to obtain that vast accession of power which they then received. I own, however, that I think it would be a great evil if we were to continue much longer to exclude from our representative system that large number of the working classes who, by their knowledge, their character, and their other qualifications, are fitted to exercise the franchise freely and independently. It appears to us, then, that the constitution would derive additional strength from the fact that a certain number of those working men best qualified for the privilege were admitted to the franchise, and that they would thereby be induced to set a greater value on the benefits which the constitution confers. I am aware that it is said there has been no agitation on this subject; that we have seen manifested with respect to it nothing of that eagerness which took possession of all classes of men at the period of the Reform Act, and that we ought not, therefore, until something like a successful agitation is set on foot to proceed to extend the franchise. That, Sir, however, is not the sort of political doctrine which I have been taught. I have, on the contrary, been accustomed to regard the well-known maxim of Mr. Burke with respect to early reformation as being both deep and wise. I have not failed to perceive that in those instances in which agitation has been carried to a great length, and in which just demands have been refused—as in the case of the Catholic question—the country has been on the eve of having its peace disturbed and brought almost to the brink of insurrection, because Parliament had obstinately refused the concessions that have been asked. The consequence has been that, when those concessions have at length been made, although they were wise and founded on just principles, yet that, coming somewhat too late, and being as it were watered by delay, we have witnessed the land vexed and troubled by agitation arising out of those very measures the object of which was to pacify. I, for one, am, therefore, of opinion that we ought not to wait in the present instance until agitation arises, and those classes which are excluded from the enjoyment of the franchise combine together to enforce their demands upon the consideration of Parliament. On the contrary, I maintain that, if their petition be just, if their claims be founded on a fair appreciation of their own qualifications, and that it would be likely to contribute to the strength and durability of the constitution to accede to their request, we ought not to hesitate to comply because no agitation of the question prevails. I have no wish to see again the flames of Nottingham and of Bristol blaze forth to warn the House of Commons that it must delay no longer to pass a further measure of Parliamentary reform. I much prefer taking advantage of these quiet and tranquil times, when any proposition on the subject can be fairly and calmly discussed, to submit such a measure to Parliament, to deferring its introduction to a moment of greater excitement, when it might be out of our power to fix, as we might deem expedient, the exact limits by which our proposal ought to be defined, and the exact concessions which ought to be made. In dealing with this great question, then, Sir, we have deemed it better, upon the whole, in order to make our measure as simple as possible, to avoid those proposals which we ourselves made in former years, and which were likewise made last year by our predecessors in office—I allude to the introduction into our representative system of franchises hitherto unknown to the constitution, which my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham calls “fancy franchises,” and which, although many of them might confer the right of voting on persons well qualified to exercise it, yet are almost every one of them liable to abuse and to result in the creation of fictitious votes. The principle on which we propose to proceed, therefore, is to extend still further the £10 franchise which is now enjoyed; to take that franchise generally with its present conditions; to require the payment of rates, as is now the case; but, at the same time, to extend it to a lower degree than that at which it stands. With that view we have made many inquiries, and carefully considered their results.

There is, I may here observe, one question which has been frequently discussed, and which formed the foundation of the provisions of the Bills introduced 1852 and 1854,—I allude to the question whether this should be a rating franchise. In examining that subject we found that great variety in the proportions of the rating franchise to the true value of houses existed. We discovered that there were some instances in which there was a difference of 9 per cent between the gross rental and the rated value of a house, while in many instances there was a difference of 28, and in others of 30 per cent. Now it is obvious that it would not be possible in a Reform Bill to make a change based on that mode of valuation; that, in so doing, you would be subject to the discretion of local authorities, and, as a consequence, either through ignorance, custom, or prejudice, in some boroughs many persons would lose their votes, while in others persons possessing the same amount of property would enjoy the franchise. I have stated the practical difficulty which would be involved in making the change; but, there is another objection to its introduction. In striking the poor law rate the rental of a house is calculated according to its true value, subtracting from it, however, not only the rate charged in point of fact, but also the sum necessary for repairs. Now, in taxing property it is quite right to subtract that sum; for, if a house be valued at £10, and £2 are each year laid out for the purposes of repair, it is obvious that the property is not in reality worth more than £8 per annum to the occupier. The question, however, with respect to the meaning of a £10 “clear yearly value”—the phrase used in the Reform Bill of 1832—came before the Court of Common Pleas, and it was then contended that the “clear yearly value” intended by Parliament was the same as was signified by the “net annual value" under the Poor Law Act, and that the Reform Act should, therefore, be construed after that manner. The Court of Common Pleas, however, decided that in the case of the Reform Act the Legislature had proceeded diverso intuitu, and that in that particular case its object was to confer the franchise according to the capacity to pay rent, and not to impose a tax on a man according to the value of his property;—that is to say, that if a man paid £10 a year for his house, it was no matter whether £2 a year were laid out by his landlord for the purposes of repair; that he was the man who paid the £10 a year, and the Legislature declared that the man who paid a rental of £10 a year was entitled to a vote. That being so, we did not think it advisable—indeed, we are of opinion that it would be practically inconvenient, and in point of abstract right unjust, to fix upon a franchise that should be dependent on rating.

Then, the question next came as to what would be the franchise taking the gross annual rental, or, as it is expressed in the Reform Bill, the "clear yearly value," of the premises. The returns at first showed a very great addition which almost any reduction in the franchise would make to the number of the electors. For instance, reducing it to £8 seemed to add an almost overwhelming number; but, when the question came to be tested and examined, it was found that a very great number of these persons, though holding houses of the value of £8 a year, yet in consequence of living at a distance, of not having paid their rates, and from various other causes, were disabled from having a vote; and that the deductions on these grounds were so large as to amount to 27½ per cent. Now, Sir, having arrived at that conclusion, the next question was to consider what would be the numbers added generally in the whole boroughs in England and Wales by taking any particular sum. It appeared that the whole number of electors on the register was 440,790 in the cities and boroughs. A very considerable number of these 440,790 were freemen, or persons having an old scot and lot right of voting, or in the enjoyment of old rights which are expiring. A deduction ought to be made for the number of freemen and others to the extent of 30,765; the remainder, therefore, only 410,005, may be said to have the right of voting as electors on the register by virtue of the ordinary franchise—the possession of a £10 qualification. Well, in considering what should be done we found that if we took those who occupied at a gross rental of £9 and over we should get 440,717 electors, being only 30,712 additional voters. If we took those at £8 and over, the number of voters would be 476,004, being an additional number of voters of about 66,000—i. e., 65,999. Sir, it appeared to us, although that is apparently a very considerable lowering of the franchise—namely, not to £8 rated rental, which some persons talk of, but an £8 occupation—that disturbing the arrangements of the Reform Act and introducing a measure which might excite great public expectations, and adding no more than 66,000 to the 440,000 electors now on the register for the cities and boroughs of England and Wales, would not be a satisfactory or a wise proposition. It then became worth while to see what would be the effect of placing the franchise at £7. At £7 and over the total number of voters, subtracting always the 27½ per cent, would be 532,817; giving 122,812 additional voters. Well, but we did not stop at that number. We went down to the £6 rental. We considered what effect would be produced by taking the rental at £6 and over, and we found that the total number of voters for all the cities and boroughs of England and Wales, including the metropolis, and such places as Liverpool, Manchester, Leeds, and Birmingham, at this franchise would be 604,804, making an addition of 194,199 voters; so that if we add the present number of electors—namely, 440,770—we shall have as the total number of voters for the cities and boroughs in England and Wales 634,969. Sir, it appeared to us that in point of number that was no extravagant amount—that when you have already 440,000, including freemen, to add to them somewhere under 200,000, less than 50 per cent of the present number, was no exorbitant addition. With regard, however, to the character of the persons who would be thus admitted, I must say the accounts from different cities and boroughs have been extremely various. In some places the rental is very low; in others it is high; accordingly, in some places therefore the number of electors added to the present number would be very large, in others very small. In the city of London there would be very few indeed. In Plymouth there would be some 200 or 300. In other places—at Liverpool, for instance—there would be a greater number, perhaps 15,000. But then the question is, what is the character of those who would thus be added to the constituency? I remember asking a gentleman now deceased, Mr. Fletcher, who was inspector under the Poor Law Act, to take the trouble of going through the manufacturing districts and inquiring for me what was the general rent the highest-paid of the working classes gave for their houses; and when he came back he said he thought about £7 a year gross rental, or much about the same sum I have mentioned. Now, it is difficult to lay down any rule or fix any particular amount as regards this class; but I think if we add what I have stated to the present number of electors, we should have a great number of the working classes included; and I think it would be a great benefit to our representation and to our constitution to have this class included; and I repeat, I do not think that would be any very extravagant number to add to the whole body of electors.

Well, Sir, I come now to another question—a question of a totally different nature, and one on which I think it behoves this House to consider well as to the changes they make now or may hereafter make. When I had the honour, twenty-nine years ago, of introducing a Bill for the Reform of the Representation of the People, the task was so far easy that the general sense of the country condemned places which were mere mounds or ruins, which no persons inhabited, while such places as Manchester, Leeds, and Birmingham were allowed no representatives in this House. I remember the last effort I made before the Reform Bill was to endeavour to obtain representatives for these three towns, Manchester, Leeds, and Birmingham; and one would scarcely believe, unless he looked back to the proceedings of that day, that a very considerable majority of this House decided against the admission of these great towns to the representation. But when the country once took up the question, the absurdity of the state of things to which I have alluded became evident. There were certain places that continued to have representatives without having the least semblance of population; there were others—among them the great towns which are the chief seats of our staple manufactures—in which Parliamentary representation did not exist. But, Sir, the case at the present day, and the case for future consideration, is a very different one; and I wish to call the attention of this House to what, in my view of this case, are circumstances which must, I think, have the greatest weight in any decision as to what is to be done. There was, more than two centuries ago, before the names of Whig and Tory were ever known, a great dispute between two great parties as to the nature of the functions of the House of Commons. The one party declared and maintained that the persons holding the chief weight in this House should likewise be Ministers of the Crown; that they and those who agreed with them should carry on the business of the House in the name of the Crown, and that thus the connection should be maintained between the Crown and the House of Commons. According to the view of these persons, in the time of Charles I., Mr. Pym was to be Chancellor of the Exchequer. He would have been called what is now styled leader of this House, and would have conducted, in the name of the Sovereign, the business of the country. But there was another party that said this ought not to be the function of the House of Commons. The function of the House of Commons was to check and control the Crown; let the Ministers of the Crown be disqualified for sitting in the House of Commons, and let their measures be discussed by a perfectly independent House of Commons. That dispute continued till the reign of Queen Anne, when the former party finally prevailed. The only remains of the theory of their opponents is to be found in that provision by which the Members of this House, on accepting offices under the Crown, vacate their seats, but are eligible for re-election. In fact, one of these doctrines expired with Bolingbroke, the other triumphed with Sir Robert Walpole; and from that time it has been necessary that this House should not only represent generally the opinion of the people on propositions emanating from the Crown, but it has been necessary that this House should contain within itself persons capable of conducting the business of the country—capable of conducting, as things at present stand, the affairs of a great empire, whether with regard to our colonial dependencies, the affairs of our Exchequer and the taxes to be imposed, or with regard to foreign affairs, representing the Crown, and at the same time having seats in the House of Commons. Now, I very much doubt whether this can be done if you have a representation consisting either of electoral districts or divided solely into counties and great towns. With regard to the counties it is obvious that the greater portion of the country gentlemen who represent them would be unwilling to leave their present occupations in the country or to sacrifice their ease in order to undergo the labours of office and the drudgery which in these times office imposes. With respect, again, to the Members for the great cities and great manufacturing towns, we often find that they are gentlemen who are themselves engaged in business, who can indeed give a certain amount of attention to the business of this House and can be present at all its principal debates, but who would never be induced to risk their prospects in life that they might attain the precarious position, for six months or a year, of Ministers of the Crown. I hold, therefore, that it is quite necessary, having regard to the great business of government, that besides the counties and the larger cities and manufacturing towns, you should have smaller places returning Members to this House. There is another reason which makes it essential that there should be something of this kind in our representation, and it is this, that you have from time to time seen men of the greatest ability, and fitted to render the greatest service to the country, but who, representing a great popular body, incur the momentary displeasure of their constituents, and are thereby deprived of their seats in Parliament. That, Sir, was what happened to Mr. Burke, because he contended for the great principles of liberty both here and in Ireland, as well as in America. The same was the case in more recent times with a man who was famous in this House and who has lately departed from among us, but who will live for ever in his immortal writings—I mean the late Lord Macaulay. I say, then, that if, according to the system which has now been established for a century and a half, you are to have the government of this country carried on this House, it is necessary that you should have more than these two classes of representatives—the Members for the counties and those for the great cities and towns. Nor has there been any plan of reform proposed of late years which would do away with that kind of representation. The measure brought forward by the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) last year made the least of it. While, perhaps, the proposal of the right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) made the greatest. But it is singular enough that my hon. Friend's proposal left us with between forty and fifty Members for towns having from 8,000 to 15,000 inhabitants, and therefore being towns of a moderate size, such as those to which I have referred. I infer from this, then, that however our plans of reform may differ, all those who have taken part in proposing such plans of late years have been of opinion that there should be a certain number of moderate sized towns which should send Members to Parliament, as well as the other larger constituencies that I have mentioned. Having laid down that, Sir, as a general principle, I am far from intending to discuss whether, as an abstract question, the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bucks or that of my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham would be the best—best I mean as an abstract principle—but I wish to deal with this question as one which concerns us practically. For my own part I should be quite satisfied with the proposal which we made in 1854. That proposal was that about sixty seats, or rather more, should be taken from the smaller boroughs and transferred chiefly to the larger counties and some to the large towns. There is another question with which I do not shrink from dealing. It is a question which concerns the present state of this House. When the Reform Bill of 1832 was introduced there were many of those boroughs which, as I have said, contained only a ruined wall or a green mound, and there was no difficulty, when Parliament was once disposed to touch those boroughs, in abolishing their franchises. I remember one hon. Gentleman who, much to his honour, when it was proposed that the borough of Ludgershall should be placed in schedule A, got up and said, “I am the patron of Ludgershall, I am the elector of Ludgershall, I am the Member for Ludgershall, and in all three capacities I vote for the disfranchisement of Ludgershall.” But the case at the present time is very different. You have no men who can dispose in that way—even if they were willing to do it—of these small boroughs. If a town has but 250 or 300 voters, these 250 or 300 voters will feel as keenly as the electors of much larger places. They and their representatives would join with those Gentlemen, whatever their numbers might be, who are the most Conservative party in this House, and I have no doubt they would be able to defeat any such measure.

John Russell

as I proposed to introduce in 1854. Therefore, without meaning to go into the question, which does not immediately concern us, as to how many small boroughs there ought to be, and how far the growing wealth and population of the country require their seats to be sooner or later transferred to other places, I may state that our proposal goes only a certain length beyond the proposal made last year by the right hon. Gentleman opposite. That right hon. Gentleman's proposition was, that fifteen boroughs, now returning two Members each, should henceforth return only one. This I think was to be done by fixing on 6,000 as the limit of population, and taking one Member from each of the boroughs whose population was below that limit. Now we propose to go up to the limit of 7,000 inhabitants, and in the same manner to take away one Member from every borough that falls below that point. It appears to me that it would not be desirable to raise the question of total disfranchisement unless we went to something like the length we proposed to go in 1854. The principle of total disfranchisement is one of very grave importance. It ought not to be adopted without some great and palpable public benefit would accrue from it. I cannot think, therefore, that the abolition of some six, seven, or ten boroughs, leaving eight or ten others of a similar character immediately above them in population, would be a wise or expedient measure. It would evidently create great dissatisfaction among those thus disfranchised, and they would certainly be able to show that other boroughs immediately above them were of much the same description. It is a much milder proposition to say that at the bottom of the scale there are a certain number of boroughs which may still continue to be represented, but which are now overweighted in the representation, and some of their seats should be given to the more populous towns and larger counties. We, therefore, propose that those boroughs, whose names I will read, shall no longer send two Members to Parliament. They are:—Honiton, Thetford, Totnes, Harwich, Evesham, Wells, Richmond, Marlborough, Leominster, Lynton, Ludlow, Andover, Knaresborough, Tewkesbury, and Maldon. Thus far, I believe, the list agrees with the list contained in the Bill of last year. We go on, however, to Ripon, Cirencester, Huntingdon, Chippenham, Bodmin, Dorchester, Marlow, Devizes, Hertford, and Guildford.

That gives us twenty-five seats, on the whole, which would have to be disposed of by Parliament. Now, we propose that the following counties should return additional Members—namely, the West Riding of Yorkshire two additional Members. All the rest, which I will read, are to return one additional Member—namely, the southern division of Lancashire, the northern division of Lancashire, the county of Middlesex, the western division of Kent, the southern division of Devonshire, the southern division of Staffordshire, the north riding of Yorkshire, the parts of Lindsey (Lincolnshire), the southern division of Essex, the eastern division of Somerset, the western division of Norfolk, the western division of Cornwall, and the northern division of Essex. It will be seen that we do not propose to divide the West Riding of Yorkshire, and the reason is that there is a great repugnance in that vast riding to have its magnificence at all diminished by a partition. There will thus be fifteen seats given to counties, of which, though some are manufacturing, others are essentially agricultural in their character. Coming to boroughs, we propose that Kensington and Chelsea combined shall form one borough to return two Members to Parliament; that Birkenhead, Staleybridge, and Burnley should in future return one Member each; and that Manchester, Liverpool, Birmingham, and Leeds should henceforth return three Members each instead of two. The House may remember that upon a former occasion I made a proposition which was not very palatable to the House, and which was certainly not popular in the country—namely, that there should be a division of votes; in other words, that where there were three Members each elector should have only two votes. As that proposition was not very popular, although I think it was a fair and just one, I shall not attempt to renew it upon the present occasion. I have observed that where there are three Members and there is a division of parties, one being the majority but the other comprising a very large number of electors, there is a growing tendency, arising from a sense of fairness and justice, that the minority, though it be the weaker party, shall not be altogether excluded from the representation, but that the third Member shall be given to it. That may not be so in times of great party contests. It did not so occur at the time of the great fight between protection and free trade. For a long time, chiefly because of the questions of protection and free trade in which the agricultural counties felt a deep interest, those counties which now possess three Members generally returned gentlemen all belonging to the same political party—the Conservative; but, on looking at the returns made to the last Parliament, I find that, in five out of the seven counties which enjoy the privilege of electing three Members each, two were of one party and one of the other. I regard it as a great benefit to those counties themselves, as well as to the country at large, that there should exist such a disposition not to exclude altogether a very strong minority, but to allow it to have part of the representation. I know it is said that the vote of the third Member, the representative of a minority, neutralizes the vote of one of the other two. That is not altogether true, because in many instances where the questions at issue are not directly party questions all three Members may, and, we find, often do, vote together, although sitting on different sides of the House. I think, therefore, we shall not do wrong in giving three Members to some of the more populous towns, as we have given three Members to some of the larger counties.

Sir, I have stated the distribution of seats which we propose to make with respect to counties and boroughs. But there is another seat at our disposal, and we propose to give it to a learned body which contains within it a sort of representation of those who are excluded from the older Universities—I mean the London University.

Sir, I have already said that we wish to make our measure as simple as possible. We do not propose, in substituting £6 for £10, to change any of the conditions of the franchise except one—namely, that which makes it necessary to pay the assessed taxes. It appears to us that it is sufficient if a householder pays his poor rate, and that it would be a needless restriction to render obligatory the payment of the assessed taxes. The House will also observe that all we propose, with the exception of the twenty-five seats I have mentioned, is in the way of enfranchisement, and enfranchisement with as little novelty as possible. Seeing the objections that have been made and the failures that have occurred in former years, we have sought to confine the attention of Parliament to the question of the franchise, and to such changes as seem absolutely to be required by the number of places which demand and deserve representation, rather than to alter other things which, however objectionable they may be considered, do belong to our ancient customs and our long-established forms of representation. I believe in so doing we are taking the safest and the best course. At all events, we shall enable Parliament to decide upon those questions by themselves, without having its mind disturbed or its time consumed by the discussion of refinements and novelties. Although I have not succeeded in carrying two measures of reform which I have had the honour to introduce of late years, I am by no means discouraged by that fact. For ten years I laboured hard to obtain the assent of Parliament to measures of reform before I introduced the Bill of 1831. I laboured in vain, but that did not prevent the success of the Bill of 1832. I feel sure that if hon. Gentlemen will apply their minds to the present measure, if they will look upon it as a measure bringing, at all events, a considerable portion of the working classes within the temple of the constitution, enabling them to exercise privileges of which they are worthy by their character and acquirements, they will agree with me in thinking that the foundations of the Constitution will be strengthened, and that we shall hereafter rejoice at having passed such a Bill. The noble Lord concluded by moving for leave to bring in a Bill further to amend the Laws relating to the Representation of the People in England and Wales.

Lord John Russell

MR. DISRAELI: Will the noble Lord have the goodness to state when he proposes to take the second reading of his Bill?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: I am not sure, but certainly not within a fortnight from the present time. I will fix the day tomorrow.

MR. BRIGHT: May I ask the noble Lord whether he has included the four seats which have been so long vacant in his scheme?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: We have disposed of all the seats which we propose to take away by the present Bill; and, with respect to the four to which the hon. Gentleman has referred, and which have been so long vacant as to be freely at the disposal of Parliament, we think it fair to give them to Scotland and Ireland.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he had the honour of a seat in that House when the noble Lord introduced the Reform Bill of 1831. At that time he felt that there existed a great practical necessity for some change in the representation of the people, and he gave his cordial support to that Bill for the enfranchisement of large towns. He thought it utterly impolitic and unsafe that great towns like Manchester, Sheffield, Birmingham and Leeds, should be unrepresented. But on the present occasion the case was very different. He wished to call the attention of the House for a few moments to a very important question of principle—one on which the House would do well to pause. He had failed to learn from the noble Lord the principle upon which he proposed to seize on half of the rights and privileges of twenty-five towns of this kingdom. The noble Lord had failed to lay down any intelligible principle whatever for this proceeding. It was clear that he might have seized 100 seats as easily as twenty-five. But was it right that the privileges of every town in the kingdom should be placed at the arbitrary will and mercy of the majority of the House of Commons? While a great number of cases in which large places had abused their privileges and which had been brought under the notice of the House and were allowed to pass unpunished, it was now proposed to forfeit one-half the privileges of twenty-five of the smaller towns of England against which no offence had been alleged. The progress of the discussion would show that the noble Lord was creating more anomalies than he was destroying.

MR. HARDY inquired whether the returns on which the noble Lord had founded his statement with respect to borough voters would be laid on the table, and expressed a hope that plenty of time would be allowed hon. Members for the consideration of the subject.

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, some were already on the table, and the others would be laid on the table in a day or two.

MR. BYNG said, as one of the present representatives of the districts which the noble Lord proposed to create into a borough—he meant the districts of Chelsea and Kensington—he could not refrain from thanking the Government for this measure. He wished, however, to ask the Government whether it was intended to continue the county franchise to those who possessed property within boroughs according to the present system; or whether they had adopted the scheme of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, which took away all county votes for property situate within electoral boroughs.

MR. VANSITTART wished to know, whether the noble Lord had it in contemplation to make any alteration in the boundary limits of the present boroughs.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that the Government did not propose to take the county franchise from the voters referred to by the hon. Member for Middlesex. The question put with respect to the boundaries of boroughs involved an important subject, and raised the ulterior question whether it would be desirable to add to existing boroughs certain other small towns in their neighbourhood. But the Government did not now propose to introduce any provision on the subject.

SIR WILLIAM JOLLIFFE wished to ask a question on which considerable interest was felt, and on which important considerations would hinge. He wished to know whether the property which was to confer the franchise in counties was to consist of land and buildings as in boroughs, and in what proportion of each; and whether the property was to be rated in the same manner.

MR. CAIRD said, that though the noble Lord had given an estimate of the addition that would be made by the Bill to the Borough constituency, yet he had not given the slightest estimate as to the probable addition of voters to the county constituency.

MR. WALPOLE had understood the noble Lord to intimate that the Returns by which he had computed the number of electors to be added to the boroughs had already been presented or would be laid on the table of the House in the course of that evening or to-morrow. The noble Lord also stated that the payment of rates was to form part of the qualification for boroughs as now; but he wished to know whether the payment of rates must be made by the tenant himself, or whether it might be made by any other person on his behalf? With regard to the general scheme proposed, he thought the House seemed to be of opinion that it would be very desirable to postpone any discussion on the matter until the Bill was laid before it; and the only observation he wished now to make was that, the more he reflected on the subject, the more he was convinced that the old distinction between counties and boroughs ought to be maintained, and he thought that the noble Lord would find, if he wished that property should be fairly represented, that it ought to be maintained to a greater extent than the proposed Bill provided.

MR. AYRTON said, he desired to correct what he thought somewhat erroneous views of the past history of reform since the period of the introduction of the measure which the noble Lord had formerly submitted to the House. At the time when the first Reform Bill was brought under the notice of Parliament a franchise of £10 was a real line of demarcation between the working classes and those who were considered the classes above them. A few years after the measure had been passed, the working men of England considered they had been systematically excluded from participating in the representation of the people. Now, the noble Lord had laid before the House a measure which was to enfranchise some 200,000 people in the boroughs and towns of the country; but he had also stated that the working classes in general paid a rent of at least £7. The House knew full well that the population within the towns might be estimated at about 2,000,000 of inhabitants. Was it possible to suppose, that with so large a population as this, if the measure would really enfranchise the respectable working artisans, no more than 200,000 would be added to the register? He believed the solution of the difficulty was this, that a great number of working men occupied not an entire house but a part of a house. He had expected, therefore, that the noble Lord would have told them what were his views with respect to those who occupied only a part of a house within the limits of a borough. Some explanation on the subject was certainly due to the House, and he was anxious it should be given by the noble Lord. He did not desire to express any opinion upon the Bill generally, but he would ask whether it was expedient to pass a very small measure of reform which would only lay the foundation for considerable excitement and great agita-country, without affording any means for allaying

It was wished to know if, when the Bill became law, it would afford any means for allaying

AMS said, the proposition would cause great excitement throughout the country, and there was to be no Members representing the present Metropolitan boroughs. He contended that the largest of the constituencies to which it was proposed to add one Member was much below any of the metropolitan districts, both in population and property.

SIR JOHN OGILVY said, that the Bill, so far as it related to the re-apportionment of representation, would greatly disappoint the people of Scotland.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, the noble Lord had omitted to state what addition would be made to the county constituencies by the measure which he had proposed. He had intimated that the county representation would be increased by a certain number of Members, and that information was necessary in order to complete his statement.

LORD ROBERT CECIL inquired, whether, as in the old Reform Bill, there was anything in the present measure respecting polling places.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, there was no provision in the Bill respecting polling places. He did not think his hon. Friend the Member for Petersfield (Sir W. Jolliffe) did not understand the £10 county franchise. Where the occupation consisted jointly of land and buildings, the noble Lord said that the qualification for counties would be of the same character as that for boroughs, namely, a house or building, held separately or jointly with land. If the building were a dwelling-house no question of value would be raised; but if it were not, and were some building other than a dwelling-house, then it was provided that the building should be of a value equal to half of the qualification—that was to say, it would be required that where the building was not a dwelling-house it should be of the clear yearly value of £5. That proposition, he need not say, was intended to prevent a few boards being run up to meet the requirements of the Act in order to create fictitious votes; but in the case of a dwelling-house no such provision would be required. In reply to the hon. Member for Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) he had to state that they could not give the same accurate information as to the increase of votes in counties under the Bill as the noble Lord had done with respect to boroughs, and the difficulty arose principally from the circumstance to which he had just referred. They had obtained accurate information with regard to the number of occupiers of a certain amount of rental in boroughs, and they could do the same in respect of counties; but it was not enough to show the number of persons holding occupations between £10 and £50 in counties. Though that would show the maximum number to be added under any circumstances, it would not show the deduction—and it would probably be a large one—which would have to be made as regarded those qualifications where the occupation consisted partly of land and partly building, and where the building was to be of a certain value. The rate books did not supply that particular information. Returns already on the table showed the number of persons occupying under the different classes, and further information would be laid before the House on the subject.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE: Having had the honour of a seat in the Parliament which passed the last Reform Bill, and having heard the noble Lord propose that Bill, I cannot help contrasting his gallant spirit on that occasion with his very subdued tone this evening. I congratulate hon. Gentlemen opposite, because no violence can possibly be done to their feelings by the small measure now proposed. When the old Reform Bill was introduced I remember a highly respectable metropolitan banker rising in his place behind the noble Lord and saying that the scheme actually took away his breath. Nobody's breath has been taken away by the present proposal, though some of us seem to be deprived of our powers of speech. We hear none of the Reformers from Birmingham and elsewhere coming forward with the schemes about which they have been agitating the country, and which certainly go far beyond that of the noble Lord. Twenty-eight years have elapsed since the passing of the Reform Bill, and when the noble Lord abandoned the doctrine of finality to which he so obstinately clung, I think we had reason to expect that a real change—a real extension of the franchise—which would have conferred electoral privileges on the working classes generally. What has happened within the last few years? In 1852 the noble Lord brought in a bad Bill, to which nobody listened. In 1854 he brought in another Bill, which was ten times better than the one he has just submitted. The noble Lord, therefore, is not so good a Reformer now, as he was six years ago. The Bill of 1854 proposed wholly to disfranchise 19 rotten and nomination boroughs, and it also took one Member from 33 other boroughs. We have now a mild measure, by which one Member is taken from 25 boroughs, and not a single word is said about disfranchisement. Calne and other pocket boroughs are not included in the scheme, and yet formerly the noble Lord's principles were that as long as nomination boroughs existed the seeds of a further and a necessary reform would remain sown. Will not nomination boroughs be left after the passing of this Bill? Of course they will, and the noble Lord's object must therefore be to have the question of Reform mooted every Session in this House. We want a lodger franchise. It is totally impossible that a Bill which adds only 200,000 voters to the borough constituencies can satisfy the working classes of this country. What was the promise—I will say the compact—made with these men in 1831-2? They were disappointed then because they were excluded from the franchise; and they were told, "Keep quiet; your time will come, and we shall then give votes to the working classes." Depending on this promise, they rallied round the Reformers of 1831-2 for "the Bill, the whole Bill, and nothing but the Bill," and have been waiting patiently ever since for something to be done in their behalf. But what will this Bill do for them? I remember that Lord Althorp, who was then the leader of this House, being present at a dinner given by Sir Frances Burdett on the introduction of the Reform Bill, said, "To tell you the truth, I think this Bill but a very poor concern; and the only thing which makes me regard it more favourably is that when the Bill was settled by the Cabinet we sent a copy of it to Lord John Russell and Mr. Stanley" (now Lord Derby), who were not then Members of the Cabinet. [LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Nothing of the kind.] Does the noble Lord mean to say he was a Member of the Cabinet? I do not know whether my right hon. Friend (Mr. E. Ellice) was not there, and if so he will remember the circumstance. "The only thing," added Lord Althorp, "which gives me hopes of the Bill is, that when Stanley saw it he wrote to me and said, 'What a pretty kick-up you are going to make in the country!'" And when he heard that, Lord Althorp did think something of the Bill. Mr. Stanley was quite right; there was a pretty kick-up. The Bill was passed under great pressure. We had 100,000 men threatening us from Birmingham; there was a run upon the Bank for gold; there were fires in different parts of the flag was hoisted from Glasgow churches; and, the measure was carried. such kick-up in favour of measure. Then, I should rather the Government to be a "finality" measure—they mean it shall be for ever. There is no blemish in it. Not one by the noble Lord about the great complaint now is registration. We want registration. The noble Lord's argument of poor-rates is to prevent registration, but I say of no rate or tax ought to be the enjoyment of the franchise at present it sometimes happens before a man can get in the franchise I say we ought to have a franchise quarter. As to the provision of seats it is impossible to bring like a reform Bill. In this scheme is, that no lodgers. There are men who pay 5 a year rent, but living alone, and are to have, men are respectable married men, who are quite respectable. The fact is that in the large cities and towns such a thing as a £6 of £20 or £30 is occasioned families, and the head of the family is entitled to have the franchise do not give it to them, discontented, and agitation for ever. What the Government will be as to this I say, but I am sure, whether of registration or rejection, it will reflect indifference to the people.

He said, he had supported, the hon. Friend who had introduced the Bill in the House, all the provisions of 1832; but in following upon the present occasion to express his belief that the noble Lord had misled their consideration of the people of England of official character. The Bill brings within the limits of the franchise a large number of who would, he felt convinced, be new right justly. He asked the question which had been asked by the hon. Gentleman opposite site, and that was whether the measure was to lead to an immediate dissolution of Parliament.

Mr. KNIGHTLEY also wished to repeat a question which had been put by another Member—namely, what was the number of persons who were likely to be added to the county constituency under the £10 franchise?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he had to state, in reply to a question which had been put by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge, that the Government did not propose any alteration in the existing law with regard to the payment of the poor rate. The tenant would be obliged to pay the poor-rate as at present, and he would have the same facilities of having himself put on the rate-book which he now enjoyed. With regard to another question which had been put by two hon. Members, he had to state that he did not think he would be justified in attempting to define what would be the number of £10 voters in counties. From a return which he held in his hand it appeared that the number of persons in England, rated at between £10 and £50 was 381,000, and that the number of persons in England and Wales so rated was 415,000; but that return included many people who were freeholders rated at £10, and others; and therefore it afforded no accurate test of the number of electors. He had also been asked whether it would be necessary that the passing of that Bill should be immediately followed by a dissolution of Parliament; and in reply to that question he had to state that what the Bill proposed was, that at the November registration the claim to the franchise should be made, and, of course, when the November registration was completed it would be competent to the Crown to dissolve Parliament and to summon a new one at any time that might be thought necessary or convenient.

Mr. BRIGHT said, that in consequence of what had just fallen from the noble Lord, he wished to know whether any change was intended in respect of the Compound Householders Act passed a few years since? That Act gave the franchise to the tenant whose landlord paid the rates, and he wished to know whether it would be applicable to those who would be enfranchised under this Bill.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: We propose to make no change in relation to this matter.

MR. BRIGHT said, that in municipal boroughs where the landlord paid the rate, the tenant was entitled to vote. He hoped there would be no change, for a departure from the present arrangement in that respect would falsify all the promises of the present measure as far as the working classes were concerned.

MR. ROEBUCK wished to direct the attention of the noble Lord to one point in which he (Mr. Roebuck) must confess that he felt a special interest. Among the towns to which the noble Lord would give an additional representative Leeds was included, while Sheffield was excluded from the list. But if the noble Lord would look to the returns upon the subject he would grant that Sheffield at present possessed a larger constituency than Leeds.

MR. CONINGHAM would not now enter into the details of the Bill, but he could not view without alarm one of its characteristics, which seemed to be the transference of borough Members to the counties. He doubted whether the liberal party had anything to gain by such a transfer. Looking at the enormous expense of a county election, and the class of persons returned from counties, he doubted whether the representation that would result would be more in consonance with the feelings of the liberal side of the House than at present.

Leave given.

Bill further to amend the Laws relating to the Representation of the People in England and Wales, ordered to be brought in by Lord JOHN RUSSELL, Viscount PALMERSTON, Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, and Sir GEORGE LEWIS.

Bill presented and read 1^o.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE (IRELAND) BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. CARDWELL rose to move for leave to bring in a Bill further to amend the laws relating to the Representation of the People of Ireland, and said: Sir, in moving for leave to introduce the proposals of the Government with respect to Ireland, I shall not enter into any topic which would be likely to give rise to any protracted discussion, and I shall content myself with stating as briefly and as clearly as I can the effect which the change in the existing laws I have to announce on the part of the Government would be likely to have on the constituencies of Ireland; and I shall leave all questions of argument to be dealt with on a future occasion. We propose to adopt the same general rules for the amendment of the representation of the people in that country which my noble Friend has laid down for the attainment of the same object in England; but the House will easily understand that, as the law which regulates the qualification of electors in Ireland is framed on a different model from that which has been adopted in Great Britain, the two schemes must necessarily vary in some of their details. An Act was passed for Ireland in the year 1850, on the subject of the Parliamentary Franchise, which has put an end to many controversies of long standing, and has, I believe, given general satisfaction in its working. Ireland also enjoys the benefit of one uniform, clear, and intelligible system of valuation, which is now rapidly approaching completion, and that valuation we propose shall form the test of the qualification under the new Irish Reform Bill. Ireland has in this respect a great advantage over England which has no such uniform system of valuation. What we propose to do in Ireland is this:—We propose that the present £12 qualification for a vote in the counties in Ireland shall be reduced to £10, and that the £8 Irish borough qualification shall be reduced to £6. The House will naturally be desirous to know what effect that change will produce on those two classes of constituencies. According to the returns of the last registration—returns which will be immediately laid before the House—the county returns in Ireland give a collective constituency of 174,000; and if we add to that number all those persons who are rated at from £10 to £12 the total addition to the county constituency would be 40,126. But if you apply to that list the correction which I believe is right and necessary, and if you make a due allowance for females, minors, double occupations, and absences, the total increase under the proposed change may be calculated at 30,000; making on the whole a county constituency of 204,000. The borough voters at present amount to 30,700, and the addition which the proposed change would make to that number would, at first sight, appear to be 7557; but, making a correction corresponding with that which I have made for the counties, the real addition would amount to only 6655. The total number of the constituent body at present in the counties and boroughs of Ireland is 204,000 and the Bill would raise that number to about 240,000. That is the way in which the franchises of £10 and £6 will operate in extending the county and borough constituencies in Ireland. I now come to a change, perhaps of no great magnitude, which we propose to make with respect to the qualification of freemen in Ireland. At the time of the Reform Bill a different qualification with regard to freemen was adopted in England and Ireland. But we propose that for the future, in the case of freemen qualifying after the passing of this Bill, the English law upon that subject shall operate in Ireland. I will now proceed to state the changes which we intend to introduce in the distribution of the Irish representation. Ireland is a country the population of which is not generally located in large towns; its inhabitants do not, as a general rule, congregate in large towns to anything like the same extent as the people of England and of Scotland. At present 32 Irish counties have 64 seats in this House; 33 Irish boroughs have 39 seats; and 1 Irish university has two seats—making a total of 105 seats. There is not a single borough in Ireland to which the principle of partial disfranchisement will apply under the rule which it is proposed to adopt in England, that no town with a population of less than 7,000 should return two Members. No town in Ireland returning that number of Members has a population much short of 30,000. Wexford, which is the smallest town on the list, has a population, according to the last census, of 29,000. We cannot, therefore, obtain an additional seat in Ireland for populous places by applying to that country the rule we have adopted with respect to England. Neither, on the other hand, do we find in Ireland unrepresented towns of the size of Birkenhead, Staleybridge, and other English towns, which at present return no Members to Parliament. But there are two constituencies in Ireland—one a county and the other a city constituency—which in population, in the value of their property, and in the number of their electors, stand entirely apart from all the other counties and boroughs in that kingdom. These are the constituencies of the great county of Cork, and of the city of Dublin, and we propose that henceforward the county of Cork and the city of Dublin shall each have three Members, the two new seats thus assigned being taken out of the four formerly belonging to boroughs in England, whose right to return Members has recently been abolished by Act of Parliament. The claim of the University naturally arose for consideration when the claim of the London University to such a privilege was allowed; and I should be extremely glad if it had been in my power to ask the House to express its approbation of the Queen's University in Ireland by assigning to it a Representative in this House. I hope the day may come, and that many years will not elapse before it does come, when Parliament will think it right to grant to the Queen's University in Ireland the privilege of returning a Representative to this House. But at present, looking at the small number of years during which that University has been established, and—what is the governing consideration in such a matter—the number of its members, and the probable weight of opinion which its representative would bring with him into this House, I am afraid it would not be considered right that we should make any such proposal as yet. The total number of the graduates now amounts to only 260, some of whom are not residing in Ireland; and, under those circumstances, I think it would be impossible at the present moment that we should seek to give the right of representation to the Queen's University. There is another subject connected with Ireland on which we propose to legislate upon the present occasion. I had the honour of presenting this evening a petition signed by a large proportion of the Peers of Ireland, who complain of the anomalous condition in which they stand under that clause of the Act of Union which defines their legal and constitutional status. They ask why, if it is thought right that it should be open to them to represent constituencies in Great Britain, with whom it cannot be expected they should have any great community of sympathy or interest, they should be prevented by express enactment, from representing their Friends and neighbours with whom their interests are specially associated, and whose confidence they are most likely to enjoy? We propose to remove that disqualification. We propose that they shall be enabled to stand towards their friends and neighbours, the constituencies of Ireland, in that relation in which they now stand to the constituencies of England. With regard to matters of a purely administrative character—such as the time occupied in county elections, the number of polling places, and all arrangements for diminishing the expense or the excitement of contested elections—the House is aware that those subjects are regulated by a special Act of Parliament, and not by that which determines the qualifications of electors; and I do not, therefore, mean to deal with them in this measure. What we now propose with regard to Ireland is shortly this: to make the county franchise in that country a £10 franchise, to make the borough franchise a £6 franchise, to give an additional Representative to the great county of Cork, and another to the city of Dublin, out of the seats which have been suppressed in England, and to remove the disqualification which at present renders Irish Peers ineligible as the representatives of Irish constituencies. I trust that by such a measure we shall give satisfaction to the people of Ireland and increase the value and the efficiency of the representation of the people in that part of the United Kingdom.

Cardwell

MR. WHITESIDE said, he was not disposed to complain either of the general provisions of the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman, or of the manner in which he had brought it under the consideration of the House. All he doubted was that there was the necessity for the introduction of any such measure at all. This would be the fifth Reform Bill they had had for Ireland. When the Union was carried 200 seats were abolished and some boroughs bought up. In 1827, Sir Robert Peel thought it right to change the whole country franchise into a £10 freehold franchise. They then had the Reform Bill of 1832, and then the Bill proposed by the Friends of the right hon. Gentleman, which gave a £12 occupation franchise for counties and £8 for boroughs. He thought the right hon. Gentleman had given no reason why that law should be changed now. One thing, he thought, had escaped the attention of the right hon. Gentleman. The county of Cork was divided; there was a west and an east riding each of which had a separate electoral system. He thought the right hon. Member fell into an error in giving a third Member for the whole county, and he supposed that he meant to give the additional Member to the west riding.

MR. COGAN wanted to know, whether, by the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman, there was to be any disfranchisement of freemen in Ireland? He was certainly surprised at one part of the project—which on the first blush he regarded with some apprehension—namely, the admission of Irish Peers to that House as representatives of Irish constituencies. That class of the community had already the right of sending representatives to the other House of Parliament, and he believed the proposition to which he had referred would have the effect of increasing a power which at present certainly operated very much to the prejudice of the popular party, and in favour of the great territorial proprietors. He wished to ask a question as to the probable time when the Bill would come into operation. There would be a registry of voters under the Bill, and he presumed it would be effected at the time mentioned by the noble Lord with reference to England—probably about the month of November. What he wanted to know was, how long the voter would require to be on the roll before he could exercise the franchise—six months or a longer period?

MR. DAWSON wished to know whether the qualification was to be a rating or an occupation one?

MR. VANCE wished to contradict in the most unqualified terms the statement of the right hon. Gentleman that the freeman franchise had a most injurious effect upon the representation of Ireland. He was perfectly sure that the protestant freemen of Dublin, and he might say of Cork also, had always exercised the franchise for the benefit of their country. No case of corruption had been made out against them for the last three-quarters of a century. He regretted, as well as his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Whiteside), that the right hon. Gentleman should have been advised to make any change in the Irish franchise after the number of Reform Bills that they had already had for that country, and he did not despair of inducing him, after discussion, to retrace his steps. He (Mr. Vance) did not clearly apprehend what was the nature of the right hon. Gentleman's plan with regard to freemen. It was evident that he did not intend to disfranchise them, because he said that he intended to put them on the same footing as freemen in England. Now he believed that the freemen of Ireland acquired their franchise in precisely the same manner as those of England.

MR. SCULLY, following the example of the hon. Member for Middlesex, begged to return thanks for the additional Member proposed to be given to Cork, of which he (Mr. Scully) was now sole representative. He returned thanks, however, for the county and not for himself, because the additional seat would only increase his chances.

of having a contest at future elections. He agreed with the hon. Member for Finsbury that it was quite unjust to retain the modern principle which rendered it necessary for every voter to pay his poor rate before he could be placed upon the register. He had frequently argued the point with persons who began by holding the opposite view, but they had always ended by admitting that the law was untenable. He occupied a house in Dublin for which he had to pay a consolidated rate amounting to about £36, but of that only £6 was for the poor; and why should he be obliged to pay that any more than the other rates as a condition precedent to being registered as a voter? This was a very important point, and he therefore wished to direct attention to it before any final resolution was come to on the subject, either with regard to this or to the English Bill. The late Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Justice Fitzgerald) had occupied a house in Dublin for four years; but at the last revision it was found that his predecessor owed 3s. or 4s. of his poor rates, which had not until lately been discovered; and the result had been that the learned Judge was for the present year disqualified. At the last Sligo revision it had been found that a collector, who happened to be a politician, had neglected to apply for the last rate to persons of the opposite party, while he had actually entered as paid persons on his own side who had not paid for several weeks after the date alleged. A gentleman had likewise told him (Mr. Scully) that out of forty persons on his estate who ought to be voters only four or five actually enjoyed the franchise, and they were all on one side; the custom being to strike a poor-rate just before the time came round for revising the list. Such were a few instances illustrating the working of the present law, and he trusted that they would meet with the serious attention of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. M'EVROY should not have risen to prolong the discussion had it not been for the strong feeling which he entertained against the right hon. Gentleman's proposition with regard to Irish Peers, a proposition which would render more necessary than ever some means for protecting voters in the exercise of their privilege. It could hardly fail to increase the pressure upon the tenants of the large landed estates which belonged to many of the Irish Peers. The tenant voters had not, at present, free action at elections. Their number was to be increased, and without the ballot the evils they complained of would be increased also. The hon. Member for Dublin (Mr. Vance) had spoken of the freemen as an immaculate body; but he was authorised to say that within a quarter of a century 1,500 freemen of the city of Dublin had been bought at a particular election for the sum of £3 a-head, so that £4,500 was paid for their votes at that election, and he might state that the Gentleman who had the misfortune to pay the money was now in that House.

Mr. Scully

MR. BLACK said, that as hon. Gentlemen from the sister country seem to object to have two additional seats which had formerly belonged to England given to Ireland, he should be happy to accept them for Scotland, which he was afraid was not going to get quite her fair share of the representation.

MR. LONGFIELD strongly objected to that part of the Bill which empowered Irish Peers to represent Irish constituencies. The Irish people had not asked for such a thing; and he maintained that it was not only a most improper proposal, but contrary to the Treaty of Union.

COLONEL GREVILLE quite agreed that the proposition to which the hon. Member who had spoken last had alluded, was a most extraordinary one to find its way into a Bill to amend the Representation of the People. He wished, also, to point out that the assumed uniformity between the qualification for the franchise in Ireland and England was more specious than real, owing to the difference in the letting of property.

LORD ROBERT CECIL asked the reason why two seats had been filched from England to be bestowed on Ireland? Was it that Ireland was more populous and wealthy, or because Irish Members were so much more useful in the House than English Members? The claim advanced by the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) for an additional Member for that town, had not been answered; and until the claim of that and other large towns in England had been satisfied, the Government had no right to dispose of the four vacant seats in other ways.

MR. MONSELL said, that the proposition with regard to the Irish Peers struck him as most extraordinary, and he believed it would give great dissatisfaction in Ireland. An Irish Peer was neither fish nor flesh in his own country; but to give him the power of representing the people when he was represented himself in the House of Peers, was a most absurd proposition, and one which he imagined would not be accepted in that House. He agreed with his hon. Friend near him, that the proposed franchise for Ireland would not establish anything like nominal uniformity between the two countries. The people in Ireland lived so much lower than in England, that the class which in England was rated at £6, would probably not be rated at more than £4 in Ireland.

MR. MAGUIRE cordially joined in the opposition to the proposal with regard to Irish Peers. The reason of that proposal was hard to guess at, though he had some dim notion of it. He had seen visions of Gentlemen called Irish Peers, who had failed, with all their Irish persuasiveness, to secure the confidence of English constituencies, dismally haunting the precincts of the House like ghosts. It was in obedience to the application of gentlemen of this kind, not to the demands of the nation, that the right hon. Gentleman was ready to interfere with the solemn compact made by the Act of Union. If the right hon. Gentleman was so ready to meddle with the Act of Union, he would point out to him a way in which he could provide for these gentlemen. Why did he not send them to what was called, in the cant phrase of the House, "another place"?—to use an argument applied sometimes in favour of purgatory, they "might go further and fare worse." According to the British Constitution Peers had no right to interfere in elections, and he hoped the Government would not proceed with this monstrous and revolutionary proposal. With regard to the county franchise, there was no substantial equality between a £10 franchise in England and a £10 franchise in Ireland. It ought to be reduced in Ireland to £8 or £7 to bring about a complete uniformity. It was unjust to complain of two additional Members being given to Ireland; for even that addition would not do them justice. 105 Members was not a fair proportion for Ireland, taking into account the relative population and wealth of England and Ireland.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that on the mere introduction of the Bill it was not his intention to enter upon a discussion of the proposition for enabling Irish Peers to sit for Irish counties or boroughs, which the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. Maguire) described as a revolutionary measure. But he wished to explain to the House the reasons why the Government made that proposition, leaving the House to judge whether these reasons were not sufficient, and whether the Conservative susceptibilities of the hon. Member for Dungarvan were not prematurely awakened. The Act of Union in the 4th Article contained a provision which declared that any person holding a Peerage in Ireland should not be disqualified from representing any county, city, or borough in Great Britain; but that as long as he so continued a Member of the House of Commons he should not be entitled to the privilege of peerage nor to serve as a Representative Peer for Ireland, nor to vote at the elections of Representative Peers for Ireland. Such were the securities which the Act of Union provided against the privilege of the peerage being abused in the case of Irish Peers having seats in that House for English or Scotch counties or boroughs. That House was led for many years by the son of an Irish Peer (Lord Castlereagh) who sat for the county of Down. After the death of his father he succeeded to the Irish peerage, and thus became ineligible to sit for an Irish county; but he sat for an English borough. That was a remarkable instance of an Irish Peer possessing the right to sit and vote in the English House of Commons. During the time he so sat there, neither he nor any other Irish Peer, in a similar position, was entitled to sit as a Representative Peer, nor to vote at their election. The objection therefore as to a confusion of rights was not well founded. By the provision which they proposed to introduce, the Government were merely extending the rule, which now existed with respect to England and Scotland, to Ireland. They deprived no person of his rights. All they did was to say that the disqualification which now attached to Irish voters, of not being allowed, if they thought fit, to elect an Irish Peer as their representative, should be abolished. That was in fact the whole extent of the proposal.

COLONEL DICKSON thought the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department had misunderstood the objection which was raised. It was not that an Irish Peer, by being elected to represent an Irish constituency, would in his own person be twice represented, but that a double representation would be thus given to the body of which he was a Member. He regarded this clause of the Bill as having a most mischievous tendency.

He had never been opposed to any rational measure of reform, but it seemed to him that the present proposal amounted merely to a reduced, and not a discriminating franchise. There were other classes with qualifications higher than mere property who might be admitted with advantage. A complaint was often made in Ireland that territorial influence was unduly exercised over the lower orders, and without discussing the justice of that complaint it was evident that the interference of the Irish nobility in elections must greatly tend to increase the power of the landlords.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, there was one objection which applied to both the Bills which had been proposed,—namely, the provision which made the exercise of the right of voting dependent on the payment of rates. He thought that every man who was rated should be entitled to exercise the franchise. Numbers of persons were now disfranchised simply because they happened to be out of town when the rates were payable. Too much power was now placed in the hands of the collectors.

SIR WILLIAM SOMERVILLE said, several Members had mentioned the proposal to reduce the Irish franchise for counties from £12 to £10. He wished to know whether the right hon. Gentleman proposed that any portion of the new Irish franchise should have reference to houses or tenements.

MR. CARDWELL:—In reply to the question of my hon. Friend I will state that the reduced franchise, as proposed by this Bill, will follow and be based upon that excellent statute which was introduced by my right hon. Friend himself. With regard to the freemen, as to whom I was also interrogated, the law in England limits the power of taking up their freedom to those who have acquired it by birth or servitude. The Irish law includes another element. We propose to limit that franchise to the two conditions imposed by the English Act, and to make it in all respects the same as in England. With regard to the date at which this registration will come into effect, my earnest hope and expectation is that it will receive the Royal Assent in sufficient time to come into operation before the period at which the revision of the voters' lists is made. On that point I shall make exactly the same answer that was given to my noble Friend with regard to the English Bill. I proceed to state the grounds on which the addition has been made to the number of Irish representatives. We found that Cork county, according to the last census, contained a population of 563,000, and by the income tax returns was valued at £834,000, the number of electors on the last registry being 15,895. On comparing these figures with the English counties to which a third Member has been given, I think my noble Friend will find that there was ample reason for adding a third representative to the county of Cork. The city of Dublin contains a population of 254,000, the income tax valuation is £989,000, and the body of registered electors is in number 10,660. If my noble Friend will compare the case of Dublin with that of Birmingham, he will see the reason why a third Member has been given to Dublin. The hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. Maguire) complained that we had not added more largely to the number of representatives for Ireland; and the noble Lord (Lord R. Cecil) complained that I had withdrawn these two Members from England. One of these objections, I think, affords some facility in answering the other. If the hon. Gentleman will look at the speech of Lord Castlereagh in introducing the Act of Union into the Irish Parliament, he will find that the proposition was based on a comparison of the population and the returns of the revenue for the two kingdoms; and, if he will take into account the relative condition of the countries in the present day, I think he will be satisfied that in our proposals we have endeavoured to do justice to Ireland. As regards the objections taken with respect to the Irish Peers, we shall have an opportunity of discussing that question when the Bill is considered on its merits; I will only say that the proposal was made solely on public grounds and from a desire to remove what is at present an anomaly, and to place this matter on a more natural and reasonable footing. I can understand the argument of the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Colonel Dickson), that the Members of the Irish peerage should be represented only in the House of Lords. Extremely consoling this must be to the minority, not one of whom has his representative in the House of Peers, but if that argument be carried to its legitimate conclusion it would apply with equal force against their being allowed to sit for English or Scotch as for Irish constituencies. The intention of the proposal which I have the honour to submit is simply to enable the Irish electors to exercise their free choice in the selection of representatives, without being subject to any statutory disqualification. All I now request is permission to introduce the Bill.

Colonel Dickson

Leave given.

Bill further to amend the Laws relating to the Representation of the People of Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. CARDWELL, Viscount PALMERSTON, Lord JOHN RUSSELL, and Sir GEORGE LEWIS.

Bill presented, and read 1^o.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE (SCOTLAND) BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

THE LORD ADVOCATE :—Sir, in rising to ask permission to introduce a Bill further to amend the Laws relating to the Representation in Parliament of the people of Scotland, I think I had better commence by relieving the anxiety of my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Black) with regard to the manner in which the two remaining seats are to be disposed of. Those two seats, he will be glad to hear, are to be given to Scotland; and I dare say he will agree with me that one of them could not be better disposed of than by bestowing it on the great and flourishing commercial community of Glasgow. The other Member, it is proposed, shall be given to the Universities of Scotland in the aggregate, to be elected by the four Universities; and I hope the House will entertain the opinion that we have well and justly, and, I trust it may prove in the end, beneficially disposed of the two seats which were within our control. With regard to the general provisions of the measure, they are as identical as circumstances permit with those proposed for England. The Bill proposes an occupation franchise of £10 in counties, and of £6 in boroughs. It proposes also to simplify the system of registration in Scotland. We are in the same fortunate position as Ireland in possessing a complete system of valuation, made up year by year, which shows the number of proprietors, tenants, and occupiers, and the value of all the property in the kingdom. We made an experiment in this direction some years ago, but we now propose to carry it a great deal further. We propose to make the Valuation Rolls the register of the proprietors, occupiers, and the qualifications as the basis of the franchise, dispense altogether with the registration machinery of the Reform Bill, which in practice has been found exceedingly cumbrous. The Valuation Rolls will be the register, and we propose to do away altogether with the Registration Court. All the business of the Registry will be done by the assessors of counties and boroughs, with an appeal from them to the Court that meets in the month of October, and which, as far as the registration cases are concerned, will have very little to do, as every possible objection will be limited to a very few elements indeed. In Scotland the property franchise in counties has been £10 in freehold, or £50 for lands held on long lease. Some efforts have been made to introduce into Scotland the 40s. freeholds of England; but, on consideration, we have not thought it desirable to do so. In counties we propose to reduce the freehold franchise from £10 to £5, but that £5 must be without any deductions. It is desirable, to prevent the possibility of the franchise being abused, to provide that the value of the holding shall in no case be reduced by the burdens on it below £4. The great danger of the property franchise in Scotland is the creation of fictitious votes. Even the £10 franchise has been largely used for that purpose, and if it is reduced to £5 the facilities for this abuse will be still greater. It is, therefore, proposed that residence shall be enforced to give a right to the franchise, for all freeholds below £10 value. The valuation roll being the basis of the franchise, it will necessarily be a substantial one; and, having with it a clause compelling residence, it will, I hope, effectually prevent the manufacture of votes, for which purpose the small and widely scattered population of parts of Scotland gave greater facilities than existed in the populous counties of England. I do not know that there are any further observations that I need make to the House; and I now move for leave to bring in the Bill.

Mr. BAXTER said, that great injustice was done to Scotland in the number of Members given to it. Scotland was entitled, on the fair basis of taxation and population combined, to nineteen additional Members; yet all the Government proposed was to give it two—one to the commercial city of Glasgow, the other to the four Universities. Other large cities, like Aberdeen and Dundee, and populous counties like Ayr and Lanark, were entitled on the basis of the English Bill to additional representatives; and he could not understand why, if Dublin was to have an additional representative, Edinburgh should be left out. He felt so strongly on the subject that in the event of the House agreeing to the second reading of the English Bill, he should move an instruction to the Committee to disfranchise at least four or five more English seats, in order to take some steps towards doing justice to Scotland.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON, considering these three Bills as one measure, had one objection to make to it as a whole. It appeared to him that the principle on which the Government had proceeded was that of promoting uniformity in the franchise of the three kingdoms. Now, the Irish franchise would continue as hitherto, founded on rating. They had just heard from the Lord Advocate that the Scottish franchise would be founded on the valuation rolls, which was tantamount to a rating franchise—it was, in fact, as nearly as circumstances would admit, a rating franchise. He was sorry that the Government had determined on making the English franchise an exception to this rule of uniformity. He had long felt that the rating franchise, though not in the Bill of last year, would greatly simplify the franchise; and he hoped the Government would think it desirable to reconsider the matter, and adopt it for England as well as for Ireland and Scotland. The noble Lord had given as a reason that the rating was extremely unequal. He admitted the fact, but denied that it was an argument. It only showed that the law was not enforced. The inequality was created in the teeth of the law which required that property should be rated at its full value; and he believed that if the Government were to make the rating the basis of the franchise, it would tend in its result to put an end to the inequality of the rating. He trusted the noble Lord would reconsider this portion of the measure, and see whether it would not be possible to adopt the rating system for England as well as for Ireland and Scotland.

SIR JAMES FERGUSON said; the subject of Reform occupied a much more prominent place in Scotland than in England, and he believed that the proposal of the Government would be considered a very moderate measure indeed by the reformers of Scotland, where there were more thinking men among the lower classes than in England, where education had been in a very advanced state for centuries, and where the labouring population were accustomed to occupy themselves very much with public affairs. For his own part, however, he considered that the very moderation of the measure proved the sincerity of the Government in their desire to carry through a measure of reform during the present Session. The measure, it must also be admitted, had the merit of simplicity in its provisions. He did not see how the enfranchisement of a large portion of the working classes would be attained by a £10 qualification in counties, and he would like to know the proportion of persons of the working classes who occupied houses of that value. He should not approve of the admission to the franchise of the working classes in a mass, because their greater numbers would give to them an unfair preponderance of political power. He thought that it was not right, as the noble Lord the Member for the City had done, to promise enfranchisement to large portions of the working classes, which, in practice, it was not intended to give. He did not approve of the Government being, to any great extent, in the hands of the working classes, because they were so much more numerous than any other; but he maintained that the principle of admitting those classes to the franchise was not fully carried out by these measures. He held that the intelligent working men should be enfranchised, which was very different from admitting the whole of the working classes, and he believed that object would have been better effected by the Bill of the late Government.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS, in reply to the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington) as to the bases upon which the Government proposed to form the franchises of England, Ireland, and Scotland respectively, said that the rating franchise had been maturely considered, and the Government were not likely to alter their views. The reason of the distinction between England, and Ireland, and Scotland was this:—In Ireland there was a valuation of all tenements upon uniform principles, and there was therefore no difficulty in adopting it as the foundation of the Parliamentary franchise. It was done some years ago, and it was to be observed that the franchise in Ireland was not only dependent on the payment of the rate, but was defined by the amount at which the tenement was rated. In Scotland that was not the case. The rating there was on the yearly value, as in England; but that yearly value, according to the proposal of the Lord Advocate, was measured by the amount on the valuation roll. The valuation roll was a valuation which was founded to a great extent upon the income-tax assessment, and was tolerably uniform throughout Scotland. Wherever there was such a valuation it was unquestionably a benefit to take it as the foundation of the franchise. But in English parishes such a valuation did not exist. The right hon. Baronet, who was a thorough master of all our rural economy, would not deny this. In England, unfortunately, no such uniformity of valuation existed, [Sir JOHN PAKINGTON: But the law requires it.] The law, no doubt, required that the rate should be made up to the full value, but, unfortunately, there was no sufficient control exercised over the parish officers to secure uniformity, and there was a different mode of rating in different places. In some parishes they made a considerable reduction, and in others rated at the full value. If the franchise in England were based upon the unamended practice, the right hon. Gentleman would see that great inequality would remain and great injustice would be done. He would very much wish to see an Amendment in the English law in this respect, and if the House were not already occupied with many more Bills than they had time to consider he would undertake to propose a Bill to effect an uniform valuation. The Bill was already in existence, but if introduced it would not be with any view to the present Reform Bill; it would be with the object to amend the practice with respect to assessment. The reason why the Government followed one course in Ireland and Scotland, and another in England, was that they did not believe that under the existing practice there was such an uniform valuation as could be properly and justly taken as the foundation of the Parliamentary franchise.

Mr. CAIRD agreed with his hon. Friend the Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter) that the proportion of Members allotted to Scotland was far less than justice required, though he supposed the Lord Advocate was unable to obtain the proportion which would be proper. He must, however, express his opinion, that the proposed registration of voters was a great improvement on the present system; and that it would be self-acting was also of great importance. He would suggest that there should be a central court to determine the law, because in Scotland the law differed in every part of the country. It gave him unqualified satisfaction to hear the Lord Advocate say he would follow the principle of the noble Lord (Lord John Russell), but the promise was not fulfilled when the property franchise in Scotch counties, instead of being lowered to 40s, as in England, was limited to £5. He also understood that up to £10 there must be occupation as well as ownership, and, as he disapproved of a distinction which would deprive the provident working man of a vote for freehold property without residence, he should endeavour to amend the Bill in Committee. With regard to bribery and the manufacture of fictitious votes, he would suggest that the attempt should be punished as well as the act; because, when a bribe was once accepted, both parties were interested in concealing the whole matter; and, as to fictitious votes, those who created them should be punished by fine and deprivation of franchise for ever afterwards. Bribery in boroughs would never be properly prevented, unless the franchise was accompanied by a distinct provision that it should only be enjoyed by those who occupied the premises in respect of which they voted.

Mr. BLACKBURN thought that Scotland was not so well treated as she ought to be as regarded the additional number of representatives. Adding only two was far below what it ought to be, seeing that their claim was as strong as that of Ireland, and more in proportion to its valuation. He questioned, moreover, whether the Bill of the Lord Advocate had done justice to them in other respects. He did not understand the question of the property vote, and whether it applied to counties or boroughs. He did not mean to give any opinion as to the amount of the property franchise, whether it was too large or too small; but he was of opinion that it ought to be the same as that of Ireland. If the Government, on full consideration, thought the 40s. franchise should be extended both to Ireland and Scotland, he had no objection; but he questioned whether it might not be a colourable franchise altogether.

CAPTAIN CARNEGIE said, that Scotland would only gain two seats taken from places so notoriously corrupt that they had been disfranchised. If Scotland was only to get seats from the disfranchisement of corrupt places, he thought that one or two other seats might have been gained in that way. The returns of population and property in Scotland showed that there were many constituencies so large as to render an addition to their representatives a mere matter of justice. On that ground and not merely for the purpose of increasing the number of Scotch Members he should support the Motion of the hon. Member for Montrose.

MR. STIRLING said, he had no doubt that the scheme which the Lord Advocate had submitted to the House would be received with disappointment in many quarters in Scotland. There were at least three constituencies in that country which might very naturally expect to be provided with additional representatives. The point, however, to which he wished more particularly to refer was the expediency of giving two instead of one representative to the four Scotch Universities. Those institutions were placed at a great distance from one another, and it would be found that when the constituency was made up it would be very large in numbers. In England there would be five university representatives; and it would be admitted that the Members sent by those constituencies were not the least efficient or distinguished. There was no reason to suppose that those sent by the Scotch Universities would be inferior to their colleagues in England.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE was glad that the Government had undertaken, under favourable circumstances, to settle a long-pending question—that of self-acting registration. The proposal was made with regard to England by the late Government; he therefore hoped that they would support it as applied to Scotland. As representative of the largest constituency (Lanarkshire) that was represented by one Member single-handed, he felt some disappointment that another Member had not been given to that important district. The population was about 200,000; exclusive of the boroughs represented, it contained many large towns that were not represented; and the way in which that county was treated would cause much dissatisfaction. Without wishing to say anything which might be deemed invidious, he thought they would have a better chance of getting eligible representatives for the counties than for some of the large towns to which it was proposed to give an increased number of Members. He saw no objection to the proposed property franchise. It was so nearly on a par with that proposed for England that only a microscopic eye could distinguish between them. Upon the whole he thought it a better franchise than the one now enjoyed in England; but it was open to grave doubt whether residence ought to be required to form part of the qualification. As to the claim on the ground of right on the part of the Scotch, he could bear the strongest testimony to that feeling, for he had nearly lost his seat because he supported the Bill of the late Government, which rendered such scant justice to Scotland. But he feared they were about to receive less from the present Government.

in Carnegie

MR. MURE suggested to the Lord Advocate that, instead of giving Glasgow a third member, the two new representatives to be bestowed on Scotland should both be given to the Universities. It was obvious that the alterations proposed to be made in the representative system in Scotland were much more considerable than those with regard to England and Ireland, and therefore until he saw the precise mode in which his right hon. Friend intended to work out his scheme he would abstain from expressing any opinion on it. He could assure the right hon. Gentleman that in doing what he could to prevent the creation of fictitious votes he should have his most cordial assistance. He must confess, however, he doubted very much whether the proposal of creating a £5 qualification in the county, and at the same time not dealing with the question of heritable burdens, would be the means of accomplishing that object. Some years ago a Committee of the House investigated the system of fictitious votes which existed in Scotland; and one of the principal remedies which they suggested was that there should be a deduction of heritable debts from the property qualification in Scotland, without which, they said, fictitious votes could never be stopped. For his own part, he quite concurred in that recommendation. As to registration, he was not sure that the plan of the Lord Advocate would work quite so smoothly in all its features as he anticipated; but he thought some such plan as he had described might be beneficially introduced. He would, however, wait until he saw the Bill itself before he offered any opinion on this point.

MR. BUCHANAN wished to remark that upon all the principles which had been announced by the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary it seemed perfectly obvious that the Government could have come to no other conclusion than that which they had done, namely, that Glasgow should have another Member. When they were increasing the representatives of Birmingham, Manchester, and Leeds, he did not see how they could overlook the claims of Glasgow, which was larger than either of them. No doubt Lanarkshire was a large and populous county, but as between Lanarkshire and Glasgow there could be no difference of opinion. As to the Universities of Scotland, he was glad they were at length to be represented in Parliament; he thought it a disgrace that they had not been represented before.

MR. DUNLOP thanked the learned Lord Advocate for the two additional Members he proposed to give to Scotland, but regretted that there were not more given. He thought the Bill for England would be much improved by taking away some of the double Members given to insignificant boroughs and transferring them to the large constituencies of Scotland. He thought that the adoption of the valuation roll as the test of qualification would tend to prevent the creation of fictitious votes, but did not believe that the residence which the right hon. Gentleman insisted on would have that effect in any degree whatever.

MR. ROBERTSON said, he could not sit tamely by and hear it said that the Bill would not give satisfaction to the people of Scotland. He had no hesitation in stating that it would give satisfaction. Residence, he thought, should be the qualification for being on the register. As to the 40s. freehold generally throughout Scotland, there was no desire to possess that qualification. He had never heard such a wish expressed in his own county.

MR. HOPE understood that the franchise, as defined by the learned Lord, was a £10 occupancy in counties, and a £6 occupancy in burghs. Then there was to be a deduction of the feu duty; that, he understood, was not to be made unless it exceeded one-fifth of the value. There was also to be a £4 proprietorship in counties, but with residence. He wished to know if proprietors at £10, who were non-resident, were to be abolished?

COLONEL SYKES thought the distribution of Members to Scotland had been very scanty. His own constituency, which equalled that of twelve minor boroughs in England, and was remarkable for intelligence and industry—Aberdeen, the seat of universities for centuries—had a right, and did look forward, to have another Member; and the decision of the learned

Lord would be received in the North with disappointment and mortification. He approved of giving one of the two Members available to the Scotch Universities; but with so many small boroughs in England, there should have been no difficulty in finding the means of doing more justice to the claims of the large towns in Scotland.

MR. E. CRAUFURD pointed out an anomaly which existed in the burgh which he represented, with reference to the interval that must elapse between the issue of the writ by the sheriff and the nomination, a much larger space being required than in any county of Scotland, being not less than ten nor more than sixteen days. He hoped every means would be adopted to prevent the manufacture of fictitious votes in counties. At present the practice was to convey a cottage to a workman, taking at the same time a secret back bond to return it when called upon.

MR. KINNAIRD said, there ought to be a further distribution of seats in favour of Scotland. The representation of that country was very pure. Scarcely was there ever a petition presented against the returns from that part of the United Kingdom. He warned the Government against not satisfying Scotland. The Scotch Members were a compact phalanx, under the leadership of the Lord Advocate, and might be very troublesome unless their reasonable demands were complied with.

MR. H. BAILLIE wished to know, whether the Bill of the Lord Advocate would contain any provision for giving additional polling places in Scotland. In the county he represented the number of electors would be more than doubled and additional polling places would certainly be required.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that there was a provision for increasing the polling places. He did not propose to enforce residence where the property was above £10. To prevent fictitious votes the receipt for feu duty would be produced where the property combined with residence was under £4. He would not go into extraneous matters. It was most desirable to have the benefit of the self-acting principle of the valuation roll. There would have been more justice in the complaints of some of his hon. Friends if this was a real adjustment of the proportion of representatives between the three kingdoms, but it was nothing of the kind; it was merely the distribution of four vacant seats; and he certainly thought, under the circumstances, it was fair enough to give one to Cork, one to Dublin, one to Glasgow, and one to the Scotch Universities.

LORD WILLIAM GRAHAM urged upon the Government the importance of a new valuation system in Scotland, a measure which would greatly facilitate the carrying out of the franchise.

Leave given.

Bill further to amend the Laws relating to the Representation in Parliament of the People of Scotland ordered to be brought in by the LORD ADVOCATE, Viscount PALMERSTON, Lord JOHN RUSSELL, and Sir GEORGE LEWIS.

Bill presented, and read 1^o.

MASTERS AND OPERATIVES.

COMMITTEE.

MR. MACKINNON moved for a Select Committee to take into consideration the provisions and practicability of the Masters and Operatives Bill, and whether any improvement could be made in the measure.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the Bill not having yet been read the second time, it was contrary to the practice of the House that it should be referred to a Select Committee. The right course for the hon. Gentleman to take would be to move for a Committee to inquire into the subject to which the Bill related, and then, if he thought fit, he might bring the provisions of the measure before the attention of such Committee.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, this subject had been fully investigated by a Select Committee only a year or two ago, and it would now be idle to send it before another Committee. The reference of that particular Bill to a Select Committee was, however, quite a distinct question.

Motion agreed to.

Select Committee appointed, "to take into consideration the best means of settling disputes between Masters and Operatives."

THE SERPENTINE.

NOMINATION OF COMMITTEE.

MR. COWPER moved that the Select Committee on the Serpentine should consist of the following Members—namely, Mr. COWPER, Lord JOHN MANNERS, Sir JOHN SHELLEY, Mr. BLACKBURN, Sir MORTON PETO, Mr. JOSEPH LOCKE, Mr. WALTER, Sir JOSEPH PAXTON, Lord FERMOY, Mr. BYNG, Mr. ALGERNON EGERTON, Captain ARCHDALL, Sir FREDERICK SMITH, Mr.

The Lord Advocate

BEACH, and Sir MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY; with power to send for persons, papers, and records; five to be the quorum.

Mr. COWPER and Lord JOHN MANNERS nominated Members of the Select Committee on the Serpentine.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Sir JOHN SHELLEY be one other Member of the said Committee:—"

MR. KNIGHTLEY objected to the composition of the proposed Committee. It would have upon it four metropolitan Members, who, as only five were to constitute a quorum, would obviously be able to exercise an undue preponderance in its deliberations. If those four Members should have the majority in the Committee, its report, judging from past experience, would entail a very liberal, not to say lavish, expenditure of the public money. It might possibly be said that the Members for Westminster and Marylebone ought to sit on the Committee, because the question to come before it materially affected the health and comfort of their constituents. Now, there could not be the smallest objection to the people of Westminster and Marylebone cleaning out what might be called their own cesspool at their own cost; but if, because the Serpentine ran into Hyde Park, which was part of the Royal domains, the clearing out of it was to be regarded not as a local, but as a national undertaking, it was the duty of that House, as the guardian of the public purse, to take care that the Committee should be a thoroughly impartial one. That, however, could not be the case, if so many metropolitan Members, whose constituents were immediately interested in a large and reckless outlay of the public money in this matter, were to form part of the tribunal. Any Member serving on a Committee appointed to examine a group of Private Bills was required to make a solemn declaration that his constituents were neither directly nor indirectly interested in the question on which he was to sit in judgment. The same rule ought to be applied in the present instance. He meant to offer no personal disrespect to the hon. Members for Westminster and Marylebone; but, as it was the manifest interest of those whom they represented that "a thorough good job" should be made of this matter, regardless of expense, he maintained that they could not bring a calm and unbiassed judgment to bear upon it. He must, therefore, take exception to the nomination of those hon. Members, and he should begin by moving the omission of the name of Sir John Shelley.

MR. COWPER said, that in selecting the names his desire had been to place on the Committee all the hon. Gentlemen who had evinced a special interest in the question that was to be referred to them. The hon. Baronet the Member for Westminster (Sir J. Shelley) had taken part last year in the debates on the subject of the Serpentine, and had directed his attention to the question in various forms; it was, therefore, only natural that he should be put upon the Committee. It was impossible to admit the force of the argument based on the fact that the hon. Baronet was a metropolitan Member. His constituents had no special interest in that matter. The electors of Westminster were not the only people who suffered from the present state of the Serpentine. It would be just as reasonable to say that no metropolitan Member should be allowed to sit on a Committee to inquire into the unwholesome smells arising from the Thames.

MR. BENTINCK thought the right hon. Gentleman who spoke last deserved great credit for his efforts to mystify a simple question. The question was whether they were to permit the system to continue by which for years past the grossest jobs for the benefit of the metropolis, and against the general interests of the country, had been perpetrated. It was quite true, as the right hon. Gentleman said, that the four metropolitan Members now nominated had displayed, and very naturally, a deep interest in this question; but for that very reason they ought not to be placed on a Committee of which five Members were to form a quorum. It was, no doubt, the interest of the metropolis that the Serpentine should be cleansed out in the shortest possible time, and entirely at the public expense; and those four hon. Gentlemen could not be blamed if they exerted themselves on behalf of those who elected them to convert a strictly local undertaking into an Imperial one. Such a principle, however, was nothing less than downright spoliation. The metropolitan Members had great facilities for serving their constituents at the cost of the country. They could band themselves together in a compact body any day; and when so united he must say—without intending to offer them the slightest personal disrespect—they were perfectly unscrupulous. The whole object of the metropolitan Members was to obtain a large amount of Imperial expenditure for their constituents. Against that principle he would always contend, and he would ask all those hon. Members opposite who were not connected with the metropolis to support him. His hon. Friend objected to a system of most mischievous jobbing, the cost of which it was impossible to calculate. The country had very nearly been saddled with many millions for the purification of the Thames.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON hoped the House would not waste any more time over this “bagged fox.” Great interests were waiting to know the decision of the House upon the matters proposed to be dealt with by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and he trusted that no more time would be taken up by the present discussion. The whole argument of the hon. Gentleman opposite was a mistake. It was impossible that operations connected with the Royal Parks could be discussed by the Metropolitan Board of Works, or the expense be thrown upon the metropolis. The expenditure for the Royal Parks stood upon a different footing, and any analogy between the constitution of the present Committee and that of a railway committee, in which the Members interested had no deciding voice, was quite erroneous. The Committee would have to consider what plan would be best adapted for the purification of the Serpentine at the smallest expenditure. Their recommendation, however, would not be binding on the House, which would look to the evidence, and then judge for itself whether the Report of the Committee was borne out. He trusted that this discussion might now close, and the House be allowed to proceed with the important business on the paper.

MR. H. BERKELEY said, he had remarked that wherever there was any dirty water to be defended the hon. Member for West Norfolk was always foremost in that cause. The hon. Member was very loth to part with what Shakspeare called the “ancient and the fish-like smell” of the artificial water in St. James’s Park, and now that nuisance was taken from the nose of Her Majesty the hon. Member was miserable that the Serpentine was to be cleansed, and insisted that no one whose duty it was to keep the metropolis healthy should be put upon the Committee.

LORD WILLIAM GRAHAM held that the metropolis ought to pay for its own improvements. The country at large was certainly no longer disposed to bear this expenditure.

MR. EDWIN JAMES thought it the duty of the Members for Marylebone to protect the interests which their constituents had in the purification of the Serpentine. It was highly unfair to say that the metropolitan Members ought not to be upon the Committee.

Question put.

The House divided :—Ayes 122 ; Noes 36 : Majority 86.

MR. BLACKBURN, SIR MORTON PETO, MR. JOSEPH LOCKE, MR. WALTER, SIR JOSEPH PAXTON, LORD FERMOY, MR. BYNG, MR. ALGERNON ECKERTON, CAPTAIN ARCHDALL, SIR FREDERICK SMITH, MR. BRACE, and SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY, nominated other Members of the said Committee :—Power to send for persons, papers, and records ; Five to be the quorum.

CUSTOMS ACTS.—COMMITTEE.

House in Committee, according to Order.

MR. MASSEY in the Chair.

(In the Committee.)

On Question that the following Articles stand part of the proposed Resolution [28th February]:—

“ Cotton Manufactures, as denominated in the Tariff.”

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he should be obliged if the Chancellor of the Exchequer would state the value of the importations of manufactures of hosiery which had hitherto entered into this country under the present duty.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER replied, that in 1858 we imported 46,000lb. of cotton fringes, 123,000 pairs of cotton gloves, 187,000 pairs of cotton stockings, 8,000 pairs of cotton socks, and other cotton goods to the value of £36,000. The revenue was about £3,000, and the whole value of the articles could not have been far from £50,000. He should think that we imported something like £1,000 for every £1,000,000 exported.

SIR WILLIAM JOLLIFFE hoped that at least some of the articles in the list before the Committee would be expunged.

tion of the duty upon them would considerable loss to the revenue, a very industrious class of people entry. He understood that about would be lost upon artificial flowers

ERTON remarked that the Chancellor the Exchequer was proposing to great number of articles free of out giving any assurance that he ally considered the position of per- aged in small handicrafts in England, as compared with those employed in similar branches of industry in foreign countries. It was said that some of our working people were seeking a protection to their industry, which had been given up by the great manufacturers of Lancashire. That was a delusion, because the great manufacturers of Lancashire had very formidable natural protections, and so had the ironmasters and coalowners, who were to be largely benefited by the new commercial system. Where iron stone and coal were found together, an English ironmaster could make iron infinitely cheaper than it could be made in any country where those natural advantages did not exist. Coal alone was a great natural protection to the English manufacturer. The case was very different with respect to small handicrafts, and we might find that a large number of the most industrious of our workpeople would be overborne by persons abroad, who lived at hardly any expense, in a very genial climate, and who paid comparatively few taxes. He should like to know that our embroiderers would not have their wages reduced by the importation of embroidery from abroad. It might be said that they must consent to sacrifice their interests like other people; but that statement involved a fallacy. In the case of the corn laws there was a manifest monopoly, because the country was unable to supply the inhabitants with the food which they required; but no person could say that our smaller handicrafts enjoyed a monopoly, when we knew that our needlewomen, for example, were struggling against one another for a bare subsistence. For his own part, he looked to the practical application of propositions rather than to their abstract expression; and he thought the House had been too often carried away by philosophical flourishes about free trade and protection.

William Graham

“ Embroidery and Needlework, as denominated in the Tariff.”

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he did not rise to argue the question on the same grounds as the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets, although he concurred in all that he had said as to the hardship about to be inflicted upon certain classes of industrious workpeople; but he could not allow the Schedule to pass without recording his protest against the waste of revenue which was involved in the propositions before the Committee. Looking through the whole of the Schedule it was impossible to imagine a more wanton waste of our resources. But considering what passed at the close of the debate on Tuesday night, it seemed to him that the question was how far it was worth their while to sit there discussing these articles; for on that occasion, after a great deal of pressing, they obtained from the Government on that evening a statement to the effect that the rejection of any one article would vitiate the Treaty. He, therefore, thought that it was a waste of time to discuss the different items, and to consider whether it was wise or desirable to adopt them. On the other hand, he could not help hoping that, without regard to the effect upon the Treaty, the present Schedule would be debated in reference solely to English interests, and to the question how far it was desirable, as a matter of English policy, to abandon a large revenue by remitting the duties on such articles as clocks, corks, embroidery, artificial flowers, leather manufactures, gloves, musical instruments, oils, silks, and watches. Those ten articles, which were comprehended in the Schedule, yielded upwards of £400,000 a year; and ought we to part with that large sum when we were increasing our direct taxation, and retaining the present duty on tea and sugar? With regard to the Treaty, he confessed he did not see anything in it to induce him for its sake to part with this large and very important amount of revenue. The noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs admitted in his Despatch that those articles which were not articles of necessity would not be dealt with by the Government in their financial arrangements. The reason urged in favour of the Treaty and the proposed changes, consisted in certain alleged collateral effects. What would be the first of these collateral effects? If he could trust the intelligence which had reached London that day, the first collateral effect was likely to be the seizure of Savoy by the Emperor of the French; and he was disposed to agree with those eminent authorities, both in and out of the House, who declared that another collateral effect of the Treaty would be, instead of its creating good feeling, and encouraging friendly relations between England and France, to strengthen the war party in France. He must add that, viewing these remissions as they affected English interests and English policy, they appeared to him to be a wanton waste of revenue on articles which were not of general consumption, and from which there could be no objection to derive revenue.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that it was entirely for the right hon. Baronet to judge for himself whether it was a waste of time or not to discuss the articles proposed for remission. The right hon. Baronet and himself might perhaps come to the same conclusion on that subject, though he was afraid on very different grounds. He had thought that the doctrine of unrestricted competition had been conceded by the right hon. Baronet, but now he found it stiffly contested by him. The right hon. Baronet denounced the surrender of the revenue obtained by differential duties as a wasteful proceeding. He (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) did not think it was convenient now to discuss the general principles upon which the financial scheme of the Government was founded. But he had thought that the doctrine, that differential duties should be maintained—and almost every one of the duties now sought to be charged was a differential duty, and took from the British consumer infinitely more than it brought to the British revenue) had been abandoned. But the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets and the hon. Member for North Warwickshire demurred to the Government proposals on two different points of view. The hon. Member for North Warwickshire complained of their parting with duties levied on articles of luxury, and the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets regretted that they were abandoning duties on articles raised by handicraft, and not by the great capital of great establishments. These were two questions totally and absolutely distinct. With respect to articles of luxury, it was a great fallacy to suppose that differential duties levied on such articles were better than other differential duties. It was a proper thing to consider, when they were raising revenue, whether or not they should first select articles of luxury; but when they came to the question of imposing differential duties on articles because they were articles of luxury, they then involved themselves in the same folly and evil as if they were not articles of luxury. Why should the Legislature give to one class the power of obtaining a higher price or profit than they would otherwise get, through the operation of a law? It signified not a rush what the article was, or whether it was one of luxury or not. It was a bad and unjust principle as between English workers. The true principle was to give to the purchaser perfectly free and unrestricted choice of all articles of industry. But by differential duties to secure a particular price to a particular class of goods as compared with another class of goods, because they were articles of luxury, they generally failed to accomplish the object they had in view, did positive mischief to the very people they intended to benefit, and did that which was in itself wrong, because they created a monopoly in favour of a particular class. But the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets said that we ought to consider the case of handicrafts and of needlewomen. Now, to talk of protection to needlewomen by protective duties was just as rational as to talk of protecting the peasants of Wiltshire and Dorsetshire by the corn laws. The condition of our needlewomen was a melancholy fact in the state of English society; but with respect to competition with foreign labour they had nothing to fear, for, unhappily, their condition was much lower already than that of the foreign labourer through the competition of English labour. He confessed that he would have thought that the hon. Gentleman who represented the Tower Hamlets was well aware by this time of that fact. He must know they were entirely beyond the reach of any legislation. With regard, however, to the class of people who made artificial flowers and embroidery, he hoped the case was different. The wages of those employed in embroidery were not, he trusted, low, and he had no reason to suppose that they would be lower:—he believed that, on the other hand, labour would derive benefit from the proposed changes. The hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets said that the abolition of protection worked in a totally different direction in different cases. He (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) was not aware of that diversity of experience, and he had yet to learn in what case within the limits of this country protection had been abolished without a great benefit resulting. They had had paraded before the House the question of corks; and if hon. Gentlemen now revived it, he would undertake to show that it was the most wretched case which had ever been brought upon the floor of the House. And with regard to the nine other articles, not a single voice had reached him either from masters or workmen against the proposed abolition of duties. He might remind the Committee that, besides all the general principles which led them to the conclusion at which they had arrived, they had in view a great reform of the Customs administration, and a great reduction of establishments. Even where it appeared, on first inspection of the tables of revenue, that £10,000 or £20,000 was realized by one of these articles, that did not show the real profit which it yielded. They were all articles of a nature to require very minute investigation, which entailed a great deal of delay and expense. For these reasons he hoped, and felt perfectly convinced, that these Votes would receive the approval of the Committee.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, the right hon. Gentleman had quite misunderstood his argument. He did not object to the repeal of these duties on the ground of their being differential duties, but because in the present state of the finances of the country he thought it a wanton waste of our resources to part with £40,000 of revenue derived in such a way.

MR. NEWDEGATE was glad that this discussion had called forth the speech of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) which did him much credit. The time was coming when the old Tory would join the Radical in demanding that taxation should be levied in the form most convenient to the people. The system now entered upon seemed to him justly comparable to the car of Juggernaut, so recklessly was the Chancellor of the Exchequer crushing the interests of the people of this country. The science of political economy was being fast degraded into a mere system. The Government refused to levy the revenue so as to accommodate the convenience and consult the interests of the people. They would not consider the circumstances of the time with which they had to deal, but showed a blind determination to lower and abolish import duties. He admired the course pursued in the United States on this subject. No aristocratic influence existed there, but taxation and the commercial system of America were adapted, as they ought to be, to the interests of the State. Why was not the same policy followed in England? The true representatives of the people would, he believed in time, revert to a system of taxation which consulted the interests and convenience of the people, and would not consent to be limited to the doctrines of any abstract school or to be made subservient to the demands of a few large interests.

COLONEL TORRENS wished to ask, on behalf of the needle-women of England, whether the duties on French embroidery were to be remitted immediately, or whether some time was to be allowed to those engaged in that branch of industry at home.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said the proposition of the Government was that the abolition of the duties should take effect immediately, and he was not aware that any injury would be suffered by the class the hon. Member alluded to.

“Feathers and Flowers, Artificial.”

SIR WILLIAM JOLLIFFE said, he thought this was one of the articles which might be omitted while such extraordinary demands were made from day to day on our revenue. The arguments of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in favour of free trade were all, no doubt, very good, but let them be properly applied. What was the use of remitting duties on artificial flowers and opera-glasses, things of no moment to the public, while they maintained the war duties on tea and sugar which were of the greatest moment to the whole community.

LORD JOHN MANNERS understood the Chancellor of the Exchequer to contend that these duties were objectionable because they took out of the pockets of the people more than the amount of revenue obtained from them. But did anybody suppose that when this duty was abolished artificial flowers would be one halfpenny cheaper than before? The sole result would be a loss of revenue, which was not just now to be despised, while some of the charges substituted by the right hon. Gentleman would be far more onerous upon trade. He could not help uttering a strong, though, he feared, a vain protest against this most improvident waste of the resources of the country.

MR. STEUART said, his constituents had sent up the longest petition that ever came from Cambridge against this Budget, and, in justice to them, he must add his protest to those which had already been made against this wanton sacrifice of revenue. His constituents had no connection with cotton, coal, or iron; and there was no single article in the tariff that would benefit them; while they were to be saddled with an addition to the income tax, against which, in their name, he must add his firm but he feared his ineffectual protest.

MR. CRAWFORD could not admit that taking off the duty would have no beneficial effect besides reducing the price to the consumer. He thought on the contrary that great benefit would result from the importation of articles upon which French skill and taste were displayed. They would serve as models for the guidance of our own workmen and manufacturers, and ultimately it would be an advantage to these persons to have been subjected to French competition, for he had great faith in their power to rival any French productions.

LORD JOHN MANNERS observed that plenty of articles came into this country already to serve as models for imitation.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER asked who was to define what was meant by “plenty.” Was the law to step in to define and limit the meaning of the word by fixing an artificial price. His proposition was to leave the people to define it for themselves by leaving it to the natural level of supply and demand.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, his proposition was that there were “plenty” for the English workpeople to take example from, and he still adhered to his statement.

MR. AYRTON said, it might be very convenient for the merchants of London to import as many commodities as they could; but as regarded the needlewomen of this country, of whom the supply was already greater than the demand, it was clear that they had arrived at the lowest natural level. There might, however, be a still lower level, for in India, where people lived for almost nothing, women skilled in embroidery could be found for £4 a year. Upon abstract principles of free trade no doubt the Chancellor of the Exchequer was right, but this was a peculiar case, and should be considered as such.

MR. VANSITTART complained that all their efforts were directed to the protection of foreigners, while they cared nothing for their own workpeople. A gentleman told him that he went over to Paris the other day with £700 in his pocket, but articles were so dear that he could not lay out a single shilling. There was no lack of employment in France, but they were to be still more encouraged here; while the Legislature did not care a single brass farthing for the English workers.

“Gutta Percha,” Manufactures of, not moulded.

Articles, moulded.

LORD WILLIAM GRAHAM asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, now that the Customs superintendence was to be removed, there would be any inspection of things imported into this country; for, if he was rightly informed, things had been imported into this country which would greatly shock the modesty of the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, there would be ample power left in the hands of the Customs to prevent the importation of articles such as those to which, no doubt, the noble Lord had alluded.

“Linen, or Linen and Cotton Manufactures, as denominated in the Tariff.”

COLONEL TORRENS inquired, whether there was any prospect of linen yarns being admitted into France at a lower rate than 20 or 25 per cent. He was assured that it was impossible to export that article from Ireland to France except at a much lower rate of duty?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that in 1842, when there was a considerable trade with France in linen yarns, the duties were from 15 to 20 per cent; but there was no specific convention now upon that point. He understood the intention to be to follow the course which had been pursued in England, and to place the duties upon half-manufactured goods in a subordinate relation to fully manufactured goods. He therefore inferred that, as the duty upon linens would be reduced to a limit between 25 and 30 per cent, the duty upon linen yarns would be still lower, were it only for the sake of the French manufacturer.

“Opera Glasses, single or double.”

MR. VANSITTART asked, whether it was intended to admit, under the Treaty, Berlin opera glasses, which were much superior to the French?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the Vote which the Committee were invited to concur in, took no cognizance of origin.

Resolved, That the following articles stand part of the proposed Resolution [28th February.]

Cotton Manufactures, as denominated in the Tariff.

Earthenware, not otherwise enumerated or described.

Embroidery and Needlework, as denominated in the Tariff.

Feathers, as denominated in the Tariff.

Flowers, artificial.

Fruit, raw, not otherwise enumerated.

Grapes.

Gutta Percha, manufactures of, not moulded.

— articles moulded.

Hair, manufactures of Hair or Goat's Wool, or of Hair or Goat's Wool and any other material, wholly or in part made up.

Hats or Bonnets, namely,—of Chip, of Bast, Cane, or Horsehair, of Straw—after the 31st of March, 1861.

Lord William Graham

Of Hair, Wool, or Beaver.

Of Felt.

Hats of Silk or Silk Shag, laid upon felt, linen, or other material.

Iron and Steel, wrought or manufactured, namely,—machinery, wrought castings, tools, cutlery, and other manufactures of Iron or Steel not enumerated.

— fancy ornamental articles of Iron or Steel.

— manufactures of, coated with brass or copper by any galvanic process.

Jewels. Emeralds, and other precious stones, set.

Lace and articles thereof, as denominated in the Tariff.

Lead, manufactures of, not otherwise enumerated.

Leather Manufactures (except gloves), as denominated in the Tariff.

— Gloves, after the 1st of February, 1861.

Linen, or Linen and Cotton manufactures, as denominated in the Tariff.

Lucifers of Wood.

— of Wax.

Medlars.

Morphia and its Salts.

Musical Instruments, as denominated in the Tariff.

Oil of Almonds.

— Bays.

— chemical, essential, or perfumed, as denominated in the Tariff.

Opera Glasses, single or double.

Pears, raw.

Percussion Caps.

Perfumery, not otherwise enumerated.

Quinices.

Quinine, Sulphate of.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That ‘Silk, Millinery, or Manufactures of Silk, or of Silk and any other material, as denominated in the Tariff, stand part of the proposed Resolution.’”

SIR JOSEPH PAXTON in rising to move the Amendment, of which he had given notice, and which he had modified in order to remove certain doubts that had been expressed, said that his constituents were of opinion that the duties upon silk manufactures had been given up in order to carry out the Treaty, and the interests involved were so large that he trusted the Committee would give him their attention for a little while, while he brought their arguments before them as clearly as he was able. He believed that there were about thirty towns and villages employed in the manufacture of silk, but Coventry, Macclesfield, Derby, Spitalfields, and Manchester, were the chief seats of the manufacture. From all these places he believed, except Manchester, there had been petitions to that House against the present proposition; but from Manchester alone his hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham had presented a petition for the remission of the duty.

Now, on looking over the duties on silk he found that none had been levied on the particular articles of silk manufacture that were produced at Manchester, and therefore it could be understood why the manufacturers at that place could afford to support the proposition of the Government. Last year the duty on silk amounted to £387,000, and £166,000 of this was levied on articles similar to those manufactured by his constituents at Coventry, and therefore he thought they had a right to be heard on this question. The silk manufacturers at Coventry had been for some time in a depressed condition, and when the intelligence of the conclusion of the Treaty arrived, the effect was completely to paralyze the trade. As soon as the announcement was made the Mayor of Coventry and a deputation of the inhabitants waited on him and his Colleague, and the Mayor said that he could hardly be answerable for the safety of his city if the duty were taken off. He did not altogether concur in the dismal forebodings of the Mayor; but still the change would undoubtedly strike a great blow at the prosperity of the town he represented, and that blow was the more felt, that it was believed that the object of the remission of the duty was not to render silk cheaper, but to give an impetus to the French manufacture. Nor must the Committee suppose that Coventry was a place which had not progressed with the times. In 1821 the population of Coventry was 21,000; in 1859 it was 42,000. In 1840 there were in it 18,000 persons employed in the silk trade; in 1860, there were 28,000. In 1840, there were 4,732 small hand-loom; at the present time there were only 500; but of steam-power looms there were 6,650; and while in the former year the production of silk ribbons was 795,000 yards per week, it was now no less than 2,300,000 yards per week. The tax on silk had never been considered a burdensome one, but to be in fact a tax upon luxury; and even the Liverpool Financial Reform Association, in whose steps the Chancellor of the Exchequer seemed to be treading, had declared that so long as customs duties were levied at all the duty on silk ought to be retained. The tax was 15 per cent. He complained that while the Chancellor of the Exchequer had sought to conciliate the wine and spirit merchants in the matter of drawback, not the smallest accommodation had been given to his constituents. At present their trade was protected by a duty of about 16 per cent; and if 8 per cent of that duty had been remitted now, and the remaining 8 per cent some seven or eight years hence, they might have been able to sustain the shock; but what they most complained of was, that they had been bartered away for a French Treaty, without the prospect of receiving any compensation whatever. He himself was a Free-trader, as were also his constituents; and they were prepared to give up the silk duty if an arrangement could be made by which their productions could be admitted into France upon the same terms as those of France would be admitted into this country. But the fact was, the French prohibited the export of dyed silks, and the people of Coventry were thus prevented from competing with them in the finer articles, which were principally made of French dyed silk. A great deal had been said the other night about corks, but this was exactly the same case. They were about to admit the manufactures of a country which kept a duty on the raw material. In fact this was, he believed, the first time such a proposition had ever been maintained. In 1845, Sir Robert Peel took off the duty on glass in order to give an advantage to the consumers of the article in this country; but France and Belgium made the better kinds of glass at that time, and continue to do so still. He had a letter from Mr. Chance, one of the largest manufacturers in Birmingham, in which that gentleman complained of the severity of the competition he had to sustain, and said:—

“Many houses have sunk under it, and so should we have done if we had not taken every means to beat the foreign manufacturers.”

It was quite true that Mr. Chance's firm had succeeded, but he had one of the largest establishments in the world; and where there were formerly in this country twenty or twenty-five large glassworks, there were not now more than four or five. The silk trade, and that of Coventry in particular, had much reason to complain that their interests had been overlooked in the negotiation of the Treaty. The Chamber of Commerce of St. Etienne had recently voted an address to the Emperor, in which, while expressing their satisfaction at the prospect of ribands, one of their staple trades, being admitted into England free of duty, remarked that they could see no objection to the free importation of ribands into France. From that it might be reasonably inferred that, if the treaty had been skilfully negotiated on our side, there might have been an importation of ribands into France on equal terms with an importation of those of France into this country. The riband trade depended much on fashion, in which we invariably took our cue from the French. In this country we could make all the commoner sorts of ribands better than the French, and it was desirable that no obstacles should be placed in the way of their admission into that country. His constituents, however, believed that the Treaty would tend so seriously to prejudice their trade that they despaired of arresting its declension. He would conclude by moving the following Amendment:—

Amendment proposed,

To insert after the word "Tariff," the words "being the manufactures of and imported directly from any country which permits the free importation of the silk manufactures of the United Kingdom."

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted:—"

THE CHAIRMAN said, the hon. Member had not moved his Amendment in precisely the terms of his notice; but though he had now omitted all specific notice of the Treaty which the Committee were not considering, the Motion had clearly a substantial reference to the engagements of that Treaty. It did not, therefore, appear to him to be one that he could fitly report to the House, and he should therefore decline to accept it.

MR. AYRTON suggested that the difficulty might be got over by moving the following addition to the original Motion in lieu of the Amendment, "being manufactures of, or imported directly from, any country which permits the free importation of the silk manufactures of the United Kingdom."

SIR JOSEPH PAXTON accepted this suggestion.

MR. NEWDEGATE wished to know if the Resolution as now put was in order?

THE CHAIRMAN: Yes, certainly.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not give way to the Motion before the Committee. The constituents of the hon. Member were great Free-traders some fourteen or fifteen years ago; but now, when the course of legislation trenched upon their own interests, they appealed to the House for that consideration which was then refused to others. He (Mr. Sclater-Booth), as an humble Member of the Conservative party, thanked the Chancellor of the Exchequer for sweeping away those remnants of protection which had deformed our commercial system for so many years. They had long been led to expect that justice would be done to the agricultural interest; and he agreed with an observation that fell from the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade the other night, when he said, so far as abstract principle was concerned, the Conservatives, and those who supported the agricultural interest, ought to be among the first to support the proposition of the Government in that respect. As an abstract proposition, they should be very happy to further the introduction of free-trade principles in the tariff. The remission of the silk duties was one of the most important of the propositions of the present scheme. It was one from which many people expected to derive considerable advantages, and he hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not give way upon it.

Sir J. Paxton

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that he presumed that the hon. Gentleman, who had just addressed the House, had spoken as a Conservative. Now he (Mr. Newdegate) was an older Conservative than that hon. Gentleman, and he might, therefore, be forgiven, when he observed, that if the hon. Member wished to stand well as a Conservative, he should not promote internecine warfare between the various interests of the country. He (Mr. Newdegate) had made considerable sacrifices to a sense of duty as a Conservative. He had separated himself from old friends, and cast aside the countenance of an eminent statesman; but he had acted in no narrow spirit, but from a conviction that he was serving national interests. It was because he believed it unwise that this country should be made to depend upon foreigners for food that he had adhered to Protectionist opinions in 1846: whether he had been mistaken in his views or not, he had, at all events, not acted from factious motives; he deprecated the idea of a representative of the agricultural interest now turning round upon other interests in a revengeful spirit, and saying, you deprived us of protection, you exposed us wilfully to jeopardy, and, although we have been preserved through an instrumentality beyond human control, by the discovery of gold—though we do not suffer as we did in 1850, we, in our turn, will injure you, the manufacturers of England, in any manner which we can. That was not true Conservatism—if it was, Conservatism was an empty word. He represented a mixed constituency, of which some 50,000 or 60,000 were engaged in silk manufactures, and he believed that they were fully entitled to the protection that had been reserved to them by Pitt, by Huskisson, and, up to the present time, by the measures of the late Sir Robert Peel. Sir Robert Peel, when revising the tariff on free-trade principles, continued a duty of from 10 to 15 per cent on silk, on account of the special disadvantages under which the English silk trade laboured, owing to the fact that this country could not produce the raw material. France produced the finest silk, and was close to Italy, with which country France was drawing her relations closer; and Italy produced a quality of silk superior to China, India, Turkey, or any other quarter of the world. Mr. Huskisson, who was thought to be a Free-trader, considered there were special difficulties to which the silk trade here was exposed from inferiority of climate and water, which prevented our dyeing with the finest tints. Mr. Pitt's Treaty contained a prohibition of the importation of silk manufactures. Was he who negotiated the Treaty of equivalents in 1786—a treaty of which the present was pretended to be an imitation—an unwise statesman? Mr. Huskisson, like the Emperor, thought a duty of 30 per cent would suffice upon the import of the manufactured articles; but Mr. Huskisson took the duty off raw silk as a compensation for the effect of the abandonment of prohibition, and the chance to a protective duty even of 30 per cent. Sir Robert Peel took steps to put down smuggling, and thus, although he reduced the duty to 15 and 10 per cent, he rendered it valid. Each of these statesmen thought that some amount of protection was necessary to counterbalance the natural advantages of France in respect to silk. Sir Robert Peel was a Free-trader, but with him it was a science and not a system; he thought that the English silk manufactures required protection, and that he, as a Financier, should be the better for a revenue of some £300,000 a year—a revenue raised easily. The late Sir Robert Peel did not, like the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, complain of an ignorant patience of taxation, but feared rather impatience of taxation. He could promise the right hon. Gentleman that there would be impatience enough presently. Was it a matter of no moment to plunge 200,000 of the population into a state of distress and destitution? The right hon. Gentleman said, he could not remember any step in the progress of free trade which had produced suffering. He (Mr. Newdegate) held in his hand an account of the distress produced in the silk trade by the change made by Mr. Huskisson; from the evidence of Mr. Grout before the Committee of 1832, it appeared that before that change in 1826 the people engaged in the trade were prosperous and happy, but afterwards, in 1832, their condition had miserably deteriorated. Mr. Brocklehurst also stated, before the same Committee of that House, that in 1826 the workmen engaged in the silk trade lived in comfortably furnished houses, but that after Mr. Huskisson's change distress set in, and they were obliged to part with all their little property and were reduced to such destitution that hundreds were almost without clothing or bed. The evidence of this witness contained this remarkable expression—"They are a miserable and ragged people." He himself could remember the distressing effect of the change in the silk duties, made in 1846 by the late Sir Robert Peel, in Coventry and Nuneaton, two-thirds of the population were for a long period out of work. Yet the Chancellor of the Exchequer had been pleased to say that in no instance had free-trade measures produced distress. The silk manufacturers and the operatives whom they employed felt keenly that the injury to which they were about to be exposed did not result from the free deliberations of the representatives of the people; they openly and reasonably expressed their conviction that the House of Commons was not acting freely on their own sense of what English interests required, but that they were contending with two Governments—the Minister of the British Crown and the Government of France—that the House of Commons were in danger of succumbing to, the influence of two Crowns; they hoped that the House would vindicate its independent sense of duty in their favour; and they knew that, even after the first pressure of this Treaty was passed, the great bulk of the articles they produced could not compete with their rivals in France under a duty of 30 per cent. It was unfair at the outset, that under the Treaty the duties on the importation of silk goods from France were to be remitted immediately, while any advantage which the people of Coventry might obtain, chimerical as this was, the change in the French tariff would be delayed till 1861. The hon. Member for Coventry had told them that the silk trade was a progressive trade. Certainly, he did not represent an idle people. They did not impugn the reduction of duty made by Sir Robert Peel; but it was wise only because it was accompanied with corresponding advantages. If they compared the imports and exports of the three years 1844-5-6 with the imports of the three years 1856-7-8, they would find that the import of French goods had trebled, while the export on English silk fabrics had doubled. It had been said that it was beneficial to reduce import duties. Under the legislation of Sir Robert Peel, the imports of these articles had trebled while the exports of this country had doubled. The Government could not deny this fact, nor could they justify their disturbance of an arrangement so obviously beneficial both to the consumers and the producers of this country. Granting that it was worth while to conciliate the goodwill of France, how could they justify the retention of all prohibitions against the introduction of mixed goods into France for the first eighteen months, when the heaviest pressure would fall upon our people, the free imports commencing in the spring, and thus giving the foreigner the command of our domestic markets?—it was a fact which he regretted, that, owing to the weakness of the ladies of England, the manufacturers and milliners of France set the fashions for England. Hon. Members might think that a foolish fact, and beneath their consideration, but it was a fact which vitally affected large portions of the English silk trade. Had the Governments of England and France become joint, that we were about to concede such unfair advantages to that country? It was proposed the arbitrary decrees of that Power should destroy the welfare of his constituents? [Hear, hear!] He was not ashamed of expressing these sentiments. He was addressing a constituent assembly, of which he was a humble Member; some might be, but he was not, too proud to perform the duties of a representative. He spoke, not as Mr. Newdegate, but as one of the Members for North Warwickshire. If the Government did not require the assent of Parliament to this Treaty—if it was a transaction entirely within the prerogative of the Crown—why did they insult the representatives of the people by asking them to consider provisions which they had no power to alter or to reject? If England was about to carry out free trade with France, then should France likewise adopt free trade in favour of England, and the action of the two Governments ought to be simultaneous. It was the duty of the House to insist on fair play for the labour of this country, and if there were any English spirit left in the House of Commons they would demand reciprocity. He appealed to the hon. Member for Birmingham, who claimed to be a friend of the working classes, to protect the interests of those classes by insisting on the adoption of free trade by France, if England was to carry out that system under a treaty with that Power. The hon. Member had said, at a meeting a few days ago at Manchester, which he most erroneously implied was unanimous in their approbation of this Treaty, "As regards silk and other articles, I won't go into those questions. We do not want convincing on all these points. We are agreed, that if we cannot manufacture without protective duties we had better shut up." [Hear, hear!] He (Mr. Newdegate) was not surprised at that cheer, as emanating from certain hon. Members; he knew their blind devotion to what they called free trade; but he would ask if such was their devotion to free trade, why did they not insist upon a free trade on the part of France? How could they reconcile with their system of free imports the retention of prohibition by France for 18 months, and then the imposition of protective duties of 30 and 25 per cent? All the present Motion asked was, that there should be a change in France simultaneous and similar to that in England. Perhaps hon. Members might be afraid of interrupting the friendly relations which, it was said, existed between the Emperor of the French and Mr. Cobden, their negotiator. Mr. Cobden had written about the affairs of Russia and Turkey? And in a pamphlet he published in 1836 on that subject, the hon. Member showed his democratic devotion to despotism, by expressing his opinion that the encroachments of Russia by no means affected the interests of England so vitally as some writers imagined. So enamoured was the hon. Member with the despotism of Russia, that he would have ceded Turkey at once to her possession. Mr. Cobden further said, that he claimed for the Manchester manufacturers the right of putting this matter entirely on a footing of self-interest; that he did not for a moment imagine that they were called which some 50,000 or 60,000 were engaged in silk manufactures, and he believed that they were fully entitled to the protection that had been reserved to them by Pitt, by Huskisson, and, up to the present time, by the measures of the late Sir Robert Peel. Sir Robert Peel, when revising the tariff on free-trade principles, continued a duty of from 10 to 15 per cent on silk, on account of the special disadvantages under which the English silk trade laboured, owing to the fact that this country could not produce the raw material. France produced the finest silk, and was close to Italy, with which country France was drawing her relations closer; and Italy produced a quality of silk superior to China, India, Turkey, or any other quarter of the world. Mr. Huskisson, who was thought to be a Free-trader, considered there were special difficulties to which the silk trade here was exposed from inferiority of climate and water, which prevented our dyeing with the finest tints. Mr. Pitt's Treaty contained a prohibition of the importation of silk manufactures. Was he who negotiated the Treaty of equivalents in 1786—a treaty of which the present was pretended to be an imitation—an unwise statesman? Mr. Huskisson, like the Emperor, thought a duty of 30 per cent would suffice upon the import of the manufactured articles; but Mr. Huskisson took the duty off raw silk as a compensation for the effect of the abandonment of prohibition, and the chance to a protective duty even of 30 per cent. Sir Robert Peel took steps to put down smuggling, and thus, although he reduced the duty to 15 and 10 per cent, he rendered it valid. Each of these statesmen thought that some amount of protection was necessary to counterbalance the natural advantages of France in respect to silk. Sir Robert Peel was a Free-trader, but with him it was a science and not a system; he thought that the English silk manufactures required protection, and that he, as a Financier, should be the better for a revenue of some £300,000 a year—a revenue raised easily. The late Sir Robert Peel did not, like the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, complain of an ignorant patience of taxation, but feared rather impatience of taxation. He could promise the right hon. Gentleman that there would be impatience enough presently. Was it a matter of no moment to plunge 200,000 of the population into a state of distress and destitution? The right hon. Gentleman said, he could not remember any step in the progress of free trade which had produced suffering. He (Mr. Newdegate) held in his hand an account of the distress produced in the silk trade by the change made by Mr. Huskisson; from the evidence of Mr. Grout before the Committee of 1832, it appeared that before that change in 1826 the people engaged in the trade were prosperous and happy, but afterwards, in 1832, their condition had miserably deteriorated. Mr. Brocklehurst also stated, before the same Committee of that House, that in 1826 the workmen engaged in the silk trade lived in comfortably furnished houses, but that after Mr. Huskisson's change distress set in, and they were obliged to part with all their little property and were reduced to such destitution that hundreds were almost without clothing or bed. The evidence of this witness contained this remarkable expression—"They are a miserable and ragged people." He himself could remember the distressing effect of the change in the silk duties, made in 1846 by the late Sir Robert Peel, in Coventry and Nuneaton, two-thirds of the population were for a long period out of work. Yet the Chancellor of the Exchequer had been pleased to say that in no instance had free-trade measures produced distress. The silk manufacturers and the operatives whom they employed felt keenly that the injury to which they were about to be exposed did not result from the free deliberations of the representatives of the people; they openly and reasonably expressed their conviction that the House of Commons was not acting freely on their own sense of what English interests required, but that they were contending with two Governments—the Minister of the British Crown and the Government of France—that the House of Commons were in danger of succumbing to, the influence of two Crowns; they hoped that the House would vindicate its independent sense of duty in their favour; and they knew that, even after the first pressure of this Treaty was passed, the great bulk of the articles they produced could not compete with their rivals in France under a duty of 30 per cent. It was unfair at the outset, that under the Treaty the duties on the importation of silk goods from France were to be remitted immediately, while any advantage which the people of Coventry might obtain, chimerical as this was, the change in the French tariff would be delayed till 1861. The hon. Member for Coventry had told them that the silk trade was a progressive trade. Certainly, he did not represent an idle people. They did not impugn the reduction of duty made by Sir Robert Peel; but it was wise only because it was accompanied with corresponding advantages. If they compared the imports and exports of the three years 1844-5-6 with the imports of the three years 1856-7-8, they would find that the import of French goods had trebled, while the export on English silk fabrics had doubled. It had been said that it was beneficial to reduce import duties. Under the legislation of Sir Robert Peel, the imports of these articles had trebled while the exports of this country had doubled. The Government could not deny this fact, nor could they justify their disturbance of an arrangement so obviously beneficial both to the consumers and the producers of this country. Granting that it was worth while to conciliate the goodwill of France, how could they justify the retention of all prohibitions against the introduction of mixed goods into France for the first eighteen months, when the heaviest pressure would fall upon our people, the free imports commencing in the spring, and thus giving the foreigner the command of our domestic markets?—it was a fact which he regretted, that, owing to the weakness of the ladies of England, the manufacturers and milliners of France set the fashions for England. Hon. Members might think that a foolish fact, and beneath their consideration, but it was a fact which vitally affected large portions of the English silk trade. Had the Governments of England and France become joint, that we were about to concede such unfair advantages to that country? It was proposed the arbitrary decrees of that Power should destroy the welfare of his constituents? [Hear, hear!] He was not ashamed of expressing these sentiments. He was addressing a constituent assembly, of which he was a humble Member; some might be, but he was not, too proud to perform the duties of a representative. He spoke, not as Mr. Newdegate, but as one of the Members for North Warwickshire. If the Government did not require the assent of Parliament to this Treaty—if it was a transaction entirely within the prerogative of the Crown—why did they insult the representatives of the people by asking them to consider provisions which they had no power to alter or reject? If England was about to carry out free trade with France, then should France likewise adopt free trade in favour of England, and the action of the two Governments ought to be simultaneous. It was the duty of the House to insist on fair play for the labour of this country, and if there were any English spirit left in the House of Commons they would demand reciprocity. He appealed to the hon. Member for Birmingham, who claimed to be a friend of the working classes, to protect the interests of those classes by insisting on the adoption of free trade by France, if England was to carry out that system under a treaty with that Power. The hon. Member had said, at a meeting a few days ago at Manchester, which he most erroneously implied was unanimous in their approbation of this Treaty, "As regards silk and other articles, I won't go into those questions. We do not want convincing on all these points. We are agreed, that if we cannot manufacture without protective duties we had better shut up." [Hear, hear!] He (Mr. Newdegate) was not surprised at that cheer, as emanating from certain hon. Members; he knew their blind devotion to what they called free trade; but he would ask if such was their devotion to free trade, why did they not insist upon a free trade on the part of France? How could they reconcile with their system of free imports the retention of prohibition by France for 18 months, and then the imposition of protective duties of 30 and 25 per cent? All the present Motion asked was, that there should be a change in France simultaneous and similar to that in England. Perhaps hon. Members might be afraid of interrupting the friendly relations which, it was said, existed between the Emperor of the French and Mr. Cobden, their negotiator. Mr. Cobden had written about the affairs of Russia and Turkey? And in a pamphlet he published in 1836 on that subject, the hon. Member showed his democratic devotion to despotism, by expressing his opinion that the encroachments of Russia by no means affected the interests of England so vitally as some writers imagined. So enamoured was the hon. Member with the despotism of Russia, that he would have ceded Turkey at once to her possession. Mr. Cobden further said, that he claimed for the Manchester manufacturers the right of putting this matter entirely on a footing of self-interest; that he did not for a moment imagine that they were called upon to preserve the peace and good order of the world. That Constantinople would be a better customer to them if held by Russia. He commended the Government of Russia, because wealthy merchants were exempted from corporal punishment in that country, to which the less wealthy were liable. Mr. Cobden seemed about as consistent in his attachment to personal freedom as this Treaty was with the system of free trade. The hon. Gentleman was well spoken of at Manchester; but curious reports were current there respecting him. It was said that so complete was the admiration felt by the hon. Member (Mr. Cobden), that advocate of democratic doctrines—so entirely was he épris with the Emperor of the French and his system—that he had declared—notwithstanding the restrictions upon the liberty of the French press, and notwithstanding the fact that the Chambers were what he (Mr. Newdegate) was afraid that House was becoming, mere registration offices for the decrees of the Emperor of the French—that he (Mr. Cobden) could not discover what the people of France had to complain of. Such were the reports, current in Manchester respecting Mr. Cobden, where, if anywhere, that hon. Member was well spoken of. He asked the Government to justify this—that at the commencement of the year, when the fashions were coming in, France should have the sanction of the Government of England for retaining prohibition against the admission into France of the great bulk of English silk goods, while we were to open the ports of this country to the imports of France immediately we were to sanction for eighteen months the retention by France of prohibition against the great body of our goods, and after that the levy by France of double the duty that we were about to abandon, and then a duty of 25 per cent for the remainder of the ten years. This was simply offering up the interests of his (Mr. Newdegate's) constituents as a holocaust to foreign political arrangements. He would remind the hon. Member for Birmingham, that, in reply to a communication from certain working men, he had used strong language with regard to the effects which “the miserable complications of foreign affairs” exercise upon the condition of the industrious classes in this country; and that in his letter of last year to the delegates of the trade of Glasgow, he had stated, that if he were a younger man and in their position he would emigrate either to the United States or to some of the British colonies, and recommended them to do so. He would ask the hon. Member for Birmingham whether this Treaty did not promise to afford a severe instance of the misery of being mixed up with foreign complications? He would ask the House of Commons whether they would sanction the shutting up of the silk-trade mills as recommended by the hon. Member for Birmingham? and whether the House intended by their conduct to enforce the hon. Member's recommendation, that the working men of this country should be forced to emigrate? This showed how arbitrary might become a system which considered only the consumer, but would be bitter in its effects on interests which had been cared for by statesmen whose policy the Chancellor of the Exchequer pretended to imitate. The legislation of that House would be harsh, if, yielding to the influence of two Governments, they failed to grant to the silk trade that substantial justice which could only be afforded by a fair system of exchange.

Mr. Newdegate

Newdegate

Mr. TURNER observed, that the hon. Member for Coventry (Sir Joseph Paxton) had stated that all the silk trade were unanimous against that part of the Treaty which related to silk, with one exception—Manchester. He (Mr. Turner) was proud to say it was so. It might be said that this Treaty or Budget was such a Manchester treaty or budget that the people of Manchester were bound to support it in all its particulars. He was glad to say that the Manchester Chamber of Commerce had expressed a unanimous opinion in favour of this Budget. He held in his hand a memorial on the same subject, dated November, 1852, which had been presented to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire from the silk trade of Manchester. The memorial set forth that their trade was in a depressed condition, that the workpeople were not fully employed, and that that branch of manufacture was almost stationary. They went on to say that was owing chiefly to the limited nature of the foreign demand for their goods, and they were of opinion that was attributable to the high protective duty, the effect of which was to create an impression that England is unable to compete with continental silk manufacturers, and thus to throw the trade almost entirely into the hands of the French and Swiss. Now he (Mr. Turner) was of opinion that if the Manchester manufacturers either of silk, cotton, or any other branch could not maintain their position against competition with foreign nations, it was time for them to turn their attention to some other branch of business; and he firmly believed that instead of their being injured by competition, they would be stimulated, as they had always been by competition, to renew exertions in trade.

SIR EDWARD GROGAN, as a representative of a city which still carried on a rather extensive trade in silk, would give his support to the Motion of the hon. Member for Coventry. Without entering into the Treaty, he did say that when he remembered the success which attended the representations made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the French Government in respect of the injury that would be inflicted on the spirit trade by the proposition of the French Government, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would be induced to bring the claims of the silk trade also under the consideration of the French Government, in order to obtain some modification. One peculiar branch of the silk trade in Dublin was poplin, the manufacture of which was tolerably extensive, and which was a very superior article, but was at present prohibited in France. He had received a communication from a large poplin manufacturer, stating that that branch carried on a considerable trade with Russia, Germany, and Prussia; that they would be able at a moderate duty to carry on a trade with France, but that the duty at present levied on its importation into France amounted to all but a prohibition.

MR. BRIGHT said, he would not long take up the time of the House. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) laid very heavy charges at their door—he said that they had no principle of justice and no feeling of benevolence towards a portion of the people. That, indeed, was the very least of what he said during a long speech. Another delusion also appeared to occupy his mind, that he (Mr. Bright) and others could influence the Legislature of France. Well, he must say he found it quite hard enough to do his duty towards his constituents in his own country without any reference to France. As for the Amendment before the Committee, its effect, to put it in brief terms, was that we were not to take anything free from France or from any other country, unless France or that other try took something or everything from us. Suppose we were to apply that principle to corn, what then? As regarded France, now there was a sliding scale on the importation of corn. We have no sliding scale here, but if the hon. Gentleman carried his Resolution he would be quite in order, and it would be a consistent proposition to propose another Resolution that we should take no more cattle or corn from France unless France consented to have corn and cattle from us. He believed the people of Coventry were labouring under a great delusion in thinking that (to use a favourite Protectionist term) they should be "inundated" with French silks; nor could he see why the French people might not suffer themselves to be led away by a similar fallacy that they would be inundated with the silks of Coventry. He could not see how the same articles could be exported from France to England and from England to France at the same time, and leave a profit to the manufacturers in both countries. What were the facts of the silk manufacture for which the hon. Member for Coventry was so alarmed? The English manufacturers bought their raw silk as cheaply as the French manufacturers bought theirs, for France could not grow all the silk it required, but imported it from China and Italy. Well, in what other element of cost was there such a difference? It could not be said we were not superior to France in respect of machinery. A phantom haunted many of late regarding the sending of our coals to France. Well, at any rate, we had our coals for our manufacturers on the spot, and so considerably cheaper. In cotton and in all other manufactures the machinery producing power was cheaper here than in any other country. Another element in the cost of production was the wages of labour; but here too any one conversant with the condition of France of late years must know that the wages of labour there, as well as here, were on the increase. As to the respective abilities of the French and English workmen, he had never spoken to any gentleman able to form a judgment on the subject who was not of opinion that an English workman in any department of mere labour—not design—was superior to a French workman. As to design and skill, there was no appreciable difference between the two countries. There were many trades in this country which were furnished with French designs by Frenchmen residing in England; and indeed a man might easily bring from France the best and newest designs, were he so inclined, at little or no cost of carriage, in his carpet-bag or portmanteau. His hon. Friend the Member for Coventry spoke of the increase in prosperity and population of Coventry during late years. Well, but did not this show the great enterprise, industry, skill, and capital of her manufacturers, and their vast command of machinery power—all tending to establish what no one could doubt—their complete success? He ventured to say that if his hon. Friend came here in ten years to come, as he (Mr. Bright) hoped his hon. Friend would, he would admit that the progress of the trade in Coventry was even greater in the interval. Protection not only made arts and manufactures wither and decay, but it also seemed to enfeeble the mind and reasoning powers of those who were subject to its influence. In its advocates there was an utter want of logic, an absence of faith, and a giving way to terror, of which even children ought to be ashamed. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had challenged any Member to point out a single class of operatives or capitalists which had been deteriorated during the last ten years by the changes which had taken place in our legislation; and, indeed, it must be admitted that the few who still upheld such principles practically every day of their lives condemned them. He was glad to hear a Member for an agricultural county (Mr. Selater-Booth) say, that after the principles of free trade had been applied to agriculture, it was fair they should be applied to manufactures. He (Mr. Bright) thought the argument irresistible. They had applied the principles of free trade to agriculture, against the strong opinions of the agricultural class. They, the agricultural class, were mistaken, and so were many of the manufacturing class now. Events had shown how false the prediction of the working of those principles had been in the case of the land, and that they had been not pernicious, but eminently beneficial. Therefore he hoped the right hon. Member for Coventry would take courage, and when he went down to his constituency, tell them that he had great reason to think those dangers had been much over-stated, and he trusted that in future meetings, his hon. Friend would have the satisfaction of telling them that though he had made this final and hopeless effort on their behalf, he must then congratulate them that he had failed, and that they had been compelled to enter on equal terms with their foreign competitors upon the field of enterprise opened to them by the proposal now laid before the House.

Mr. Turner

MR. AYRTON said, the hon. Member for Birmingham, with all his eloquence, and by all the numerous speeches he had made on Lancashire platforms and in that House, had never been able to persuade the working men of England to adopt the free-trade dogmas he had announced. He had never been able to persuade the people he was fond of calling the most enlightened in the world—the people of the United States—to accept them. The hon. Member must, therefore, excuse him if he pleaded the cause of a people as benighted as those of the United States or of France. The dogmas of free trade, as laid down by the hon. Member for Birmingham, had never been adopted by any people in the world. It deserved some consideration, whether this abstract theory was applicable to all conditions of men. They were told that every one who spoke against free trade gave himself up to an idle fallacy. The memorial from Manchester stated that the English silk manufacturers were not protected, and that French silks were found all over the world. Was that logic? According to the free-trade dogma the manufacture ought to flourish where there was no protection; and where prohibition existed, to go to the dogs. Yet, where prohibition existed it flourished and increased; in France it had increased three-fold in a comparatively short time, while here, with all our free-trade notions, it had scarcely progressed at all. There was not only no logic in the Manchester memorial, but absolute nonsense. He would ask whether the Free-traders were always as correct as they thought themselves? The hon. Member alluded to the importation of food. Here, by thinking their dogma must have an universal application, they were led into the most extraordinary contradictions. The soil of England could not produce enough food for the people; this fact at once placed it in a different position to other imports. Would the hon. Member say there were not weavers enough in the country to supply it with textile manufactures? There might be ploughmen enough, but there was not land enough to grow the food of the people. We had not in food the two things which were necessary to be combined to make unlimited production—the material to work upon and the labour to work with; and therefore the same principle was not appli-argued upon the broadest grounds in the course of the discussion, both by the hon. Member for North Warwickshire and the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets, who had taken the Committee back one or two generations into the past, and who had put forward views and opinions which, if they were good for anything, went to the very root of the course of legislation which we had been pursuing for the last eighteen years. It might indeed, after the speech which they had just heard, be very fairly said that the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets was a Protectionist—nay, something more than a Protectionist, for he seemed to be an advocate of the principle of setting up State warehouses such as those which he had pointed out were established in Lyons, in which by the providence of Government a supply of the raw material was provided for the manufacturer. The original tone of the debates on free trade had, in fact, been revived in the speech of the hon. Gentleman, by whom the hon. Member for Warwickshire, who had himself gone tolerably far in the direction of Protection, had been completely distanced. He was quite sure, if the mind of the hon. Member for Warwickshire was capable of admitting sentiments so ignoble as those of mortification at finding himself outdone in a career which he believed was especially his own, he must now be suffering tortures hardly to be described at seeing himself so completely distanced by the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets. The hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets had displayed qualities which would have been invaluable at an earlier day, but he was afraid that now they were completely thrown away, like flowers “wasting their sweetness on the desert air.” The hon. Member had caught, he would not say the slang, but the whole vocabulary which belonged to the days when the sanctuaries of protection were assailed by the profane hands of Mr. Huskisson. Free trade, he said, was all theory, and the views he advanced were those of a practical man; and then he talked of the heartlessness of the adherents of free trade. This was exactly the language used in the debates of 1825, when Mr. Huskisson, now pointed to with approval as a model wise legislator, was accused not only of being a hard-hearted metaphysician, but of having the sentiments of the devil in his breast. With the exception of the reference to that particular personage, the speech of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets quite came up to any of the denunciations previously pronounced. He drew a sad and deplorable picture of the sufferings of those whose labours had been displaced, but naturally forgot to inquire whether any labour had been displaced. The hon. Member spoke of the difficulties incidental to the trade, as if when protection existed in that branch of industry it was a Paradise, and every man was sure of a fair day's wages for a fair day's work. He seemed to think that the silk trade and protection had always existed together. But what was the truth of the matter? The silk manufacture took root in England centuries before the time of protection. It flourished in England in the 17th century, and it was only after it came to be protected, in 1697, that it began to droop, and to depend on legislative aid. Was there suffering then—no displaced labour? Had the hon. Member no compassion for the evil fortune which attended his favourite system? In 1765 “the weavers went down to the Houses of Parliament in a body, to make personal application to the Members, representing their wretched condition, and praying for total prohibition of foreign goods. Parliament reduced the duties on raw and thrown silk; dealers in foreign goods countermanded their orders, and the weavers were appeased.” In 1766 smuggling was carried on to a greater extent than ever, and 7,072 looms were out of employment—all this at a time when the system recommended by the hon. Gentleman was in the fullest vigour. In the same year the import and sale of foreign silks and velvets were totally prohibited, with the exception of those brought from India; but, in 1769, in that happy state of things when there ought to have been nothing but contentment and peace, the weavers formed combinations to compel their masters to raise their wages, committed various acts of violence on the property of their employers, destroyed their looms, &c., and in the riot several soldiers as well as weavers were killed.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

“Constant disputes still continuing between employers and employed, an Act was passed in 1773 which enabled the weavers of Middlesex to demand a fixed price for their labour, which price was to be fixed by the magistrates; masters and men were restricted from giving or receiving more or less than the fixed price; the manufacturers were liable to heavy penalties if they employed weavers out of the district; the weavers also were restricted, under heavy penalties, not to employ, at any one time, more apprentices than two. This law remained in force until 1824. In 1784 additional duties were imposed, and in 1786 the

pressly left them as their only remedy to adopt the suggestion of the cotton lords of Manchester, and change their occupation. The Manchester Gentlemen, who talked so loudly of the rights of the people, gave at once their willing assent to these propositions; but they would not give the people an hour to consider them, but consented at once to sacrifice their whole interests. The delegate from Manchester did not think of them. His only thought was for the goods of Lancashire, and their cotton rags and woollen cloths. The silk trade had a further peculiarity—that it had not the advantages of factory labour, like the cotton, flax, or woollen manufacturers, but must be carried on to a large extent by handlooms. He was told on the best authority that gentlemen who had erected machinery for the silk manufacture had given it up, because it would not answer for the better class of productions, and there was more loss than gain attendant upon it. He had, however, been assured by a gentleman who was conversant with the subject, and who had been in France, that the silk hand-loom weavers in that country could do quite as much as the hand-loom weavers here, and that at a rate of remuneration less by thirty per cent. When, therefore, the hon. Member for Birmingham talked of the superiority of the English to the French workman, his observations must not be supposed to apply to the silk manufacture, which was a trade indigenous to France; and that being so, the Government, he should contend, had entirely lost sight of the interests of our operatives who were engaged in that particular occupation when they had entered into the present Treaty. He was aware that some of those hon. Members whom he saw around him were such frantic Free-traders, that they were opposed to the slightest expression of opinion which was not in accordance with their own. He wished they would read a speech of Mr. Burke, in which, when abandoning to a certain extent the theoretical views of the Whig party, he pointed out to them the true distinction between political theories and practical statesmanship, and he called upon them to devote themselves to the practical good of their country. It was that practical good, as opposed to mere theory, which he sought to effect in the case of a poor branch of traders, who were not in a position to make their voice heard as the spirit-dealers were, and who were about to be subjected to great suffering by the enforcement of hasty and ill-considered legislation. If the manufacturers of silk were shut up to-morrow, the weavers of silk might go into Lancashire and compete with the weavers there, and whose interests, he should like to know, under those circumstances would be advanced? Viewing the case in the light in which he had endeavoured to put it before the Committee, he, for one, should give his cordial support to the Resolution of his hon. Friend the Member for Coventry.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he was anxious, before the Committee went to a division, to say a few words on the important subject under their consideration. It had been asserted that the present proposition had been recommended to the notice of the Committee under the pressure of two Governments—that the vote to which they were asked to come upon it was not to be taken on the merits of the case, but as the result of certain political engagements which had been entered into between England and France. Now, he wished in the most explicit manner to inform the Committee that that statement was one which was the reverse of the fact. The proposition to which he invited hon. Members to assent was made on its own merits—was recommended to them as being in harmony with the legislation of recent years, and calculated in itself to prove highly beneficial to the country. If, therefore, the proposal was one which in itself was good and sound, no sufficient reason, he should contend, for rejecting it was to be found in the circumstance that it was made through the medium of a treaty by means of which other benefits were sought to be attained. Now, the Motion before the Committee, he was prepared to admit, had been brought forward by the hon. Member for Coventry with great moderation, when the peculiarity of his position was taken into account; and he must be greatly astonished at some of the support he had received; but it was one to which, nevertheless, the Government did not deem it consistent with their duty to accede. The Committee was probably aware that as regarded the great article of ribands the duty levied in France was lower than that which we levied on French silks. It was a duty amounting to 7 per cent—or somewhat at the rate of 3s. per lb.—on the value of the goods; while the duty which we imposed, while nominally 15 per cent was in point of fact considerably more upon the silks which we imported. The whole question had, however, been argued upon the broadest grounds in the course of the discussion, both by the hon. Member for North Warwickshire and the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets, who had taken the Committee back one or two generations into the past, and who had put forward views and opinions which, if they were good for anything, went to the very root of the course of legislation which we had been pursuing for the last eighteen years. It might indeed, after the speech which they had just heard, be very fairly said that the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets was a Protectionist—nay, something more than a Protectionist, for he seemed to be an advocate of the principle of setting up State warehouses such as those which he had pointed out were established in Lyons, in which by the providence of Government a supply of the raw material was provided for the manufacturer. The original tone of the debates on free trade had, in fact, been revived in the speech of the hon. Gentleman, by whom the hon. Member for Warwickshire, who had himself gone tolerably far in the direction of Protection, had been completely distanced. He was quite sure, if the mind of the hon. Member for Warwickshire was capable of admitting sentiments so ignoble as those of mortification at finding himself outdone in a career which he believed was especially his own, he must now be suffering tortures hardly to be described at seeing himself so completely distanced by the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets. The hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets had displayed qualities which would have been invaluable at an earlier day, but he was afraid that now they were completely thrown away, like flowers “wasting their sweetness on the desert air.” The hon. Member had caught, he would not say the slang, but the whole vocabulary which belonged to the days when the sanctuaries of protection were assailed by the profane hands of Mr. Huskisson. Free trade, he said, was all theory, and the views he advanced were those of a practical man; and then he talked of the heartlessness of the adherents of free trade. This was exactly the language used in the debates of 1825, when Mr. Huskisson, now pointed to with approval as a model wise legislator, was accused not only of being a hard-hearted metaphysician, but of having the sentiments of the devil in his breast. With the exception of the reference to that particular personage, the speech of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets quite came up to any of the denunciations previously pronounced. He drew a sad and deplorable picture of the sufferings of those whose labours had been displaced, but naturally forgot to inquire whether any labour had been displaced. The hon. Member spoke of the difficulties incidental to the trade, as if when protection existed in that branch of industry it was a Paradise, and every man was sure of a fair day's wages for a fair day's work. He seemed to think that the silk trade and protection had always existed together. But what was the truth of the matter? The silk manufacture took root in England centuries before the time of protection. It flourished in England in the 17th century, and it was only after it came to be protected, in 1697, that it began to droop, and to depend on legislative aid. Was there suffering then—no displaced labour? Had the hon. Member no compassion for the evil fortune which attended his favourite system? In 1765 “the weavers went down to the Houses of Parliament in a body, to make personal application to the Members, representing their wretched condition, and praying for total prohibition of foreign goods. Parliament reduced the duties on raw and thrown silk; dealers in foreign goods countermanded their orders, and the weavers were appeased.” In 1766 smuggling was carried on to a greater extent than ever, and 7,072 looms were out of employment—all this at a time when the system recommended by the hon. Gentleman was in the fullest vigour. In the same year the import and sale of foreign silks and velvets were totally prohibited, with the exception of those brought from India; but, in 1769, in that happy state of things when there ought to have been nothing but contentment and peace, the weavers formed combinations to compel their masters to raise their wages, committed various acts of violence on the property of their employers, destroyed their looms, &c., and in the riot several soldiers as well as weavers were killed.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

“Constant disputes still continuing between employers and employed, an Act was passed in 1773 which enabled the weavers of Middlesex to demand a fixed price for their labour, which price was to be fixed by the magistrates; masters and men were restricted from giving or receiving more or less than the fixed price; the manufacturers were liable to heavy penalties if they employed weavers out of the district; the weavers also were restricted, under heavy penalties, not to employ, at any one time, more apprentices than two. This law remained in force until 1824. In 1784 additional duties were imposed, and in 1786 the silk trade was expressly excluded from a treaty with France. In 1793, 4,000 Spitalfield looms were quite idle, and at the end of the war the Spitalfield weavers were again involved in sufferings far more extensive and severe than at any former period, two-thirds being out of employment."

That was the system which prevailed when the principles of the hon. Member were in operation. After that there came a change, and the men who made it were exposed to the same charges of heartlessness as the hon. Gentleman thought himself entitled to pronounce on the vast majority of the House of Commons. He had described the effects of the system the hon. Member patronized; and he asked, had there been 7,000 or 8,000 looms out of work since that period? Had there been any soldiers or weavers killed in carrying out that blessed system of trade regulations he advocated? Look at the facts of the case. In 1820 our imports of raw silk amounted to some 2,000,000 lbs., in 1859 they amounted to 9,920,000 lbs. In 1820 the exports of British manufactured silk goods came to £371,000, in 1859 they had risen to nearly £2,500,000. And in the face of all that the hon. Member came down to the House and claimed for his statements and principles the name of facts, experience, prudence, and wisdom, and dared to charge the majority of the House not only with error, but with heartlessness forsooth! The hon. Gentleman in commencing his speech expressed a hope that the Committee would listen with patience to his remarks, and he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) was glad they had done so, for he believed it was the last dissertation of the kind they would ever have within the walls of the British Parliament. The last of those prohibitive duties was now about to disappear from the tariff, and the opportunity they had just enjoyed was a rare one, and he should have been sorry if any momentary impatience had deprived them of the practical lessons they had just learned. It was not because of the French Treaty that the present Vote should be adopted. It was not a small and insignificant Vote, as comparatively speaking many of the others were—it was a large Vote and a large measure, involving a considerable sacrifice of revenue, and affecting the interests of a great and extensive trade. If the Committee thought it a bad Vote on its merits, let them reject it; but let them remember that if they did they would repudiate all the principles on which they had been acting for the last twenty years, and the adoption of which, instead of displacing labour and bringing classes and individuals to distress, had multiplied the comforts of the working man, and increased not only his sense of self-respect, but his loyalty as a member of society and a subject of the Queen.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON wished to state that the vote he was prepared to give on this question did not rest on the ground of protection, and that he had no sympathy with the arguments or views of either the hon. Member for Coventry or the Tower Hamlets. Those two hon. Members gave their vote in support of the Budget of the Government, and now they found that the Budget pressed upon their own constituencies, they came forward and raised their voices in behalf of interests to which he thought they must feel themselves they had put it out of their power to render any real service. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had invited the Committee to discuss this Vote upon its merits, and he had therefore a right to consider whether there did not exist serious financial objections to the proposal of the Government. He must, however, take decided exception to the right hon. Gentleman's statement that they could not reject the proposal to repeal the silk duties without reversing the policy of the last 20 years. He thought they were perfectly entitled to pronounce their opinion whether, in the present state of our finances, they ought to repeal a duty which brought into the Exchequer not less than £300,000 a year without pressing on any interest in the country, and which was fairly derived from taxation upon the rich. He should, therefore, oppose the proposal simply on financial grounds, as most improvident under existing circumstances.

MR. BALL said, that this question was so important to the inhabitants of Spitalfields and Bethnal-green, that if the Committee had any bowels of compassion they must pause before they agreed in the Vote proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He (Mr. Ball) had listened to the debate till he was fatigued and had fallen asleep; and when he recovered from his repose he found one-half of the hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench asleep also; and he thought it was absolute folly to go into the consideration of so important a question at that hour. He moved that the Chairman report progress and ask leave to sit again. He was the more disposed to insist on this as the Chancellor of the Exchequer had stated it was the last time they would have the opportunity of discussing the subject, and if it was the last, for God's sake let them linger upon it a little longer before they decided upon delivering up the poor silk-weavers to the ruin the proposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer would bring upon them.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON hoped that, as the last speaker had refreshed himself, and was now, he trusted, in full possession of all his faculties, he would be able to state at any length he desired his opinions upon the Motion before the Committee. He further trusted that the question having then been fully discussed, the Committee would not separate without carrying it to a vote. He should oppose the Motion for reporting progress.

Motion made and Question put, "That the Chairman do report Progress."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 28; Noes 233: Majority 205.

MR. VANCE said, that many Gentlemen were anxious to deliver their sentiments on this subject, and, therefore, considering the late hour of the night, he should move that the Chairman do now leave the chair.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do now leave the Chair."

MR. CRAWFORD appealed to the hon. Gentleman to allow the question of the silk duties to be at once settled. Gentlemen in the silk trade had already been put to great inconvenience, and goods were accumulated at the Custom-house waiting the decision of Parliament. He held in his hand a memorial to that effect signed by a considerable number of the chief dealers in the City of London. If the Committee did not pass the Resolution that night it could not be reported until Monday, and the merchants would not be able to pass their goods through the Custom-house until Tuesday. This would cause great inconvenience to the trade.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER also pointed out the evil of protracting the stagnation which had already lasted for three weeks, and assured hon. Gentlemen who wished to pursue that discussion that they should have an opportunity of doing so to-morrow, on the bringing up of the Report.

MR. BALL said, he had made his Motion entirely upon the solicitation of the Spitalfield weavers and their employers, who had helped to return the hon. Member for the City (Mr. Crawford) to that House, and who apprehended perfect ruin from the measure which their representative now sought to press on.

Mr. Ball

MR. ELLICE (Coventry) said, he voted with the minority, as he saw that several Members wished to express their opinions on the Resolution, and as he wished also to speak himself upon it; but he quite agreed with the Member for the City of London that it was of great importance that the decision of the House should be arrived at as promptly as possible.

MR. AYRTON was also in favour of a speedy settlement of the question. The hon. Member also offered an explanation to the remarks of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but loud cries for a division made his observations inaudible.

MR. NEWDEGATE spoke in favour of an adjournment of the discussion.

MR. VANCE said, that in deference to the feelings of the Committee he would withdraw his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment again proposed; Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 68, Noes 190. Majority 122.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Silk, Millinery, or Manufactures of Silk, or of Silk and any other material, as denominated in the Tariff.

Stays, or Corsets, of Linen or of Cotton, or of Linen and Cotton mixed.

Sulphuric Acid.

Toys, namely,—Marbles.

All other Toys.

Turnery.

Watches, as denominated in the Tariff.

Woollens, namely,—manufactures of Wool, or of Wool mixed with Cotton, as denominated in the Tariff.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That 'Goods, being either in part or wholly manufactured, and not being enumerated or described, nor otherwise charged with duty, and not prohibited to be imported into or used in Great Britain or Ireland; but if any such Goods shall be composed of any Article liable to Duty, as a part or ingredient thereof, then such Goods shall be chargeable with the full duty payable on such Article, or if composed of more than one Article liable to Duty, then with the full Duty payable on the Article charged with the highest rate of Duty,' stand part of the proposed Resolution."

MR. AYRTON wished for an explanation also of the next paragraph of the Resolution, which related to some goods unenumerated. He asked whether this included furniture made of wood which, as he believed, paid a duty. The English manufacturer ought not to have to compete with foreign-made furniture whilst the imports of the material which he used were subject to duty.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he would look into the list to see whether furniture was included and give the hon. Member an exact answer; but he could state that there was no duty on furniture woods; and that the duty on wood would be only at a nominal rate. The Resolution provided for the case of articles made of materials liable to duty.

MR. AYRTON then moved "That the Chairman do report Progress."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he would withdraw the paragraph of the Resolution, and propose it again at the next sitting of the Committee as a separate Resolution.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question, by leave, withdrawn.

Resolution to be reported.

To report progress and ask leave to sit again.

House resumed.

Resolution to be reported To-morrow.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

House adjourned at half-past
One o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, March 2, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILL.—3^d Probate and Administration (India).

BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER.

PETITIONS.

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON presented a Petition from the Clergy of the Western Rural Deanery of Chester-le-Street, Durham, and from the Clergy and Laity of Prestbury against any Alteration of the Book of Common Prayer. He regretted to find that his noble Friend (Lord Ebury) did not intend to bring forward his Motion until after Easter in order to meet the convenience of the Episcopal Bench. The question was one of very serious importance, and he hoped that the deepest consideration would be given to it. In dealing with this question they were treading on very delicate and very slippery ground. He regretted that the matter had been brought forward at all; but he trusted it would be dealt with cautiously, and that there would be a full attendance of their Lordships when his noble Friend (Lord Ebury) brought forward his Motion. He hoped that the noble Lord would give as early notice as possible of the terms of his Motion.

LORD EBURY said, he did not concur in the alarm of the petitioners as to the unity of the Church being destroyed by a revision of the Litany.

THE YEOMANRY.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF POWIS said, he was very much surprised to find that no Vote had been proposed this year, in the Army Estimates, for the annual training of the Yeomanry. The omission to call that force together for drill and exercise was of very rare occurrence—indeed, he believed the only year in which they had not been assembled for that purpose since 1815, was the year 1857. Even at the time of the Reform Bill, when politics ran high, and when the Government, it might be supposed, had no particular affection for the Yeomanry as an agricultural body, their annual gathering for exercise had not been dispensed with. It was certainly very remarkable that at a time like this, when the Government were exerting themselves so strenuously in various ways to form an available reserve of troops at home, this valuable and old-established force should be neglected. If it were susceptible of improvement or re-organization, let the necessary measures be carried out; but he did not think the Government should bestow all their patronage on the infantry Volunteers, to the exclusion of the Yeomanry. In 1857 the excuse made for not calling them out was that they were so efficient that they did not require it; but the opinion of all persons of experience in such matters was that it was impossible for them to be in a state of proper efficiency unless called out every year for exercise and training. Another point to be considered was that the horses of Yeomen were entitled to exemption from the horse-tax if they had performed a certain number of days' exercise; and he hoped that, if the Government persisted in their intention not to call out the Yeomanry this year, they would follow the precedent of 1857, and grant exemption from the horse-tax to all horses that had been out for service in the preceding year. He did not wish to disparage the Volunteer Force, but was it reasonable, when they were assisting a new force, that they should neglect and render inefficient an organization which already existed? It was impossible to keep up the esprit de corps among a body of men when it was a matter of accident whether they would be called out or not; nor was it worth while, for the sake of a trumpery saving of £35,000, to diminish the efficiency of the Yeomanry, when, at the same moment, they were taking a Vote of £15,000 for the pay of adjutants for Volunteer Rifle Corps. It was all very well to say that the Yeomanry were so efficient that it was unnecessary to call them out. They would not believe that this was the true reason, and he trusted that their Lordships would not see a repetition of the policy of 1857, when the Yeomanry were treated with similar neglect, but that they would be allowed to assemble for duty, so that they might be enabled to serve their country in case of need with credit and efficiency. He wished to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is intended to assemble the Yeomanry either for permanent Duty or for Training and Exercise during the present Year?

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON said, that it was not the intention of Her Majesty's Government to call out the Yeomanry during the present year, either for permanent duty or for training or exercise. He could not help thinking that the noble Earl's mind was haunted by the apprehension that there was some hostility to the Yeomanry force on the part of Her Majesty's Government, or some design fatal to their existence. But he could assure the noble Earl that nothing was further from the intention of Her Majesty's Government, or of his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War. The noble Earl had alluded to the large amount of the Army Estimates for the present year. Those Estimates for the Army and Militia alone amounted to more than £15,000,000. Under these circumstances the Government thought it their duty to reduce the expenditure upon all points where reduction was possible. There could be no doubt that some of the causes which rendered this high expenditure necessary were of a temporary nature. The noble Earl said the Yeomanry would not believe that they were not called out because they were already so efficient; but the Government had given this reason in perfect good faith. The reports relative to the Yeomanry last year were remarkably satisfactory. Only two years before the Yeomanry were not called out, and the same course was pursued as in the present year. The noble Earl, if he did not mistake, then made the same prophecy, that the Yeomanry would become inefficient. So far, however, from their efficiency having decreased, the reports of last year showed that it was as high as ever it was. He could assure the noble Earl that the Secretary of State for War, who was himself a Yeomanry officer in a distinguished corps, entertained a high appreciation of the services rendered by the Yeomanry whenever they were called out. In determining that it was not desirable they should be called out during the present year his right hon. Friend had acted from no desire to impair the efficiency of this force, but simply from the wish to keep down, as much as possible, the amount of the Army Estimates. Here was, no doubt, an old-established force of high reputation and proved efficiency, and his right hon. Friend (Mr. S. Herbert) thought he might call upon the patriotism of the officers, in consideration of the demands upon the finances of the year, to forego the advantage of being called out during the present year. The noble Earl had instituted a kind of comparison between the Volunteer corps and the Yeomanry. Such comparisons were, he thought, to be deprecated; but, when the noble Earl complained that the Government were giving assistance to the Volunteer corps, he must remind him that while the Volunteer force, numbering from 70,000 to 80,000 men, would not cost the Government more than £15,000, the expense of the Yeomanry corps was £88,000 for about 14,000 men. He had no doubt that, although the Yeomanry might not be now called out, they would be found when they were assembled next year, in an efficient condition, and that two years hence the reports would show that the Yeomanry were in the highest state of efficiency. His right hon. Friend had only been induced by a sense of public duty and by a desire to reduce the expenditure to defer calling out the Yeomanry for the present year, and had pursued that course with great regret and under the pressure of necessity.

The Earl of Powis

THE EARL OF CORK said, he was glad the noble Earl who had just spoken on the part of the Government had borne testimony to the efficiency of the Yeomanry. If, however, they were in an efficient state it was desirable to keep them so, and that could not be done without training and exercise. If they were not called out, the feeling that they were not properly trained and made efficient would spread, and they would begin to think of dissolving themselves. In 1857, when they were not called out, great doubts existed among them whether the Yeomanry force was not speedily coming to an end. When they now saw the Government assisting another force with £15,000 they could not understand why they should not be called out. He trusted that when the Yeomanry were again called out the Government would supply them with a better carbine. He did not believe there could be a much more useless weapon. The Yeomanry were almost ashamed to use it, and there was the greatest difficulty in prevailing upon them to practice with a weapon that hardly ever hit the mark.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, he agreed with the noble Earl (Earl Powis) that the Government had been guilty of a very serious mistake in not calling out the Yeomanry force, and he quite agreed with what had fallen from the noble Earl opposite with regard to their arms. But that was only one of the first consequences of what he must call the extraordinary courage which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had displayed, in dashing at everything which could contribute to make up his financial scheme. Owing to the courtesy of the other House of Parliament, he (the Earl of Malmesbury) had been present during the Chancellor of the Exchequer's speech, and had then heard one of the most eloquent statements that perhaps had ever been made in that House. In that speech he spoke of two sources of revenue which he had cut off by the reduction and abolition of duties, and one of which he called his great chasm, and the other his little chasm. This little chasm he created by sponging off a number of small articles that in the aggregate brought a large sum of money to the revenue. Among these were nuts, liquorice, and eggs, each yielding a considerable amount; and he (the Earl of Malmesbury) ventured to say, that if these three articles which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had determined to sponge off had been retained, they would have given him a sum large enough to pay the expenses of calling out the Yeomanry Cavalry. He was truly sorry that the Yeomanry were not to be called out this year, for considering that when they were out they had only eight days' training in the year, and that from this time two days had usually to be deducted for travelling, &c., the force could not be expected to become very efficient, especially if the ordinary yearly training was interrupted.

THE EARL OF DARNLEY thought the Government had taken a most unwise and unfortunate course in not calling out the Yeomanry. That force was by no means so perfect in discipline as to warrant the Government in dispensing with the usual training—they equally required improvement in their arms and in their discipline.

THE EARL OF WARWICK was understood to say that it would be impossible for the Yeomanry to retain their efficiency unless a more effective system of training were resorted to.

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON said, he had heard with deep regret the determination of the Government, because he felt sure that the efficiency of the Yeomanry corps must greatly suffer if a year elapsed without their being called out for training. It was a strange argument that because the Yeomanry force was last year in an efficient condition it was unnecessary to assemble them as usual; it certainly did not seem to be the wisest mode of maintaining that efficiency. These were times when it was to the last degree important that all our disposable forces should be developed to the utmost extent, and maintained in the best condition, as there was no knowing when their services might be required. It was pitiable to see the Government of a great country like this adopting such a paltry piece of economy—ill-timed as regarded the present, and most prejudicial in respect to the future.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, although he had not the honour of being connected with the Yeomanry, he could not refrain from expressing the regret with which he had heard that it was not the intention of Her Majesty's Government to call out that force during the present year. That was a measure which could only be justified on the ground of extreme necessity, and he could not see that any such necessity had arisen. It was a step which was entirely contrary to the whole policy of the Government, which had been mainly directed—and very properly directed—to the strengthening of the defences of the country. In this particular case they seemed to have thrown away—wantonly thrown away, as he thought—the present services of a body of 14,000 cavalry; and in doing so, they would necessarily impair the efficiency of the force when called out in another year. He would not say the Yeomanry force was not susceptible of improvement; for example, in the mode in which they were armed and drilled, they might be greatly improved. He thought also a portion of them might be drilled as mounted riflemen. But the greatest advantage would result in increasing the value and efficiency of this body of 14,000 men, by calling them out for training for longer periods. He must say he thought the noble Earl, the Under Secretary for War, had spoken a great deal too lightly on this subject, which was one of very great importance. It was no light matter, considering the way in which the principal landowners and farmers, and other respectable people in each county, came forward and at great inconvenience to themselves, devoted a considerable portion of their time to the public service, that they should be treated with disrespect by the Government. It appeared to him, when the Government found it necessary to diminish the public expenditure, that they might have selected other items than that relating to the Yeomanry for reduction. The great object now was to augment the security of the country. Were there no Miscellaneous Estimates, which had grown enormously year after year, until they now threatened to swallow up the best portion of the revenue? Was it impossible to make a reduction in those Estimates to the amount of £35,000, the sum which would be gained by not calling out the Yeomanry? If the Government felt strong enough, and were disposed to do their duty, as he thought they were, and if they were permitted by the House of Commons to cut out of the Civil Estimates all the charges which had originated in crotchets and self-indulgence, in luxury, in shams, and in jobs, they would be enabled to place this country in a state of absolute security, without laying any additional charge upon the people. He did not accuse the present Government, or any preceding one, of any misconduct in having allowed those Miscellaneous Estimates to grow up to the extent they had done. He believed it was the House of Commons, and not successive Governments, that the country had to blame for the great increase which had taken place in that branch of the expenditure. He remembered the late Sir Robert Peel on one occasion saying there had been much more jobbing since the passing of the Reform Bill than before. "Before," said Sir Robert, "the jobbing was for individuals, but now it was for constituencies, and that was a great deal more expensive." The lower we descend in search of a constituency the lower will be the representative we shall find, and we shall only increase instead of diminishing this source of scandalous expenditure. If the Government would economise the expenditure of the revenue drawn from the people, they must firmly resolve, at any risk to themselves—and he believed they would be supported by the country—to cut down those scandals, which were overwhelming the State, giving us things we did not want, or ought not to desire, under circumstances of national difficulty, and depriving us of things which were absolutely essential to the national security.

The Earl of Ellenborough

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE said, an impression, to which his noble Friend who had just sat down had given distinct expression, appeared to prevail among some of their Lordships that his noble Friend the Under Secretary for War had spoken slightly of the Yeomanry force. But he was certain that nothing could be further from the intention of his noble Friend than to convey any such meaning, and his speech had certainly not produced that effect on his (the Duke of Newcastle's) mind. His noble Friend who had last spoken appeared, moreover, to infer from the speech of his noble Friend the Under Secretary for War that there was a feeling of disregard for the Yeomanry on the part of Her Majesty's Government. He (the Duke of Newcastle) scarcely thought it necessary to defend the Government from any such imputation. He believed that no feeling of the kind was entertained by any one of them: it certainly was not entertained by the members of the Government generally. Speaking for himself, he did not hesitate to say he regretted that there should be any necessity in any single year for not calling out the Yeomanry, for it was impossible that some detriment should not result to the efficiency of the force from such a measure. But Her Majesty's Government had found it necessary to reduce the Estimates in some Departments, and his right hon. Friend at the head of the War Department thought that the item relating to the Yeomanry was one which he could curtail without any serious detriment to the public service. His noble Friend who had just addressed the House had said, that if the Government had been disposed to do their duty, as he believed they were desirous of doing, and if they had not been controlled by the House of Commons, they would have reduced the Miscellaneous Estimates. But he could assure his noble Friend that when those Estimates came before the House of Commons it would be seen that the Government proposed to make very considerable reductions in them. He knew that those Estimates had gone on increasing from year to year until they had reached what might be called gigantic proportions. It was also true that each successive Government had found a difficulty in keeping down that branch of the public expenditure, partly from extraneous causes and partly from the feeling of the House of Commons on the subject. But in the present year the pruning knife had been applied to the Estimates for civil purposes to a much greater extent than the amount of the cost of calling out the Yeomanry. When his noble Friend, the late Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (the Earl of Malmesbury) sought to mix up the affair of the Yeomanry with the Budget of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he (the Duke of Newcastle) was utterly at a loss to conceive what connection there could be between the two subjects: and when his noble Friend talked of "the little chasm," he fully expected that he would have put on his full Yeomanry uniform, and, like the Roman general of old, have thrown himself into it as a martyr. As Lord-Lieutenant of a county possessing two efficient Yeomanry regiments he could speak personally of their value, and although the Government did not intend to call out that body this year yet they had no desire to depreciate its merits.

THE EARL OF DERBY considered that his noble Friend's reference to the Budget was quite as germane to the question under discussion as the noble Duke's example of Quintus Curtius:—he believed, however, that the Gentleman's name was Marcus Curtius. He, however, did not understand from the noble Duke whether it was intended to allow to the Yeomanry the same exemption from horse-duty which they would have enjoyed had they been called out for duty.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE said, he was not prepared to give a positive answer to the noble Earl's question. The subject was one for the decision of the Treasury, and he had not had an opportunity of ascertaining what was the opinion which they entertained with respect to it. But he felt confident that on an application being made from the War Office to the Treasury the exemption from horse-duty which had been granted upon former occasions of the same description would be allowed during the present year.

HONOURS TO NATIVE PRINCES IN INDIA. QUESTION.

LORD LYVEDEN rose to put a question to Her Majesty's Government, of which he had given notice, Whether any and what honours or rewards have been conferred upon those Indian Princes who have remained faithful during the Indian mutiny? There could be no doubt that next to the bravery of our troops we were indebted for the preservation of our Indian empire to the assistance in some cases and the forbearance in others of Native Princes. The Maharajah of Gwalior had prevented his Contingent from attacking us; the Rajah of Putteealla had kept open the road to the Punjab, and other Princes had rendered us valuable aid. About twelve months since he had put a question in the House of Commons to the then Secretary of State for India, Lord Stanley, and was then told that the subject was under consideration. As a year had elapsed since that answer was given he hoped he should not be thought intrusive in asking what had been done since last year towards rewarding those Native Princes who had remained faithful to us during the late Indian mutiny.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, he agreed with his noble Friend as to the value of the services of those Princes. The subject to which his noble Friend referred had engaged the attention of the Governor General and of the Government at home; but he was not then prepared to enter into any minute explanation with respect to it; and he would suggest to his noble Friend that he should then move for copies of the despatches connected with the matter, and that he should make them the subject of discussion on a future occasion.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH was impressed with the belief that the bestowal of decorations would form the most fitting mode of rewarding the Native Princes, and the one most grateful to their feelings.

LORD LYVEDEN moved, in accordance with the suggestion of the noble Duke, for Copies or Extracts of the Correspondence between the Governor General and the Home Government.

Motion agreed to.

House adjourned at Half-past Six o'clock, to Monday next,
Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, March 2, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—2^o Duchy of Cornwall (Limitation of Actions),
3^o Qualification for Offices Abolition Bill.

ANNEXATION OF SAVOY AND NICE TO FRANCE.

PAPERS BY COMMAND.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL brought up papers by command of Her Majesty containing the Correspondence respecting the proposed annexation of Savoy and Nice to France.

SIR HARRY VERNEY wished to ask the noble Lord, Whether he has any information to communicate upon this subject. He wished to know whether the Emperor of the French did intend either by force or intrigue to obtain possession of Savoy and Nice, or whether he intends to submit the question to the four great Powers, and, if so, whether the fact of one or more of them dissenting from his view will prevent him carrying out his object?

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, before the noble Lord answered the question he wished to ask him whether he is prepared to fix a day for the discussion of the subject referred to in those papers?

SIR JOHN WALSH said, that, before the noble Lord replied to those questions, he wished to ask, Whether he has any information to communicate as to the existence of any Treaty or arrangement between Sardinia and France in respect to the proposed annexation?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Sir, I think the best course for me to pursue will be that of moving the Adjournment of the House until Monday; and in making that Motion, I will take the opportunity of replying to the questions that have been put to me. With respect to the last question asked me, as to whether there existed any treaty between France and Sardinia in relation to the annexation of Savoy, I can only say that we have no knowledge of any such treaty, nor do we believe in the existence of any such treaty. I stated on a former occasion that the Emperor of the French had said—and that fact will appear by the papers just produced—that he will not take any steps towards the annexation of Savoy without consulting the great Powers of Europe. I think it will be as well that I should read what the Emperor himself has said in His Speech—which I can only do from a newspaper—because we have no other knowledge than a telegram—and the Emperor of course must be the best interpreter of his own views on the subject. He first speaks of the contingency of Piedmont becoming a great country—and it is now a kingdom with more than 9,000,000 inhabitants—and he proceeds to say—

“Looking to this transformation of Northern Italy which gives to a powerful State all the passes of the Alps, it was my duty, for the security of our frontiers, to claim the French slopes of the mountains. This re-assertion of a claim to a territory of small extent has nothing in it of a nature to alarm Europe and give a denial to the policy of disinterestedness which I have proclaimed more than once, for France does not wish to proceed to this aggrandizement, however small it may be, either by military occupation, or by provoked insurrection, or by underhand manoeuvres, but by frankly explaining the question to the great Powers. They will doubtless understand in their equity, as France would certainly understand it for each of them under similar circumstances, that the important territorial re-arrangement which is about to take place gives us a right to a guarantee indicated by nature herself.”

Now, what I understand, and what appears by the correspondence that has taken place on this subject, is that it is the opinion of the Government of the Emperor of the French, and it appears to be the opinion, certainly, of a great portion of the French people, that the creation of a State in Northern and Central Italy, with a population of 9,000,000, and still more of 11,000,000 or 12,000,000, is a change for the worse in the situation of France; which, instead of having a small State on the frontiers towards the Alps, would have a considerable State. In case of war, supposing that Sardinia combined with other Powers she would have the means of placing considerable armaments on the frontiers, and of invading France by the side of Savoy as well as by the side of Nice. And it is asserted that in consequence of France having contributed by her arms in the war of last year in Italy to make the situation, which situation, the French contend, would be the worse for themselves—that under such circumstances it is but fair and equitable that she ask for a more secure frontier on this side of the Alps. This I believe I stated in substance upon a former occasion. But it appears that, upon entering into a conversation on the subject in Paris, the Emperor declared that he did not mean to proceed to any such annexation without consulting the great Powers of Europe. My hon. Friend now asks me whether that means that the Emperor will not proceed to carry out the annexation if all, or any portion of, the great Powers of Europe disapprove of it. It is obvious that I cannot precisely answer that question. I cannot go beyond what the Emperor and his Government have declared—namely, that they would not proceed in this course of annexation without consulting the great Powers of Europe. But I should infer myself—without the authority, of course, as to what the French Government will do—that if that opinion was general and unanimous among the great Powers of Europe, that France did not require that annexation for her security, and that such annexation would occasion alarm and disquietude to other Powers—if that were, I say, the unanimous opinion of the great Powers, I should infer that the Emperor would not proceed to that annexation. At all events, it is declared that it is a matter which will be discussed by the great Powers of Europe, and that France is not going—as some hon. Gentlemen seemed to suppose—to establish a military occupation of Savoy; but will rely upon what she calls the equitable consideration of the case by the great Powers of Europe. I do not know that I can give the House any further information on the subject. I can only repeat what I have said—that I understand—though only as a matter of personal belief—that, if the opinion is general on the part of the great Powers against that annexation, that that annexation will not take place. If, on the contrary, it is declared by them that the proposition on the part of France is a fair one, then France will proceed to annex Savoy. With regard to the views of Her Majesty's Government on the subject, they are contained in the papers I have just laid upon the table. An hon. Gentleman has asked me upon what day I propose to take the discussion upon those papers. I can only say that it is not usual, unless Government has some measure to bring forward in connection with it, to fix a day for mere discussion of papers. The hon. Gentleman will not suppose that I am going to invite a vote of censure upon the Government. On the other hand, I do not intend to ask for a vote of approbation. These papers will be distributed among Members; and if any Member should think it necessary to bring them under discussion, he may propose such a Motion, as he thinks it necessary; and it will be for him, and not for the Government who have no Motion to propose, to fix any day he may think proper.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the House at its rising do adjourn to Monday."

WINE LICENCES TO EATING-HOUSES.

QUESTION.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer when he will introduce the Bill in which he proposes to embody Resolution No. 15 of the Budget, and to regulate the system of the granting of Wine Licences to the Keepers of Eating-Houses and Refreshment Rooms?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER stated, that he hoped in a day or two to lay such a Bill on the Table.

THE INDIA OFFICE.

QUESTION.

COLONEL SYKES said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether, as he proposes transferring temporarily the business of the India Office to apartments in the Victoria Hotel, Westminster, he will take into consideration the question of the purchase of the hotel, which contains accommodation for all the departments of the India Office, and the Museum and Library. The rental was, he understood, to be £6,000 a year. The cost of removal to Westminster and back again to the City would be enormous, and the loss would be very considerable.

REGIMENTS IN INDIA.

QUESTION.

COLONEL HERBERT said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India what number of Her Majesty's Regiments of Infantry and Cavalry it is proposed to retain for service in the East Indies after the 1st of July, 1860?

SIR CHARLES WOOD, in reply to the hon. and gallant Member for Aberdeen (Colonel Sykes), said, he did not consider a noisy street the most convenient site for a public office, but he should be better able to judge of the convenience of the situation when he had tried it. With regard to the question of the hon. and gallant Member (Colonel Herbert) as to the regiments to be retained for service in India, he feared he could not give a more definite answer than he gave a week ago to the same question, when put by the hon. and gallant Member for Huntingdon (General Peel). The number of regiments retained on service must depend on what the Indian Government considered necessary for the safety of India. They could not be quite certain of the number of regiments that could be sent home at the end of five, six, or seven months. The 14th Dragoons, he knew, was on its way from Bombay. The Indian Government had general orders to send home whatever regiments it could spare. He would take that opportunity of stating the particular regiments that were ordered on service in China, which he had ascertained since he answered the question of the hon. and gallant Officer (General Peel). The 3rd and 67th were sent to China some time ago; he believed the 99th left early in February, and the second battalion of the 60th in the course of that month. The 31st and 44th were to follow; and if a seventh regiment were required, perhaps the 87th.

THE NEW PUBLIC OFFICES.

QUESTION.

MR. H. BAILLIE said, he would beg to ask the noble Lord at the head of the Government when the Battle of the Styles—in reference to the architecture of the Public Offices—will take place?

ITALY.—ADDRESS OF THE IRISH CATHOLICS.—QUESTION.

THE O'DONOGHUE said, he rose to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he has received and Address from certain Catholics in Ireland, calling upon him to interfere in the affairs of Italy, with a view to the full and complete restoration of the Pope's authority; and, if so, whether he has any objection to state the nature of his reply?

SIR JOHN FRANKLIN'S EXPEDITION.—CAPTAIN M'CLINTOCK.

QUESTION.

SIR FRANCIS BARING asked the First Lord of the Treasury what were the intentions of the Government with respect to any reward to Captain M'Clintock and the crew of the discovery-ship Fox. It was right to say that the Question he had put had not been suggested to him by Captain

Sir Charles Wood

M'Clintock or any other of the gallant officers who served in the expedition referred to. Indeed, if he were at liberty to state what he knew, he could satisfy the House that the last thing those distinguished officers had looked to was pecuniary reward for the services they had rendered. Every one, from the Sovereign herself to her humblest subject, had felt an interest in the result of that expedition; but he did not therefore press on the Government the claims of those by whom it was accomplished, he did not come there to say that those who had done their duty in the service of the country should therefore dip their hands into the public purse and expect a reward; but in this case some promises were held out by Her Majesty's Government to which he wished to call the attention of the House. He would state as plainly as possible the grounds of the application he was bringing before them. In 1850 a proclamation was issued by the Admiralty offering £20,000 to any one who should discover, and effectually relieve, the crews of Her Majesty's ships Erebus and Terror. There had also been a second reward of £10,000 offered to any persons who should relieve the crews of Her Majesty's ships Terror and Erebus, or who should give such intelligence as might lead to their succour. In the case of those two rewards he need hardly say that no claimant for them had appeared. But another sum of £10,000 had been promised to "any person or persons who, in the judgment of the Board of Admiralty, might by virtue of his or their efforts first succeed in ascertaining the fate of those crews." It was to that last promise that he wished more especially to call the attention of the House. He might, perhaps, take this opportunity of removing any confusion which might exist in the minds of any person who had not looked into the question, as to the reward given to Captain M'Clure. Captain M'Clure had had a sum of money granted him for services of an entirely different nature. A reward had been offered by Parliament for the discovery of the Northwest Passage—and after an inquiry before a Committee of the House of Commons had taken place a sum had been granted to Sir P. M'Clure and his crew. That reward, therefore, had no reference to the question which he was about to bring under the notice of the House. In 1856, Dr. Rae had made a claim, and the Admiralty had awarded him the sum of £10,000, promised under the third condition of the Proclamation, and he (Sir F. Baring) for one was not disposed to offer any objection to the course which had been in that instance pursued. But when it was borne in mind that that which in Dr. Rae's case was, comparatively speaking, conjectural, had been rendered perfectly certain by the aid of the crew of the Fox, and when it was recollected how the gallant men of whom that crew was composed had fulfilled the letter of the conditions which were held out in the proposal to which he alluded—though, perhaps, their claim could not be argued as a legal claim—it could hardly, he thought, be denied that they had some claim on the good faith of the country. He did not, however, desire to rest that claim upon merely legal grounds. He preferred appealing to his noble Friend at the head of the Government to look upon it in that generous spirit in which he felt assured the nation at large was anxious to see it viewed, and not to turn a deaf ear to the wishes of the great body of the people. He hardly thought it necessary, even for one moment, to call the attention of the House to that which Captain M'Clintock and his officers and crew had effected. The whole country knew it. He had in a small ship, fitted out by private contributions, been enabled to satisfy the English public upon a question with respect to which they had felt the deepest anxiety—an object which large expeditions had year after year been sent out to accomplish, but without success. Nor should it, he thought, be regarded as matter of small satisfaction that the subject was one which had been finally set at rest, inasmuch as the sad fate of our poor countrymen had at length been but too clearly ascertained; and it was therefore likely to be the last time the subject would come before the House. Under these circumstances, he hoped his noble Friend would state to the House that he was not unwilling to confer on Captain M'Clintock that reward to which he was so justly entitled. Hon. Members would perhaps pardon him if he now proceeded to advert to another point which was connected with the subject with which he was dealing, and with respect to his intention to refer to which he had given his noble Friend notice in private. He did not know what the feelings of others might have been when perusing the narrative of Captain M'Clintock, but he must say for himself that when he had come to the conclusion of that simple story, he had been deeply pained at the recital which was there given of the expense by which the expedition had been attended, and at the mention of her by whom that expense had mainly been incurred. He had no authority to allude to the name of Lady Franklin; indeed, he believed that in doing so he was acting in opposition to her wishes; but it was not so much for her sake as for that of the country that he did not wish to see her bear the burden of the charges which she had so nobly defrayed. The subject was one which reminded him of a celebrated monument which had been raised to one of the most distinguished of the Austrian Generals in the Seven Years' War, and upon which, after the usual recital of his eminent services, the following words were inscribed—“Non Patria, non Imperator, Conjux posuit.” It was not the country whose battles he had fought; it was not the Imperial master whom he had so long and so nobly served, but the money Order that had raised the monument to the memory of Laudohn. He trusted, however, that England would furnish no just ground for such a reproach, and that, instead of allowing the expense of the expedition to which he was referring to be borne by Lady Franklin, the country at large, as a token of the high estimation in which it held such a man as her lamented husband, would claim it as a right to defray that expense as a mark of respect to his memory. So far as Lady Franklin herself was concerned, she had her reward; and if perchance—as he understood was the case—the exertions which she had made to attain the object of her wishes, had diminished her means of subsistence, and deprived her of many comforts for the remainder of her life, everybody who knew her, knew she would rejoice in any sacrifice incurred in effecting what had been the great object of her life. It was on other and public grounds that he made the present appeal to his noble Friend at the head of the Government, and in making that appeal he might be allowed for a moment to remind the House who Sir John Franklin was, and how distinguished had been his career. He was no doubt first known as the great navigator of the Arctic Regions; but in his early life he was a gallant sailor who fought at Copenhagen and Trafalgar, and who had rendered himself eminent as a volunteer on board an East India ship in the celebrated defence which had been made under Captain Dance, in repulsing a French squadron commanded by Admiral Linois. He afterwards served his country in a civil capacity, and later in life, when he might fairly have claimed repose upon an honourable career, he did not shrink from dangers which he knew so well, and in encountering which he had found his grave. A man who died thus, reflected honour on his country as much as if he had fallen in the battle-field; he was one to whom a grateful nation might not hesitate to erect a monument in that place where her greatest and best lay buried. He died in the strict execution of his duty, at the very moment of success—when he saw before him the North-west Passage, though it was not allowed that he should effect it, and had made the discovery for which he had been sent out by his country. In speaking of their chief, let him not forget the conduct of those who served under him—of Crozier and Fitzjames, and many other younger officers, who if their lives had been spared would have been ornaments to their profession. He believed that conduct such as this raised the character of England, and of that flag under which these men had served. He did not ask his noble Friend any specific question; he was anxious to leave the subject with him. Indeed, he did not know anybody in whose hands he would more readily leave a question of this kind. To his noble Friend's own generous and kind feelings he would intrust the entire case, with all the more confidence that it deeply affected one whose own nature was so extremely sensitive as Lady Franklin's. He was almost ashamed of having taken up so much of the time of the House; but the peculiar nature of the case which had been put into his hand would be his excuse for going so far out of the way in bringing before them what he felt satisfied, from the manner in which his observations had been received, did not run counter to the general feeling of the House.

MR. WHITESIDE said, that before the noble Lord answered the question which had been put to him, he hoped the House would allow him to say a few words on the subject, in consequence of the interest he had always taken in it, and of his personal friendship with the gallant commander of the Fox. It would be in the recollection of the House that in June, 1857, his right hon. Friend Mr. Napier, at the earnest desire of Lady Franklin, brought forward a Motion that the Government of the day should fit out another expedition to endeavour to discover the fate of that brave sailor, Sir John Franklin, and his gallant

Sir Francis Baring

companions. That Motion was refused, not from any indisposition to carry out the humane wish of Lady Franklin, but, as was then expressed by the head of the Admiralty, from the belief that the enterprise would be fruitless, perilous, and might cost a sacrifice of human life, and therefore the right hon. Baronet (Sir C. Wood) could not advise the Government to sanction it. After that Motion a number of persons contributed towards an expedition; but the greater portion of the expense of the last voyage of discovery was borne by Lady Franklin herself. Captain M'Clintock did not undertake the command in a spirit of reckless adventure; for he (Mr. Whiteside) happened to know from scientific men, who were now preparing a work on the results of his discoveries in geology and science, that Captain M'Clintock had studied carefully and clearly the whole question, and arrived at a firm conviction that if he was enabled to reach the Polar regions, he should certainly discover what had become of Sir John Franklin and his companions. In a ship, the smallest, he believed, that ever undertook a voyage of discovery, with a crew of twenty-two men and three officers, M'Clintock sailed in July. In September he was beset in a pack of ice, where he remained till the following month of April. He drifted 1,200 miles, and the day he was relieved, instead of thinking of returning to England, the intrepid sailor was only the more determined to prosecute his gallant enterprise. He agreed with the right hon. Baronet that the result of that voyage was told in simple words, and he must say a most romantic interest attached to the narrative. He had heard it said by a very eminent person that if Franklin had been better acquainted with the present mode of sledge travelling, he would most probably have survived; the incidents connected with this adventure formed, in fact, the most interesting part of the narrative. The last Arctic voyage, as had been truly said, had called forth qualities—and he excepted none of the twenty-five men who formed the crew of the Fox—a higher nature than were displayed even on the battle-field. The soldier had a quick death or a joyful victory; but there were a more enduring spirit, and a loftier resolution, and nobler qualities of mind and body required, successfully to conduct such an enterprise as this than were required for the field of battle. He happened to know Captain M'Clure, and when that officer mentioned to him (Mr. Whiteside) the subject of his own services, he (Mr. Whiteside) told that gallant Officer the best resort he could have was to the House of Commons. The House, and the noble Viscount at the head of the Government had behaved with the utmost generosity to M'Clure and his crew, and what he (Mr. Whiteside) had suggested, had been verified by the decision of the House. No assembly in the world was more ready to acknowledge and reward conspicuous merit than the House of Commons. With regard to Lady Franklin, it was quite correct that she declined to accept anything from the Government in the shape of pecuniary recompense. Her hope, her wish, was that in recognition of the services and name of her gallant husband, as the true discoverer of the North-west Passage, which many men of science said he was, they might perhaps raise to him a public monument; while, in doing so, an act of justice might be also rendered to the living. He left the matter to the generous nature of the noble Viscount, and he could not help thanking him for the mark of distinction that had already been conferred on his gallant Friend.

MR. CONINGHAM rose to remind the noble Viscount that Sir John Franklin had gone forth on no volunteer expedition; he was called on by his country to undertake the expedition in which he lost his life; and it was because the Government had not taken the proper measures to search for him and his gallant companions—because they had not adequately fulfilled their duties—that Lady Franklin had sacrificed almost her entire private resources. The search hitherto made had been chiefly conducted by sea, and he was told by Dr. Rae, no mean authority on questions of this kind, that the only real and effectual search for the remains and journals of the officers engaged in the expedition would be by land and during summer; and there would be no danger whatever, he understood, in such an expedition. The only danger would be if the expedition were compelled to pass the winter in those desert regions. Not only those who were interested in Polar discovery, but the great bulk of this nation and the civilized world were interested in obtaining all the information that could be collected as to the fate and history of Sir John Franklin's expedition; and he really thought the Government would be wanting in their duty to the relatives and memory of those whom they had sent out on such dangerous adventures if they did not take steps to recover what traces they could of their history and endurance.

THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

QUESTION.

MR. JOSEPH LOCKE said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, if it is in contemplation to remove the Natural History Collection from the British Museum; and, if so, to what place it is proposed to remove it?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, I will first address myself to the question put to me by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Iwerness-shire (Mr. H. Baillie), as to whether any decision has yet been arrived at with reference to the designs for the Public Offices. No decision has yet been come to with regard to those designs; but whenever a selection has been made, I may say, the design will be fitted up in some public place, so as to enable hon. Members to form an opinion respecting it. With regard to the question put to me by my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton (Mr. Locke), there have been two meetings of the Trustees of the British Museum, at which the question was considered whether the existing buildings were sufficient in point of space to accommodate not only the existing, but the annually increasing collection of interesting objects to be found there; and, if not, whether it was desirable to increase the space by adding to the buildings of the Museum on the spot, or would be better to remove to some other place a portion of the collection. The opinion of the Trustees was that it was better to remove a portion to some other place, where a building could be obtained at a comparatively moderate expense, than incur the charge of purchasing land immediately adjoining the Museum, in order to erect on it buildings adequate to the purpose. They were further of opinion that if any portion of the collection was to be removed, the Natural History department was that which could be most easily and advantageously removed. No decision was taken as to the particular spot to be chosen; it was agreed to defer the selection of the place and the manner in which the Natural History collection should be removed. The matter therefore stands at present thus:—The Trustees have agreed that the antiquities, books, and articles of that kind should remain, and that the lighter things should be removed elsewhere. The hon. Member for Tipperary (The O'Donoghue), has asked me whether I had received a memorial from certain Peers and Commoners in Ireland, calling on the Government to interfere in the affairs of Italy with a view to the full and complete restoration of the Pope's authority in his temporal dominions. Sir, I did receive a memorial to that effect very numerous and respectably signed. The only answer I could give was to acknowledge the receipt, and remit it to the consideration of the Government. If I had gone into any answer, I am afraid my opinion would not have been found quite to agree with that of the memorialists, and I thought it better to avoid making any reply. It is well known that the policy of Her Majesty's Government in this matter is to leave the Italian people to settle their own affairs, and therefore that no interference of the British Government should be exerted either in the one way or the other in regard to any arrangements that might be made in Italy. Our only wish is that the Italians should take their own affairs in their own hands, and, free from any foreign intervention or control, should arrange them in the manner most consonant with their own feelings. With respect to the subject to which my hon. Friend (Sir Francis Baring) has adverted, and which I am sure engages the sympathies not of this House only, but of the whole country, it is impossible to speak too highly of the courage, the perseverance, and devotion displayed by Sir Leopold M'Clintock and his brave companions in the expedition which they undertook in search of the remains of Sir John Franklin. It is quite true, as the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Whiteside) has stated, that the duties which brave men perform in so distinguished a manner are not less honourable than those performed on the field of battle, and that throughout his perilous enterprise all the great qualities which adorn the soldier or the sailor were most conspicuously exhibited by the man who was enabled to discover the fate and bring back some vestiges of the Franklin expedition. At the same time it is but fair to say that there were others who went out at an earlier date, and who, although not equally successful with those who followed them in the object of their search, nevertheless displayed all those high qualities which so ~~eminently~~ distinguished the last expedition. It is right that the names of these men should not be forgotten while we are doing honour to those who voluntarily set out in search of the remains of Sir John Franklin and his party. It is true that the Motion referred to by the hon. and learned Gentleman was made in this House to induce Her Majesty's Government to send out at the public expense an expedition to ascertain the fate of Sir John Franklin. And I must confess that I never acted more at variance with my own personal feelings than when, from higher considerations, we declined to undertake such an enterprise at the public charge. At the same time we did think that it would not be justifiable in Her Majesty's Government, at the cost of the country, to send out men on a search which at that period appeared very hopeless, and to be attended with dangers to which we should not have been warranted in exposing them. Fortunately, however, Sir Leopold M'Clintock succeeded, with, I believe, scarcely any loss, or no loss at all, of human life, in accomplishing the object which that noble lady who sent him out had so long and so frequently attempted to effect. Now, Sir, there was a reward of £10,000 offered to anybody who should ascertain the fate of Sir John Franklin and bring back any vestiges of his expedition. The whole of that sum was awarded to Dr. Rae and the associates of his adventure. Therefore there does not now remain any portion of the votes of Parliament applicable to the rewarding Sir Leopold M'Clintock and his companions. Nevertheless, I am ready to say, that if it should appear to be the opinion of Parliament that this is a fit occasion on which to make within moderate limits a grant over and above the amount already sanctioned, Her Majesty's Government certainly would not be disposed to stand in the way of the generosity of the House of Commons. With respect to the other topic which he mentioned, undoubtedly it would not be right to follow the example of such a monument as my right hon. Friend has described—namely, a monument that should record that it was not by the country, that it was not by the Sovereign, but by the widow, that the memory of a great and gallant man had been perpetuated. I think, on the contrary, it would be fitting that there should be a monument to show that the country, the Sovereign, and the widow had all united to erect an enduring memorial of the distinguished services of Sir John Franklin.

The expense this would involve would not be considerable in comparison with the gratification which I am sure it would afford to the whole nation, and I think to Lady Franklin, who as the hon. and learned Gentleman says, disclaims all desire for any re-imbursement of the great outlay she has so nobly incurred in endeavouring to ascertain the fate of her husband. But, no doubt, it would be highly satisfactory to her feelings if Her Majesty's Government and the Parliament were to concur in handing down to posterity some memorial of her deceased husband. I believe in this case one may say that the husband and the wife were worthy of each other; and I am persuaded that it would be grateful to the feelings of the country if, with the consent of Parliament, some monument were erected which should recognize, not only the services of the husband, but the devotion of the wife.

MR. DISRAELI :—Sir, I am convinced that the announcement just made by the noble Viscount on the part of Her Majesty's Government will be most gratifying to the country, as it evidently is most gratifying to this House. No one can have read the narrative of Sir Leopold M'Clintock, or marked the progress of his singular expedition, without feeling that their adventure will form a memorable chapter in the heroic annals of the mariners of this country. With regard to that noble Lady through whose energy and inspiration that expedition was so gallantly undertaken and so successfully accomplished, I feel, as I am sure we all must feel, the liveliest admiration and the warmest sympathy for the rare intelligence, the indomitable perseverance, the womanly, the high and enduring spirit, with which Lady Franklin urged on the prosecution of the search for her brave husband—they will make her name illustrious among the daughters of England. I repeat that I am sure the resolution at which the Government have arrived, and which the noble Viscount has communicated to us in so sympathetic a spirit, will afford the utmost gratification to all Her Majesty's subjects.

Afterwards—

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON, in putting a question to the Secretary of the Admiralty respecting the Channel Fleet, said, that before making that inquiry he could not refrain from saying how warmly he concurred in all that had been said by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Portsmouth, with respect to Sir Leopold M'Clintock and Lady Franklin. The right hon. Gentleman had alluded in the most delicate manner to the reimbursement of Lady Franklin herself, and he could not help adverting to what had fallen from the noble Viscount on that part of the subject. All who were acquainted with the views of Lady Franklin knew that her feelings upon that matter were of the same noble and generous nature as those which induced her to make such efforts to discover the remains of her lost husband; but he quite agreed with the right hon. Gentleman that the House and the Government ought rather to consider what was due upon public grounds to the memory of Sir John Franklin, and to the noble efforts of his widow, than to pay too rigid a regard to the delicate feelings by which Lady Franklin was actuated. He hoped that the noble Viscount would allow him to remind him that in the statement which he had made to the House he did not advert to what fell from the right hon. Gentleman and from his noble and learned Friend upon this part of the subject. He hoped the noble Viscount, in whose hands he for one was perfectly content to leave the matter, would not forget it; but he felt that, considering the efforts which Lady Franklin had made, something beyond what the noble Viscount had mentioned was due as a tribute to that noble Lady.

THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. GREGORY trusted that before the Government proceeded to remove the Natural History collections from the British Museum, they would take some means of consulting the general feeling of the public, and also of scientific men, upon the subject. The proposed removal would be very unpopular with those who were in the habit of visiting those collections; and the dissatisfaction it would produce would not be lessened by the fact that the step had been decided upon, as he believed, by a mere majority of one—that bare majority having, moreover, only been obtained through the attendance of a number of ex officio trustees, who were not usually present at the ordinary meetings of the Board. There was obviously the greatest advantage in having these Natural History collections under the same roof as the splendid library of reference which the British Museum now boasted; but that advantage would be wholly sacrificed if the contemplated removal were persisted in.

ACCIDENTS TO THE CHANNEL FLEET. QUESTION.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, that he wished to put a question to the Secretary of the Admiralty respecting some accidents reported to have occurred to the ships of the Channel squadron. The Times of that morning contained the following paragraph :—

“ A letter dated Torbay, Tuesday, received at Plymouth, from one of the officers of the Channel squadron, says that off the Lizard the ships were taken all aback, and could not again form a line. The Edgar, Queen, and Donegal remained out. Besides the casualties to the Queen, Diadem, Algiers, and Mersey, already reported in The Times, the letter states that the Aboukir lost her cross-jack yard and starboard quarter-boats, the Royal Albert pitched her jib-boom under at times, and the Trafalgar lost her jib-boom; she will probably call at Plymouth before proceeding to the Tagus.”

He wished to know whether the Admiralty had received any account of this dispersion, as he might call it, of the fleet off the Lizard, and whether the damage which had been caused was to be considered as the inevitable result of the late gale, or whether there was reason to attribute any blame to the officers in command of the squadron. A much more important question, however, and one upon which he was still more anxious for an explanation, arose with reference to the casualties to the Queen, Diadem, Algiers, and Mersey. Was he right in believing that these casualties had arisen from these magnificent ships having on three recent occasions come into collision with each other in the open Channel? He understood that on one occasion the Diadem and Queen ran foul of each other, and that on another, the Algiers and Mersey came into collision; the fact of these great and splendid ships coming into collision in the open Channel, while sailing in open order of battle, was one of serious import, to which the attention of the Government ought to be directed. It was impossible that these collisions should take place without great danger and serious public loss. He understood from the report that in both cases the collisions occurred when the ships were sailing in two lines, and were tacking in succession. If that were the case it was impossible to escape one or two inferences—either that the sailing order under which the manœuvres were executed must be of a defective and unsafe character, or there must be a want of seamanship among the officers who were in command of those ships. He therefore asked his noble Friend to give some account of these circumstances, and he trusted that it would be in his power to give such an explanation as would remove the unpleasant feeling on the part of the public, to which the statements contained in this paragraph had given rise.

CASE OF MR. TARRANT.

OBSERVATION.

MR. EDWIN JAMES called the attention of the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies to the case of Mr. Tarrant, the editor of the Friend of China, who, after conviction for a libel had been sentenced to be imprisoned in the felons' gaol in Hong Kong for the period of twelve calendar months. Mr. Tarrant was convicted in September last of a libel on Colonel Kane, who held an official position at Hong Kong. Mr. Tarrant was a gentleman and a scholar. He had himself held a position in the colony, and had afterwards become the editor of the newspaper called the Friend of China, and he wrote some able articles exposing the system of corruption which beyond all question was practised in Hong Kong, for Sir John Bowring had stated before a Committee that he was bound to confess that there was a system of corruption among the officials there which he had in vain endeavoured to suppress. Mr. Tarrant was tried on the 29th of September, and was sentenced to twelve months' imprisonment on the criminal side of the gaol. He was tried, in the absence of the Chief Justice, by Mr. Adams, the former Member for Boston; and it was due to Mr. Adams, so far as his humanity was concerned, to state that he had recently arrived at Hong Kong, and was not aware of the severity of the punishment, the character of criminals Mr. Tarrant would have to associate with, or the wretched accommodation of the prison. Mr. Adams went himself and saw the gaol, and joined in a memorial to the Government, with the whole of the jury who had tried the case, for a remission of the sentence and Mr. Tarrant's removal from the criminal side of the gaol to the place allotted to misdemeanants, as would have been the case in England. This was refused: and Mr. Tarrant endured the greatest possible privation and misery. He suffered so much in his health from the association with criminals, from the heat of the wretched place—for the gaol was constructed for Chinese prisoners—that he was, after a time, removed to an hospital, whence, however, he was subsequently again sent back to the gaol. The punishment was altogether most severe, and not warranted by the circumstances of the case. He had thought it his duty to call the attention of the Under Secretary of State to this matter, and he hoped that Mr. Tarrant would receive some consideration and some alleviation of his sufferings.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, that his information on this subject did not quite coincide with that of the hon. and learned Gentleman. According to a private letter from the then acting Attorney General, from the first Mr. Tarrant was treated with as much leniency as the gaol regulations permitted; and in November last the visiting justices revised and altered the rules of the goal so as to permit Mr. Tarrant to be placed apart from the other criminals, and accorded as much accommodation as the gaol allowed. At the same time it was to be admitted that a gaol in the climate of China was different from a gaol here, and the gaol at Hong Kong was one which urgently required enlargement and improvement. This operation was in the course of being carried out, and a large sum of money expended for the purpose. But with respect to Mr. Tarrant himself, the case was only a question as to the discretion of the Government in carrying out the sentence of a court of justice; and he must say that the exercise of that discretion was not quite so easy a matter as some gentlemen thought; the fact being that these libels, personal libels in the newspapers of Hong Kong, had gone on for many years past to such an extent as to render it necessary that no excessive lenity should be shown to a person who had so conducted himself. Perhaps, however, he could best answer the hon. Gentleman's question by reading an extract from a despatch addressed in December last by the noble Duke now at the head of the Colonial Office to the Governor of Hong Kong, and which would have reached him by this time. The direction given to the Governor in that despatch was, that if, on its receipt, Mr. Tarrant's health had suffered, or was in danger of suffering, he was to be at once removed from the criminal side of the prison to the debtors' side; that whether his health suffered or not, at the end of six months from the date of his imprisonment he was at all events to be removed to the debtors' side of the gaol. And the despatch ended, "it has been urged"—it was written by the Duke of Newcastle—

"It has been urged upon me by some who disavow the slightest sympathy with Mr. Tarrant's writings that the latter half of the sentence should be altogether remitted, and that he should be discharged from prison. I must leave to your judgment how far such an act of leniency should be resorted to."

No answer had yet been received to this despatch. When it did arrive he would be happy to give his hon. and learned Friend the information which it contained. But he must say that he had every confidence in the good sense and judgment of Sir Hercules Robinson, who had just gone to the colony, and who was perfectly free from all the local and personal quarrels that agitated society there, and he had little doubt that before this time the punishment of this gentleman was ended.

Before he sat down he trusted the House would forgive him if he said one word with regard to the gallant men whose deeds had formed the subject of discussion. It so happened that the Irish Members could claim both the first and second officers in command of the late expedition as their countrymen. He had himself had the additional honour and pleasure of claiming Captain M'Clintock as a member of a distinguished family in his county; and the second in command of the Fox, Commander Hobson was a relation of his own. He had not the honour of Captain M'Clintock's acquaintance, but that gallant officer was related to a gentleman who represented his county in the last Parliament; and if, in the chances of politics that Gentleman had now been in the House, he would have more right to return thanks for Captain M'Clintock than he could possibly pretend to have. He begged, however, to thank the House for the generous manner in which it had recognized the services of those distinguished officers.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET hoped that before answering the Question of the right hon. Baronet, he might be permitted, on the part of his brother officers, to thank the right hon. Baronet the Member for Portsmouth for the handsome way in which he had mentioned the services of Captain M'Clintock and others connected with Arctic exploration and discovery. All belonging to the navy felt that a great debt was due to those gallant Polar officers, and, without desiring in the slightest degree to deprive Captain M'Clintock and his brave band of any portion of the credit to which they were

or a British Possession within the limits of the East India Company's Charter, qualified as aforesaid

. the gallon 8 3
 Rum of and from any Foreign Country being the country of its production

. the gallon 8 3
 Tafia, of and from any Colony of France the gallon 8 3

Other Spirits, being sweetened or mixed so that the degree of strength cannot be ascertained as aforesaid, and Perfumed Spirits to be used as Perfumery only the gallon 12 0

Spirits, or Strong Waters, imported into the United Kingdom, mixed with any ingredient, and, although thereby coming under some other denomination, except Varnish, shall nevertheless be deemed to be Spirits or Strong Waters, and be subject to Duty as such.

Water, Cologne, the flask (thirty of such flasks containing not more than one gallon) each 0 8

— when not in flasks, as Perfumed Spirits the gallon 12 0

Resolutions to be reported.

To report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.

House resumed.

Resolutions to be reported on Monday next.

Committee report Progress ; to sit again on Monday next.

MR. JOHN POPE HENNESSY.

Mr. JOHN POPE HENNESSY, being in his place pursuant to the Order of the House of the 28th day of February, expressed his regret that having, through inadvertence, neglected to sign the Declaration required by the Standing Orders, and forgetting his summons to attend the Committee on Group 1 of Railway Bills, he had started for Ireland, whence he had immediately returned on being served with the Order of the House ; and then he withdrew.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN, as he was the Member who moved the issue of the order for the hon. Member's attendance, wished to say that it was with the deepest regret that the Committee of Selection had felt it to be their duty to report his absence. Nothing but the extreme inconvenience which that absence had caused would have induced them to take the step, particularly as there was reason to believe that the hon. Member acted in forgetfulness. But he was sure that the hon. Member was totally unacquainted with the extreme inconvenience he had caused to the parties appearing drone at sea. He believed there was an officer in the Channel fleet who had sailed in a fleet before. How could he expect but that accidents would happen to officers who had had no previous experience of sailing their ships with the bows of one at the stem of another were to sea in dark nights to face the equinoctial gales? He thought great blame should be attached to somebody in not having years ago maintained a squadron at sea; and the Admiralty were to blame in not having sent them to sea sooner. If they had gone last year from June to September, they would have been got into proper order before the equinoctial gales came on.

ST. GEORGE'S-IN-THE-EAST.

QUESTION.

MR. LYGON said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what arrangements has been made by the Police for the preservation of order at St. George's Church on Sunday next. He put this question because Sunday was now near at hand, and from all the information he could collect, there appeared to be a want of harmony between the Police and the Rector and the Churchwardens on former occasions. He thought it would tend to the preservation of order if the Rector were informed by the police what the law was, and how far they intended to aid him in carrying it out. For want of a common understanding, the Police seemed to have gone one way, and the Rector and Churchwardens another; whereas, if there was a previous understanding, the danger of a collision might be avoided.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the Government would undertake a very difficult task if they were to make themselves responsible for maintaining a good understanding between the rector of St. George's-in-the-East, and either the churchwardens, the police, or any portion of his parishioners. It was the business of the police, and of those who instructed them, to take measures for the maintenance of the public peace during the celebration of Divine service in the church. He must say, however, that he did not consider it to be one of the ordinary duties of the police to mount guard during the performance of Divine service in any church. If such a state of things were to become common, it would be necessary that there should be a change in the law, so as to make it somewhat analogous to that which existed in

Ireland, by which, when a district was disturbed, it was possible to impose a fine upon it for the maintenance of an additional body of police. In answer to the question, all he had to say was, that such instructions had been given to the police as would, he hoped, prevent any disturbance which might be offensive to public decorum during the performance of Divine service.

ANNEXATION OF SAVOY TO FRANCE.

QUESTION.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: I wish to put a question to Her Majesty's Government which, I think, the House will agree with me is one of considerable importance. I am afraid I shall not be able to elicit a reply from my noble Friend at the Foreign Office or my noble Friend the Prime Minister, as both of them have already addressed the House; but perhaps the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, who took considerable interest in the question the other night, or the Chancellor of the Exchequer, may reply to it. Perhaps, indeed, the Chancellor of the Exchequer may be the more proper person, for it is, as the House will see, a question of great subtlety and nicety. I am sure the House must be far from satisfied with the reply which we have received to-night from the noble Lord the Minister for Foreign Affairs. The reply which he gave is far from satisfactory, and I do but interpret the opinion of every Gentleman in this House when I say that we have all read the official announcement contained in the recent Speech of the Emperor of the French with the deepest emotion and concern, because it is now evident that the Emperor of the French is determined, in spite of this Government and in spite of Europe, to avail himself of the opportunity which the existing state of affairs presents, and to take by force Savoy. It would be unfitting to enter upon any discussion now; only I hope that an opportunity will soon be afforded, for it is one of the very greatest importance. I have been told that the discussion which took place here the other night, and especially the statement of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, has had considerable effect in Paris; and it is reported that the Emperor of the French says that after all the sacrifices he has made to England, both politically and commercially, he finds he has gained nothing whatever, except the support of his hon. friend, Monsieur Milnes. The question, Sir, which I have to put refers to justly entitled, he was bound to say that there were other officers who, although they had not been so successful, had equally deserved success. It would be in the recollection of the House that Captain Inglefield penetrated into the Arctic regions in the Isabel—a vessel very similar to the Fox, and succeeded in discovering some relics of the Franklin expedition. There were various other officers, whose names unfortunately he could not recall at that moment, but he was sure the House would permit him to call attention to their services on the present interesting occasion. In reply to the question of the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich, he would admit that undoubtedly there had been two collisions in the Channel, one of which had been of a very serious nature, inasmuch as it had resulted in the loss of the bowsprit of the Diadem. He was disposed to think, however, that the right hon. Baronet was rather inclined to listen to what he must call midshipmen's yarns. The statement which had appeared in The Times of that morning had evidently been prepared by the youngest midshipman in the fleet. He had looked over it very carefully, and he confessed that neither he nor any of his brother officers at the Admiralty had been able to make head or tail of it. The fleet started from Portland on Thursday, and proceeded with a moderate breeze down the Channel, until it arrived off the Lizard. There, during the night, the squadron being in two lines, a signal was made to tack in succession. The Diadem was the stern ship of the weather line, and the Queen fell foul of her in stays and carried away her bowsprit. A very detailed report had been received from the captain of the Diadem, but the Admiralty had not yet obtained a very distinct report from the captain of the Queen. They had, however, ordered an inquiry into the circumstances. The other collision took place between the Algiers and the Mersey. The only information which the Admiralty had received was contained in a letter from the Mersey, which had put into port for some slight repairs; and in this case also a minute investigation would be instituted. The right hon. Baronet had expressed opinions with respect to the conduct of the Channel squadron, which, if they had not come from a person intimately acquainted with the navy, he should have regarded as undeserving of notice.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: I expressed
Lord Clarence Paget

no opinions, but merely asked for information.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET appealed to the House whether the right hon. Baronet had not talked of extreme mismanagement in the conduct of the fleet—or words to that effect. There could be no doubt that when two vessels came into collision a certain amount of blame attached to one party or the other,—generally, indeed, to both; but he could not at that moment state whether any, and, if any, what degree of censure had been incurred in the late collisions in the Channel. He could perfectly understand, considering the terrific gale experienced by the squadron during their cruise, that there should be a loss of spars, a pitching away of jib-booms, and various accidents of that nature; but the Admiralty had at present no reason to suppose that there had been any mismanagement whatever. Accidents might always be expected, especially in the night time, when a squadron, with young inexperienced officers of watches, and manned by raw crews, put to sea for the first time. But that only showed the importance of keeping our squadrons at sea. He believed the right hon. Baronet would find that our Channel fleet, notwithstanding the recent collisions, was well commanded and officered, and that the accidents which had occurred at starting would be followed by complete success.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, he was very glad that the right hon. Gentleman had brought this subject before the House. He thought if there was blame at all, it was in sending a young squadron to sea, totally inexperienced, to face the equinoctial gales. When that was the case, they must expect to meet with accidents. But he could not agree with the Secretary to the Admiralty that these collisions had been caused by weather. It was said that the sails were taken aback, and that orders were given to tack. Now, there was a stringent order—which all sailors knew, that when a squadron tacked, the vessels in the port line were to give way to the vessels on the starboard line. He thought, therefore, blame must attach to the captain of the ship on the port tack. But then, if the Admiralty would not send the fleet to sea in fine weather, when circumstances compelled them to go to sea in bad weather, accidents were sure to occur, because it could not be expected that young officers would be familiar with all the rules and regulations connected with the conduct of a squadron at sea. He believed there was not an officer in the Channel fleet who had ever sailed in a fleet before. How could they expect but that accidents would happen when officers who had had no previous experience of sailing their ships with the stern of one at the stem of another were sent to sea in dark nights to face the equinoctial gales? He thought great blame attached to somebody in not having years ago maintained a squadron at sea; and the Admiralty were to blame in not having sent them to sea sooner. If they had gone last year from June to September, they would have been got into proper order before the equinoctial gales came on.

ST. GEORGE'S-IN-THE-EAST.

QUESTION.

MR. LYGON said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what arrangements has been made by the Police for the preservation of order at St. George's Church on Sunday next. He put this question because Sunday was now near at hand, and from all the information he could collect, there appeared to be a want of harmony between the Police and the Rector and the Churchwardens on former occasions. He thought it would tend to the preservation of order if the Rector were informed by the police what the law was, and how far they intended to aid him in carrying it out. For want of a common understanding, the Police seemed to have gone one way, and the Rector and Churchwardens another; whereas, if there was a previous understanding, the danger of a collision might be avoided.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the Government would undertake a very difficult task if they were to make themselves responsible for maintaining a good understanding between the rector of St. George's-in-the-East, and either the churchwardens, the police, or any portion of his parishioners. It was the business of the police, and of those who instructed them, to take measures for the maintenance of the public peace during the celebration of Divine service in the church. He must say, however, that he did not consider it to be one of the ordinary duties of the police to mount guard during the performance of Divine service in any church. If such a state of things were to become common, it would be necessary that there should be a change in the law, so as to make it somewhat analogous to that which existed in

Ireland, by which, when a district was disturbed, it was possible to impose a fine upon it for the maintenance of an additional body of police. In answer to the question, all he had to say was, that such instructions had been given to the police as would, he hoped, prevent any disturbance which might be offensive to public decorum during the performance of Divine service.

ANNEXATION OF SAVOY TO FRANCE.

QUESTION.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: I wish to put a question to Her Majesty's Government which, I think, the House will agree with me is one of considerable importance. I am afraid I shall not be able to elicit a reply from my noble Friend at the Foreign Office or my noble Friend the Prime Minister, as both of them have already addressed the House; but perhaps the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, who took considerable interest in the question the other night, or the Chancellor of the Exchequer, may reply to it. Perhaps, indeed, the Chancellor of the Exchequer may be the more proper person, for it is, as the House will see, a question of great subtlety and nicety. I am sure the House must be far from satisfied with the reply which we have received to-night from the noble Lord the Minister for Foreign Affairs. The reply which he gave is far from satisfactory, and I do but interpret the opinion of every Gentleman in this House when I say that we have all read the official announcement contained in the recent Speech of the Emperor of the French with the deepest emotion and concern, because it is now evident that the Emperor of the French is determined, in spite of this Government and in spite of Europe, to avail himself of the opportunity which the existing state of affairs presents, and to take by force Savoy. It would be unfitting to enter upon any discussion now; only I hope that an opportunity will soon be afforded, for it is one of the very greatest importance. I have been told that the discussion which took place here the other night, and especially the statement of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, has had considerable effect in Paris; and it is reported that the Emperor of the French says that after all the sacrifices he has made to England, both politically and commercially, he finds he has gained nothing whatever, except the support of his hon. friend, Monsieur Milnes. The question, Sir, which I have to put refers to a reading in the Speech of the Emperor of the French. The House will not have failed to remark that that Speech is given differently in The Times and The Daily News from what it is in The Morning Post. Now, The Morning Post, it is currently reported, represents not only the opinions of a portion of Her Majesty's Government, but the general bearings of the policy of the Tuileries. The sentence to which I refer reads in The Times and The Daily News as follows:—"En présence de cette transformation de l'Italie du Nord, qui donne à un état puissant tous les passages des Alpes, il était de mon devoir, pour la sûreté de nos frontières, de réclamer les versants Français," &c. His Majesty goes on—"Cette revendication d'un territoire de peu d'étendue," &c. But in The Morning Post the words are "Cette réclamation," &c. Now, the difference between these two terms is most important, and I call on Her Majesty's Government to state to Parliament and the country what is the proper interpretation to be put upon those phrases of the Emperor of the French. In 1792 the French took possession of Savoy. Now, according to the one phrase France claims — revendiqués — that is, it asserts a claim to that which it pretends it has a right to have. I hope I make myself understood by the House. While, according to the other, France only hopes to obtain a frontier which she thinks is essential to her security. I, therefore, call the attention of the Government to this question, and I say that not one day should be allowed to pass—if the sense of the House coincides with the opinion which I entertain—without our having an opportunity of discussing this question of Savoy, which involves the handing over the liberties of many thousands of people like so many slaves to the will and pleasure of the Emperor of the French, and against the popular sentiment of the people themselves. Something of the kind was done at the end of the last century, in the partition of Poland; but I hope this will not be the case with Savoy. I know that the universal feeling in Savoy is opposed to the annexation—they look with pride and pleasure to their connection with Piedmont; but if that connection must be severed then—as it is a curious fact, however it may be accounted for, that all mountainous and secluded people have a tendency towards republicanism—they naturally desire not to be tied to the discipline of tyranny and despotism, but their desire is to join the free, liberal, and glorious country of Switzerland, their neighbour. I do not throw out this as my opinion alone, and I regret that the noble Lord was so quick in his reply to former questions, as to prevent him from giving any expression of opinions now in explanation; but I hope the House will allow him to reply. It is most important for the House to know whether France is "claiming back" what she once had in 1792, and which Europe took from her in 1815, or whether she is submitting to Europe that the formation of an immense State, containing 9,000,000 of people in Northern Italy united under one dynasty, does not make it necessary for her "to obtain possession" of a property which will give her command of the "versants" of the Alps towards France?

Sir Robert Peel

MR. BRIGHT: Before any Member of the Government answers this question, I should like to put a question to the hon. Baronet himself, and that is, what is it he proposes to do in this case? because it is merely idling away our time—not only idling away our time, but creating greater complications in a matter of this nature, if there be no policy which the House and the Government can take upon it, or which the hon. Baronet can recommend. We are not the Parliament of France—we are not the Parliament of Savoy—we are not the Parliament of Europe—but we are the Parliament of England; and, unless it can be shown that there is any direct and obvious interest which this country has in some of these foreign questions which are constantly brought before us, what an absurd spectacle do we offer to Europe and the world with these repeated discussions! What can be more extravagant than the language in which the hon. Baronet has addressed us on this question? One would suppose that, not only Europe, but England itself, was on fire; and I am afraid the hon. Baronet's language would not extinguish it, but make it more extensive, and, if possible, hotter. Let us examine the question a little. It is not a matter which we ought to view with passion. Perhaps we are all agreed that it would be much better that every State in Europe should remain content—if its condition would permit—and that there should be no attempt on the part of anybody to disturb the boundaries of any of the existing States. But that is not the state of things, nor can we expect it. At this very moment we know that our own Government, with the approbation probably of a large majority of our fellow countrymen, are consenting parties to alterations of the boundaries of several States in Italy; and it is quite possible to imagine that the right hon. Member for Bucks and his colleagues, if they had been on these benches, would have had to consent to changes which, if no disturbances had occurred, they would not at first have recommended. But hon. Gentlemen seem to suppose that because things were settled in 1815—a settlement which was merely an unsettlement of everything—that, therefore, we, as a Conservative nation, are to stand by that settlement, and resist any disturbance of it; and that after having been consenting parties to the separation of Holland from Belgium, and to that which is now going on in Italy, we are to rouse ourselves to some new exhibition of virtue on behalf of Savoy, and are to charge the Emperor of the French with some grievous treason to Europe, because he does not regard the Treaty of Vienna as the Government and the governing classes of this country do. What is the Treaty of Vienna to him but a great compact which signed for the moment the overthrow, if not the degradation, of his family. He must regard with pleasure—any man in his place must—the crumbling into ruin of a fabric which never should have been erected, and which never, by any possibility, could for a long time have subsisted. I agree with the hon. Gentleman in regretting not only that this question has been raised here, but that it should have been raised in Paris. I say that this step will produce no accession of power and no advantage to France. [Oh!] Well, if France can become more powerful by the addition of the scanty population of a mountainous region, it is more than I can exactly calculate or appreciate. I do not believe that Sardinia will be sensibly weakened or changed if the transfer takes place. I doubt extremely whether any disadvantageous circumstances will arise to the people of Savoy. But let us for one moment suppose that France and Sardinia are agreed—I know not if they are—but let us suppose they have determined to apply to the people of Savoy the principle which the Governments are now willing should be applied to the people of Central Italy. The hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth argued on the assumption that the people of Savoy are about to be transferred by some great force from a state of blissful freedom to a state of degradation and servitude. Well, that is certainly not very complimentary to the French people, who may be quite as well pleased with their institutions as we are with ours, and who may feel satisfied with the social liberty which we have not, and may even prefer it to the political liberty which we have. I do not pretend to know more than the hon. Baronet, but I have heard from persons of high authority that the inhabitants of Savoy have not only no objection to the transfer, but would prefer to be annexed to France. We may all be sorry that it is so; but I will tell the House the reason. The best authority that I have been able to consult in this matter has assured me that the annexation of Savoy to France would go far to double the value of all the landed property in that country. I would not give much for the loyalty of other persons besides the people of Savoy, if I could promise them to double the value of all the landed property in the kingdom. I am told further that the intelligent portion of the labouring classes of that province are well aware that the annexation would add greatly to the value of labour in the district. Lyons is not more than from two to three hours' journey, if so much, from Chamberry; the manufacturers of Lyons, with their capital, their looms, and their industry, would instantly spread through the valleys of that province, and an immediate addition would be made to the value of everything which now exists in Savoy. Now, I don't want the Government to give the slightest countenance to this transference; I do not want them, on the other hand, to give the slightest opposition to it. The opposition, if you give it, must be futile; you cannot prevent the transference of Savoy, but you may, if you like, embroil Europe and bring England into collision with France. I say, perish Savoy—though Savoy, I believe, will not perish and will not suffer—rather than we, the representatives of the people of England, should involve the Government of this country with the people and the Government of France on a matter in which we have really no interest whatever. But Savoy would not perish nor even suffer. I find, unfortunately, that the more remote a foreign question appears to be from our own interests, the more it appears to absorb the sympathies of certain Members of the House. Have we not for generations past endeavoured to settle the map of Europe? Have we not—as if it were not worth a thought—spent blood and treasure for the purpose of fixing certain boundaries, and de-elaring that certain provinces and kingdoms should belong to certain families; and have we not utterly and ignominiously failed in every attempt that we have made? Let us, then, in the name of common sense, and of the interests of the people of England, judge, if we can, this question calmly and dispassionately, as a matter which really concerns only the kingdom of France, the kingdom of Sardinia, and the people of Savoy. And if these two kingdoms have agreed on the transfer, and the people of Savoy themselves are favourable to it, I say it is contrary to the interests of England, and to the honour of the English Government, to pretend to interpose against a transaction which, though I would never have recommended or promoted it, is yet, I am sure, not worth the imposition of a single tax on Englishmen, or the expenditure of a single drop of blood, for one moment to prevent.

LORD JOHN MANNERS: I was glad to hear from the hon. Gentleman that this is the Parliament of England, and not of France. But I think we at least have made this discovery from the speech of the hon. Gentleman, that if this be the Parliament of England, and not of France, at any rate France is not unrepresented in our body. Suspicions may have been previously entertained throughout England as to the reasons which have induced the hon. Gentleman to show such marked attachment and to profess such unwonted affection for certain treaties and engagements which have recently formed the subject of discussion in this House; but we now know that there is no price which the hon. Gentleman is not willing to pay rather than these objects, to which he attaches so much importance, should fail of being carried into effect. The hon. Gentleman, I hope, does not speak the sentiments of Her Majesty's Government on this question. Certain I am that he does not speak the sentiments of the people of England. We now know the measure and bounds of the loyalty of the hon. Gentleman—if he gets fourpence where he used to get twopence he does not hesitate to tell us that transfers his loyalty and his allegiance. For great as is the opinion which the hon. Gentleman undoubtedly entertains of himself, I do not attribute to him such overweening vanity as to suppose that when he said there were great classes who would not hesitate to transfer their loyalty if their incomes were doubled, he meant that he himself was above such considerations. He spoke, I doubt not, from an intimate knowledge of his own heart and sentiments; and there I leave the hon. Gentleman. But I trust the Government do not sympathize with the statement which we have heard from his lips. "Perish Savoy," says the hon. Gentleman; perish the freedom of the Press; perish Constitutional Government; perish everything which stands in the way of the realization of our treaty with France! But the hon. Gentleman went so far as to say it mattered nothing whether France annexed this or that country; for the statement which he made was general. Annex Savoy! it is natural that it should be annexed; he has received information—he does not tell us from what quarter—that the people of Savoy wish it. Annex Belgium! The hon. Gentleman, no doubt, will be able, at the proper moment to inform the House of Commons he has information in his pocket that the people of Belgium wish to be annexed. Annex the Rhenish provinces of Prussia! We shall have a similar statement from the hon. Gentleman. But, I ask, is this the language of an English Member of Parliament? Does this language represent the feelings of the people of England? Is the determination of the hon. Gentleman the determination of this House and of those who sent us here? I believe, nay, I am confident, the hon. Member stands alone in the expression of those opinions. I wish now to ask one further question of the noble Lord the Member for the City of London, which I trust he will be good enough to answer. The noble Lord, at the outset of this somewhat irregular discussion, stated very correctly that a short time ago he informed the House that he was told by the French Government the Emperor of France would not proceed to annex Savoy without consulting the great Powers of Europe. This afternoon the noble Lord read a statement of the Emperor of the French made in Paris yesterday, of which the language is as follows:—"France does not wish to proceed to this aggradizement, however small it may be, either by military occupation or provoked insurrection, or by underhand manoeuvres, but by frankly explaining the question to the great Powers." The question I wish to ask is, whether, in the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, there is any divergence from the language held a fortnight ago in that which is now employed, or whether Her Majesty's Government are of opinion that when the Emperor of the French says he intends to "explain" the question to the great Powers, he is still inclined to "consult" them previous to the annexation; for the House will at once see there is an important difference. If you consult a person, you may be fairly presumed to be willing to act upon the advice which you receive; but if you merely explain the motives for an act, it is not so apparent that any opportunity for advice will be given, or if it be given that it is at all likely to be followed. Therefore, I should like the noble Lord to tell us, if he can, what construction Her Majesty's Government put on the more recent language as compared with that of a fortnight ago on the same subject.

Mr. Bright

MR. MONCKTON MILNES said, that this was a question of much gravity, and he would entreat the House to approach its consideration neither wholly in the spirit of the hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth, nor in that of his hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham. On a question of great European interest of this kind the House would not be doing justice to themselves or to their country by any personal recriminations, or by representing that any Member really had at heart any other desire than that the peace of Europe should not be disturbed. He trusted that when they came to the consideration of this question they would remember there were two elements which had been strangely left out of sight;—namely, the relation of this question to the general arrangement of Italian affairs, and the re-establishment of that great nation to which they were all looking forward with impatient and interested eyes. The question of Sardinia only came before them incidentally in relation to the great question of the nationality of Italy, and was no way essential as an Italian people to the re-establishment of an Italian nation in Europe; and he did not think any one would say that the liberation of three millions of people in Lombardy from the yoke of centuries, and their transference to a constitutional government, was not well worth the prize now sought for. In his opinion the people of Savoy had always represented the opinions of the Government of France, and had been opposed to every principle of civil and religious liberty in the Piedmontese Parliament. They had very little sympathy with the struggles in which the people of Italy were engaged, and his belief was that they would prefer to join a country which was more in accordance with their notions of religion and politics. This certainly could be done without in any degree disturbing the peace of Europe; and, supposing all other circumstances to be satisfactory, the annexation of Savoy would be no unjust compensation to France for the 50,000 lives she had sacrificed and the millions of money she had expended in the cause of Italy. What had we done for Italy which could for a moment compare with what France had done for her? He had not approached this question as a Member representing the interests of France. He trusted none of them were representatives either of Sardinia or France, but that they only represented English interests and English honour.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: I cannot allow this discussion to close without answering the question of the noble Lord (Lord John Manners), and making some observations on what has occurred in the House just now. The noble Lord asks whether I understand that the Emperor of the French means merely to explain his case for the annexation of Savoy, or whether he means to consult the Powers of Europe. Upon reading the speech of the Emperor of the French, and on hearing the explanation which the Ambassador of France has given me to-day, I can have no doubt that it is the intention of the Emperor of the French to consult the great Powers of Europe with respect to the annexation of Savoy. And now, if the noble Lord will permit it, let us a little consider what is the position of the Emperor of the French with respect to this question. This is not a question relating solely to his own power and position, but it is a question relating to the position of France and her security in Europe. It is alleged by a great portion of the French people, and certainly alleged by statesmen attached to very different dynasties from the Emperor's, that the aggrandizement of power beyond the Alps and the addition to the kingdom of Sardinia of a considerable territory would make France worse as regards her security, and would enable the King of Sardinia, in case of war, and being engaged on the side of other Powers, so to threaten the French frontier as to make it necessary for the Sovereign of France to keep two armies, one on the side of Savoy the other on the side of Nice in order to guard against the danger of invasion. Wishing, therefore, as he and his Government state, to maintain the same security as they hitherto have had, and thinking that that security would be impaired by the creation of such a kingdom as I have mentioned, the Emperor of the French says that it is but due to the security of France, if the consent of the people of Savoy can be obtained, to annex that country to France; but he has also stated some time ago, and I understand he states it now—and this in my opinion is the meaning of the speech which has just been pronounced—that he wishes to consult the great Powers of Europe on that very annexation. I beg the House to consider that it cannot be a matter of indifference to any ruler of France what is the opinion of Europe generally, and of the great Powers, upon his position. In this very Speech the Emperor of the French states that he is not going to annex Savoy by way of military conquest. What does that mean? It means that he is not ready to encounter the general disapprobation and distrust of Europe, but that he believes that his Government can lay such statements before the different Powers of Europe as would enable him, without reproach and with their consent, to make this annexation of Savoy. I differ from the Government of France in these sentiments. I, as belonging to one of the Powers of Europe concerned, not being in the situation of either France or Sardinia, conceive that the annexation of Savoy and the occupation of the passes of the Alps would be more threatening to Italy than the present situation of affairs is threatening to France. At the same time, I must beg to impress on the House this further consideration. The Powers of Europe are to be consulted;—but England is a Power which does not merely consist of the executive Government, but also of the Crown and the Parliament of the United Kingdom; therefore, I should be far from wishing that on this matter the Parliament of England should not hold and pronounce its opinion; but there is this to be said, that if we are to raise, as I think the hon. Member for Tamworth seemed disposed to do, angry discussions on this subject,—if we are to take mere assertions in the place of truth, and to suppose bad motives on the part of a friendly Sovereign,—I say the only effect of debates carried on in such a temper would be to excite angry feelings, not only between the executive Government of France and the Government of England, but between the people of France and the people of England; and I cannot conceive, however much the noble Lord opposite may vaunt his own patriotism

Lord John Russell

as opposed to that of the hon. Member for Birmingham, that a man could render a worse service to England than endeavour to raise feelings which would necessarily lead to sentiments of suspicion and hostility on the part of both countries. It is from such feelings that ruptures arise. I have already said that I think that the Emperor of the French is wrong on this subject, and that he has proposed an annexation which he was not justified in asking for; but I say that this is a question to be fairly considered, and there can be no advantage to this country or to Europe in making it a question of anger, and not of calm consideration in respect to all the reasons that can be alleged on the one side and on the other. I have stated that the Emperor of the French had declared that after consulting with the great Powers of Europe, and obtaining likewise the consent of the people of Savoy, he wished to make this addition to his dominions,—I say “with the consent of the people of Savoy,” because our Ambassador at Paris has pointedly asked that question of M. Thouvenel. M. Thouvenel being so applied to, in consequence of the Emperor’s speech not mentioning the consent of the people of Savoy, with the view of its being ascertained whether the Emperor of the French had changed his determination on this point, gave the assurance that no change had taken place in that respect, and that the Emperor was as determined as before not to attempt the annexation without the consent of the people of Savoy. I must say that I heard with concern the speech of the hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth, and I should not be conveying my impression of the discussion if I did not add that I also heard with great concern the speech of the hon. Member for Birmingham. I believe that these questions are mixed up with the general relations of the Powers of Europe to each other; that they have an important bearing on the confidence which one State is disposed to place in another; and that the independence of the different States does constitute that security in Europe without which neither trade nor commerce nor social intercourse can subsist. A great change has been brought about in Italy. That change, while it will be, I trust, for the benefit of the people of Italy, breaks off old relations, establishes new ties, and cannot be accomplished without the risk of further disturbance and of further collision between Powers which are now to be separated by new boundaries, and which, at the same time, are animated by old hatreds and by old animosities. Sir, it appears to me that it is the duty of the English Government, and, I will add, it is the duty of the English Parliament to consider in this state of affairs how best the peace of Europe can be maintained and consolidated, to give no reason for an increase of suspicion and animosity towards us on the part of other Powers, and above all, not by premature discussion, while the papers on this subject are yet unread, come to conclusions which may be unwarranted, and to form judgments upon the conduct of foreign Sovereigns, which afterwards, when the full evidence is before you, you may find to be inconsistent with the position of this country and unfair towards the ruler of a country like France, with whom it is our interest to keep on terms of friendship and alliance.

SIR ROBERT PEELE assured the House that nothing was further from his intention than to raise angry discussions as regarded the relative positions of this country with France. He was a warm adherent of the alliance with France, and he would be the last man to sow seeds of dissensions which would endanger its further continuance. As regarded the observations of the hon. Member for Birmingham, he could only assure him that when he (Sir R. Peel) endeavoured to advocate the interests of Savoy, he had reason to believe that he was representing the opinions of a very large number of the inhabitants of that country.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: I omitted to notice the question asked by the hon. Baronet as to the versions of the Emperor's speech which appear in different newspapers. We have only got a telegram, which may be incorrect, and I do not think the House can judge which is the correct version of the speech until it appears in the Moniteur, which I think will not have taken place until this morning.

THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR wished to revert for a few moments to a subject respecting which the hon. Member for Honiton (Mr. Locke) had already asked a question. It appeared that the decision of the Trustees of the British Museum in favour of the removal of the Natural History collection had been carried by the casting vote of the noble Lord at the head of the Government. The House would recollect that a Select Committee of that House had reported against building a National Gallery at Kensington, on the ground that that locality was too far-removed from the great mass of the inhabitants of the metropolis, and that to place it there would be to consult the interests of the rich alone. The same argument applied with increased force to the removal of the collection of Natural History from the British Museum. The noble Lord had not given a full and satisfactory answer to the hon. Member for Honiton. The noble Lord said the Trustees had determined to remove the collection, but that they had not determined to what place. He (Mr. Danby Seymour) found that at the meeting at which that decision was come to, and which was called in a very extraordinary manner, two questions were raised—first, whether the collection should be removed, and next, whether it should go to Kensington; and a committee of Trustees was appointed to ascertain what would be the difference in the cost of buying five acres of land at Kensington and five acres near the British Museum. It therefore appeared that the removal to Kensington was nearly determined upon. But he really thought that before it was, contrary as it virtually would be to the decision of the Select Committee, the whole subject should be brought before another committee. It was said that the Commissioners of the Great Exhibition would sell the land required at a low rate, and that the gain which would result from fixing the site at Kensington instead of in the neighbourhood of the Museum would be £212,000. But it must be remembered that if the collection were taken to Kensington, a most expensive museum would be required. But even supposing there was a gain of £100,000 by the transaction, that would not counterbalance the objection to removing the collection to a portion of the town entirely inhabited by the rich and luxurious. To take away the Natural History collection was to destroy one of the most attractive portions of the British Museum, which was largely resorted to by the working classes. Surely before a determination was taken, which virtually ignored the decision of a Committee of that House, the subject should be brought under the notice of Parliament. He believed that some underhand means were used by certain influential persons in this country to remove the National Collections to the west-end of London, in spite of the popular branch of the Legislature. He said "underhand means," because, while no attempt was made to popularize the other national collections, large sums were being spent at Kensington in giving lectures, in lighting with gas the buildings erected there, in registering day by day the number of visitors, in establishing schools, opening the galleries at night, giving conversaziones, and sending out cards of invitation to all whose support might be valuable hereafter. Everything, in fact, was done to popularize the Exhibition at Kensington, with the ultimate view, he believed, of removing the natural collection to that end of the town. The British Museum was now accessible to the mass of the population, and for all purposes was far better in its present position. With regard to the new building which would become necessary, it was certain that if the present system of nepotism continued, and the Smirke family was employed from father to son to make the estimates, the public money would be wasted in the future as it had been in the past. Mr. Smirke was not a proper person to call in for the purpose of making these estimates. For nearly a century the Smirke family, from father to son, had received pay from the nation; it was time that talent should be called forth from some other source. The trustees of the British Museum, on which large sums of public money were yearly spent, ought not to be allowed to take so important a step by such a bare majority as the vote of the noble Lord the head of the Government.

CUSTOMS' ESTABLISHMENTS.

QUESTION.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he wished to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, with a view to the interests of the public service, the Treasury contemplates, in the revision of the Customs Department which must necessarily take place consequent upon the alterations in the Tariff, placing those Officers on the Superannuation or Redundant List who have hitherto been found unworthy of reward or unfit for promotion; and further, whether any provision will be made for the purpose of bringing forward those Officers, without regard to the mere routine system of promotion, who, from their knowledge of commercial matters, and possessing the confidence of the mercantile world, are more likely to carry out the new arrangement to the satisfaction of the public.

Mr. Danby Seymour

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER entirely sympathised with the spirit in which the hon. Member had put his Question. He was probably aware that for many years promotion in the Revenue Department had not been in the hands of the political advisers of the Crown, but had been left to the heads of that Department. That was a very wise arrangement, made originally by Lord Liverpool, and it had worked very well. The promotion which would take place in consequence of these changes would be made by the Treasury, and he certainly thought the hon. Member had given a just description of the principles on which it ought to proceed—namely, that advantage ought to be taken of the opportunity to place on the superannuation list, or even on the redundant list, if necessary, such persons as are of inferior or declining efficiency, on account of age or ill health, and that the consequent promotions ought not to be made in the spirit of routine, but with a view to further improvements in the administration of what he believed was, on the whole, a well-governed service. He hoped the House would not consider it necessary to continue the discussion of the removal of any part of the collections of the British Museum. There were other questions more urgent as to time. It was very inconvenient to keep the commercial interests of London and other places in a state of anxiety and uncertainty. Hon. Gentlemen who had Motions on the British Museum might rest assured that nothing would be done to fetter the free discretion of the House without the fullest discussion of the subject.

Motion agreed to.

House at rising to adjourn till Monday next.

CUSTOMS ACTS.—REPORT.

Resolution—

"That the Duties of Customs chargeable upon the Goods, Wares, and Merchandise hereinafter mentioned, imported into Great Britain and Ireland, shall cease and determine," &c.

Resolution reported.

MR. NEWDEGATE rose to move as an Amendment to the Resolution, "that the present duties on silk manufactures imported into the United Kingdom be retained until October 1, 1861." He thought the House would agree with him that there was a certain extreme school in that House whose attachment to a system of free imports was so great that it made them forget their attachment to free institutions; and that he was justified in asserting this, from what had fallen from the hon. Member for Birmingham, when he said, "Perish Savoy. Let Savoy perish."

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member must not refer to what has passed in a former debate.

MR. NEWDEGATE believed, however, that he might say that what had passed in that House justified him in the assertion that there was a certain extreme school in that House that overlooked the value of free institutions in their attachment to the system of free imports. He could only say of that hon. Member—"Fatetur Reus." He trusted that the House would not be actuated by so blind a spirit, but that in considering the Motion which he now submitted, they would extend to those who were engaged in the manufacture of silks the same justice that it was proposed should be extended to those engaged in the manufacture of gloves and of corks, and that they would, notwithstanding all that might be said against the late Sir Robert Peel and his tariff, carry out his policy. That great statesman was not to be less valued for the consideration of the interests of his country than for his other qualities. He might be told that delay would be extremely inconvenient to the importers of goods who were speculating on an immediate change, with their warehouses full of French goods, which they expected would be admitted immediately duty free; he might be told that it was not in the interest of the master manufacturers that such a change should be delayed. But the casual interest of the importer ought not to be supreme, and he had been present at meetings of master manufacturers, where he found the great majority of them decidedly of opinion that there was too great a suddenness in the change now proposed, and that it was to their interest that the same means of mitigating its effects should be adopted that were adopted by Sir Robert Peel on his changes of tariff, and which are pursued by the Government of France with reference to similar reductions of duty which the Emperor contemplated in his tariff. The difference in the action of this Treaty upon the manufacturers and operatives of France and England respectively could not be more clearly indicated than in the terms of the Treaty itself. The 14th and 15th Articles of the Treaty set forth:—

"ARTICLE XIV.

"Further, Her Britannic Majesty reserves to herself the power of retaining, upon special grounds, and by way of exception, during a period not exceeding two years, dating from the 1st of April, 1860, half of the duties on those articles the free admission of which is stipulated by the present Treaty.

"This reserve, however, does not apply to articles of silk manufacture."

He (Mr. Newdegate) could not understand why this exception against the English silk trade was made; why this trade was specified as one which should be especially excluded from the sympathy which Her Majesty was authorized to exhibit towards other branches of industry. But the contrast between this treatment of the English silk trade by the English Government and that of French interests by the Government of France was still more striking:—

"ARTICLE XV.

"The engagements contracted by His Majesty the Emperor of the French shall be fulfilled, and the tariffs previously indicated as payable on British goods and manufactures shall be applied, within the following periods:—

"1. For coal and coke, from the 1st July, 1860.

"2. For bar and pig iron, and for steel of the kinds which are not subject to prohibition, from the 1st October, 1860.

"3. For worked metals, machines, tools, and mechanical instruments of all sorts, within a period which shall not exceed the 31st December, 1860.

"4. For yarns and manufactures in flax and hemp, from the 1st June, 1861.

"5. And for all other articles from the 1st October, 1861."

It would be seen from this, that there was a special exemption against any delay in bringing the proposed change into operation with reference to the silk manufacture. The reservations in these Articles were the reservations of the French Government, (and how ample were they) in order to prepare the interests of that country for the change. The Emperor of the French, in his Speech said:—

"I have, therefore, taken resolutely upon myself the responsibility of this great measure. A very simple reflection proves its advantages for both countries. Neither the one nor the other assuredly would have failed within a few years to take, each in its own interest, the initiative of the measures proposed; but then, the lowering of tariffs not being simultaneous, they would have taken place on one side and on the other without immediate compensation. The Treaty has done nothing more, then, than to anticipate the period of salutary modifications, and to give to indispensable reforms the character of reciprocal concessions, destined to strengthen the alliance of two great peoples."

Such were the opinions, such the cautious progress of the Emperor of the French with reference to the reductions of duties, and the removal of restrictions upon the importation into France, and he was a wise governor. Sir Robert Peel was not wanting in the same consideration for the interests that his policy affected, and especially for the labourers engaged in them; he trusted, therefore, that the House would accept these high authorities in favour of the proposition before the House with reference to the industry employed in the silk trade. They were told that the Government were negotiating a Supplementary Treaty; and, if so, he could conceive no more proper subject for negotiation than placing the silk trade on a fair and equal footing with others. It might be urged that delay would injure the large manufacturers. He, however, received the best information possible on the subject, that it would be most advantageous to that class. But he submitted to the House the interests of the labouring classes, which were much more deeply involved in the proposed arrangement. Those classes would at all events for some time be exposed to great distress by the contemplated change. No one had ventured to deny that fact. It was true that the Chancellor of the Exchequer disposed of this consideration by saying that trade would ultimately revive. But was it of no account that the suddenness of this change should aggravate the distress. He (Mr. Newdegate) would remind the right hon. Gentleman of the distress that was occasioned by Mr. Huskisson's changes and the changes that took place in 1846. The question was, how they could mitigate the evil which was inevitable. He did not ask the right hon. Gentleman to give up his scheme or to abandon his project. He merely urged upon him a simple means of breaking the force of the shock which the Government were about to inflict, that the duties upon ribbons and other silk articles exceeded the value of the labour expended upon the commodity. So great was the comparative value of the raw material. This showed the importance of the change as it affected the industry employed in the manufacture. Was it without reason that the late Sir Robert Peel left this protection? He had before stated that although the total imports of silk goods had trebled, the exports from this country had doubled since 1846. But how stood the trade with France? He held in his hand an account of the imports and exports of silk goods between this country and France during five years ending with the year 1858. They were as follows:—

Mr. Newdegate

IMPORTS AND EXPORTS OF SILK MANUFACTURES.

Imports from France.		Exports to France.
1854	£1,712,872	... £49,635
1855	1,546,001	... 50,444
1856	1,747,641	... 55,501
1857	1,358,741	... 52,881
1858	1,549,231	... 42,166
<hr/>		<hr/>
£7,914,486		£250,627

He thought he need do no more to show the House that by the proposed arrangement the trade of this country would be sacrificed for the period of eighteen months, at all events, during which France would continue a system of virtual prohibition against the manufactures of this kingdom, while French goods were to be imported into this country at once free of duty. The pressure would be felt severely by the industrious classes from the sudden abandonment of our duties upon silk goods. He did not wish to detain the House longer. He was yesterday charged by the Chancellor of the Exchequer with having made a long speech, and with being moderate in the expression of his opinions. He believed that it was that very moderation which made the right hon. Gentleman think his speech long. He could assure the right hon. Gentleman that he did not mean to abandon that element of length when urging what he knew was the opinion of the master manufacturers in his district and the interests of the operatives. He (Mr. Newdegate) thought it was clear that if the Chancellor of the Exchequer had to deal with English interests as the Emperor of the French dealt with French interests, he would delay until the period he had named the abolition of those duties. That was the substance of his proposal. He could not think that the House would be guided by the headlong doctrines of the hon. Member for Birmingham; but that they would exercise their privileges as an independent Legislature, truly representing English interests — that they would consequently extend to those men who humbly approached them that measure of consideration which the late Sir Robert Peel had never failed to afford, which the example of France justified, and which he believed was in accordance with the judgment of the highest intellects in Europe. The hon. Member was about to move his Resolution, when—

MR. SPEAKER said, that it would be more in accordance with the rules of the House to make the Motion when the article to which it related was named by the Clerk at the table in the order in which it stood in the Report.

Resolution read 2^o, and agreed to, down to "Clocks, as denominated in the Tariff."

"Corks, ready made, and squared for rounding, the produce or manufacture of, or imported from, France or Algeria, after 31st March, 1862."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER moved that the words "and squared for rounding" be struck out.

MR. VANCE said, he had that day received a communication from the cork-cutting trade of Dublin, in which it was stated that the proposed alteration in the tariff regarding that article, would totally destroy their trade. He entreated the right hon. Gentleman to take their situation into consideration, with a view of devising some means by which the impending evil might be averted. Perhaps the Government might use its influence with the Government of Spain to obtain an abolition of the export duty on cork.

MR. BLAKE said, he had received a similar communication from a portion of his constituents. He also urged the justice of their application to the generosity and forbearance of the right hon. Gentleman—at any rate to extend the time for six months. He had hitherto supported the Government in the alterations they proposed in the tariff; but seeing the distress and difficulty which this change would occasion to a large class of industrious people, he could not vote with them in favour of the proposition. He asked the right hon. Gentleman whether he could hold out any hope that the raw material could be had from the British possessions.

MR. BENTINCK had also received various communications from his constituency upon this question. It appeared to him that the hon. Gentleman who had just addressed the House had unconsciously shown them the precise cause of the weakness of all the interests assailed by the new tariff. The hon. Gentleman said, he supported every detail of the Budget except that which attacked the interest which closely affected a portion of his constituency. Now that was precisely what had happened in regard to every article affected by the propositions of the right hon. Gentleman. Each interest was left to defend itself; there was no union of opposition. It was inconceivable folly for each interest to fight for itself, because being disunited the Chancellor of the Exchequer was enabled to massacre them all in detail. He heard an hon. Gentleman the other evening say he was a Conservative, and in commenting upon the manner in which those various industrious classes allowed themselves to be the dupes of the Free-trade schemers of 1846, remarked that the hour had now come for inflicting upon those various interests a just retribution. Now, he (Mr. Bentinck) could not accord in those sentiments. As a Conservative Member of that House he felt it was his duty to lend his support to the interests that were attacked, without reference to any political circumstances of past years. He had heard another speech from an hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Ayrton), who spoke in a manner that did honour to his head and heart. The hon. Gentlemen represented a large constituency, a portion of whom were likely to be serious sufferers from the proposed abolition of those duties. But how was the hon. Gentleman's speech received? He was taunted with having relinquished free trade and adopted protection as his principles. He (Mr. Bentinck) was one of those who had never varied from his principles, and he should hail with pleasure so great a convert.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is not in order in referring to past debates, and in replying to speeches that have been made in a past debate.

MR. BENTINCK said, he thought he had kept within order by referring to an indefinite time. He was not discussing the principles of Protection or Free-trade, but arguing a particular case, involving the interests of an industrious class of operatives. Whenever an appeal of such a kind was made to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that right hon. Gentleman immediately fled off at a tangent, and made one of those brilliant speeches which were more calculated to charm the ear than to convince the understanding. Such speeches, however eloquent, contained nothing but Free-trade claptraps. The late Sir Robert Peel never contended for Free-trade in the manner in which the right hon. Gentleman did. That great statesman always attended to the interests and the welfare of the labouring classes, with but one memorable exception. But the Chancellor of the Exchequer passed by all such vulgar considerations, and urged forward his Free-trade principles, utterly regardless of the interests he was sacrificing. The right hon. Gentleman appeared to him (Mr. Bentinck) to be the advocate not of the rational principles of Free-trade, but of Free-trade gone mad. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer persevered in carrying out his opinions to the utmost, he could only do so at the cost of great suffering, and possibly of the lives of thousands of the most helpless and dependent of our fellow-countrymen. The right hon. Gentleman had never yet ventured to grapple with that part of the subject, or how he meant to avert the disastrous consequences of his policy. He would by his measures, without any rational object whatever, reduce to possible starvation hundreds, if not thousands of those who were solely dependent upon their industry for their subsistence. He knew that those arguments could make no impression on the right hon. Gentleman, but when the time came for him to witness the sufferings he had occasioned, he (Mr. Bentinck) would not envy the feelings of the right hon. Gentleman on beholding the results of his legislation.

MR. DODSON said, he could understand several menaced interests huddling together, like a flock of frightened sheep, for the general safety; but he could not understand why the representatives of the agricultural interest, which was no longer protected, should fight the Budget inch by inch. What had they to lose by free trade? If the meat, wool, and dairy produce of the English farmer were exposed to unrestricted competition in the market of the world, surely he had a right to claim that the paper on which he wrote, or with which he hung his rooms, as well as the silks, bonnets, and artificial flowers which any member of his family might choose to wear, should not be artificially enhanced by legislative protection. If they were to have free trade on one side let it be fully and fairly carried out. The dismal vaticinations of the hon. Member for Norfolk had been resorted to every time during the last fourteen years that any protective duty was to be removed from the tariff; and he felt confident if this measure were carried out, as he trusted it would be, with regard to silk, in a very few years that trade, instead of being depressed, would be in a more flourishing and healthy state than it was at present.

MR. SPEAKER reminded the House that they were now discussing the subject of "corks, ready made, and squared for rounding."

Mr. Bentinck

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he would not only confine himself to "corks," but to "corks squared for rounding." What he had now to propose was in order to meet a wish expressed by the hon. Member for Finsbury—namely, that "corks squared for rounding" should be admitted duty free, in order, as far as possible, to meet the claim of the workmen and manufacturers to what was much more in the nature of a raw material than a manufactured article, although it had undergone a certain extent of manufacture.

SIR MORTON PETO inquired whether the Government had any proposal now to make with regard to the cork-wood from Catalonia?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the Article referred strictly to "the produce or manufacture of or imported from France or Algeria." The subject to which reference had just been made was beyond the scope of the Commercial Treaty with France. But he would be prepared to make a proposal on that part of the subject when they came to the next Resolution. With respect to another suggestion that had been made, that his noble Friend at the head of the Foreign Office should use the influence of the Government with Spain to procure a repeal of the prohibition to export cork wood from Catalonia, he was quite sure there would be every disposition to do so; at the same time, as the question had been raised, he wished to disabuse the minds of hon. Gentlemen of the belief that the removal of that prohibition would be of any great consequence to the cork-cutters of this country. In the first place, it was quite a mistake to suppose that the prohibition had been imposed subsequent to, or in consequence of, our alterations in the Tariff of 1842. It existed when there was a protective duty in this country, and was directed against export to France, not to England. Between France and Spain, both being capable of producing cork-wood, and both having workmen who were very clever in the trade, there was a natural rivalry. In Girona, a town of Catalonia, there was a population of cork-cutters. The cork-cutters of Catalonia were subject to very much the same depressions as the cork-cutters in England, and, although there was no Spanish law on the subject prohibiting exportation, yet there was a municipal restriction enforced by the local Governments, under a violent apprehension lest they should be robbed of their raw material and means of livelihood:—just as if the words used that night by the hon. Member for Norfolk were translated into Spanish. This prohibition was of no importance to the British cork trade, and the reason was, that the Catalonians, from long usage, and from the nature of their social organization, were very superior cork-cutters to the British. They cut the cork with less waste than the English; and the price of cork in Catalonia was higher than any one could afford to give for it to send to this country. So far from a displacement having taking place in the cork trade in consequence of previous remissions, the number of cork-cutters had greatly increased in this country owing to the measures which were taken for liberating the trade. Before 1842 the cork-cutters did not amount to 1,200; they were now estimated at nearly 2,000; yet such was the demand for this labour that it could not be supplied, and various masters in the trade were absolutely at this moment importing Spanish and French workmen. Perhaps the hon. Member for Norfolk would place a duty of £1 or £5 a-head on these men coming into this country. The Catalonian cork-cutters were receiving in this country higher wages than the British cork-cutters, because the trade was a domestic or native one which they understood better than our workmen did. A Catalonian cut corks with less waste of the material, got a greater number of corks out of the same quantity of cork wood, and made better corks than the British cork-cutter. He held in his hand two corks; one of them was a specimen of the Catalonian trade and the other of English manufacture, and they bore a different price in the market in consequence of the superiority of the Catalonian workmanship. The Catalonian cork was a perfect cylinder, the British-made cork would be found to have corners all round it. He agreed with his right hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth and the hon. Member for Finsbury that nothing could be more creditable than the demeanour of the workmen who represented the cork trade; but he must add that the real cause of the difficulty in the trade here arose from some of the rules of the societies to which, unhappily, many of the workmen belonged, requiring the same price to be paid for coarse as fine work. By the rules of the society a workman was bound to take not less for cutting a gross of sodawater corks, which were very inferior, than for cutting wine corks, which were of the finest quality. When the hon. Member for Norfolk spoke of this business being carried on by women and children he little knew how entirely the reverse was the case. One of the rules of the society was that no master should employ more than a certain number of apprentices to a given number of men. In Catalonia the cork-cutter worked in the cottage of his ancestors, with his family around him. His wife and children were employed in the inferior sort of work while he was doing the better sort, and thus acquired training in the art. But in our own country the cork-cutters absolutely deprived themselves of the services of their families in consequence of the rule of the societies he had mentioned. The result of this was that there were a few masters who employed boys because the society's men, who formed the bulk of the trade, were not permitted to work for them; and these boys of eighteen or nineteen years of age were earning from 20s. to 25s. a week. That was the state of the case at this moment. In 1842, no doubt, a great deal of alarm prevailed because there was then a transition from absolute monopoly to comparative freedom of trade, though still under the limitation of a somewhat high duty. The consequence of that alarm was that in 1843 wages were reduced by 10 per cent; but as soon as that alarm was dissipated, and as soon as they found out that the trade was not going to dwindle away, but to grow, wages were raised in 1844 to the old point. From that time forward the trade had gone on satisfactorily, and this important difference was perceptible in the condition of the men—while the monopoly was in full force almost every winter there was a very considerable number of journeymen out of work and dependent on the workhouse; but now, since the change had been made, neither in winter nor summer could the masters find men enough to do the work they had in hand. He assured the hon. Member for Norfolk if he had had a tenth part of his experience on this subject, if he had heard as often as he had done in 1842 and in every subsequent year, without exception, the same doleful, dismal, lugubrious prophecies repeated in every case, with an equal absence of reason and with a total contradiction afforded by subsequent experience, he would not have exhibited the credulity he had done. In 1853 the duty on corks stood at 8d. per lb., and the pro-

this question. He certainly represented an agricultural constituency, but he came there to consult with a view to the benefit of the whole nation; and when he believed that the interests of an important body of the labouring population were likely to be seriously prejudiced by hasty legislation, he held himself bound to interfere in their behalf, and to vote for what he believed would conduce to their benefit, regardless of the circumstance that they did not form part of the agricultural community. Therefore, believing that the Amendment would afford some relief to a large industrial interest he should give it his support.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he was bound to say that his right hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, and the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Brocklehurst) had treated this question in a liberal manner, showing what great progress had been made in appreciating its whole scope and bearing. His right hon. Friend and other hon. Members had asked no more than for an engagement on the part of the Government to do all that they could to liberate English silks imported into France from the payment of duty. He thought he might say, on behalf of his noble Friend the Foreign Secretary, that it would give him great pleasure to labour for such an end; but he could not presume to predict the degree of success his noble Friend might be able to attain in any particular case. When, however, once a country like France had taken so great a step as was involved in the engagements of the present Treaty, and had performed a double process—on the one hand opening to her producers, the great mass of the people, the English market; and, on the other hand, depriving her great protected interests of that description and degree of protection which they had hitherto had, and putting them in a position essentially different from that in which they heretofore stood, he must say, after such a change as that had been effected, all that remained to be done would be comparatively easy. We should stand, after this engagement had been once contracted, in a very different position in relation to France, from that in which we had stood heretofore. Hitherto there had been an idea, whenever we had asked for any relaxation of Customs laws, that we had some selfish object in view—that, in fact, free trade was a system through which we hoped to enrich ourselves and rob the rest of the world. Until we got rid of that fundamental fallacy, there was very little chance of making any progress; but he thought that fallacy would be effectually exploded by the Treaty we had concluded with the Government of France. There would, for the future, be not only the interest of the consumers working in the direction of free trade, but the classes who had been deprived of protection, who having for the most part learnt that it had been a fictitious and unreal advantage, would be disposed to require the universal and impartial application of the new system. The hon. and learned Member for Gloucestershire (Mr. Rolt) had said that the abolition of duty had been postponed in other cases, and he seemed to complain that silk had been made an exception. The reason why silk had been made an exception in the Treaty was, that the Government felt they should look at the silk trade as a whole; and so regarding it, they came to the conclusion that it should be dealt with immediately. He thought they had been supported in a marked manner by the testimony of those Gentlemen who were most intimately acquainted with the wishes of the silk trade. For example, his right hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, a very high authority, had told the House that in the interests of the silk trade, of which he had always been a faithful and hardy champion, he deprecated entirely the Motion made by the hon. Member for North Warwickshire. Considering that the testimony from so experienced and enlightened a guardian of the special interests of the silk trade, considering also that the commercial world in general deprecated delay, and that, according to the hon. and learned Member for Gloucestershire himself, there was a high probability that there would be no distress, no displacement of labour, and no change in the channels of trade, he thought nothing more was required to induce the House to confirm the Resolution at which the Committee arrived last night, and to reject the Motion of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire.

Mr. Barrow

Mr. FRANK CROSSLEY said, he had known the hon. Member for North Warwickshire as a prophet for many years; but fortunately for the country he had been a false and not a true prophet; and now very little reliance should be placed on his predictions of the ruin of the silk trade. The hon. Member said that within the last few years we had doubled our exports of silk manufactured goods:—Now, could we have exported these goods if they were dearer that such immigrants could do no good in England unless they could obtain a sufficient supply of the raw material, especially when Estramadura and Portugal were preparing to deprive us entirely of the supply of the raw material. The right hon. Gentleman had produced two corks, one of Spanish and the other of English manufacture; but why had he not asked the cork interest in this country to produce a cork of their manufacture? The right hon. Gentleman said that three-fourths of the corks imported into this country came from France; but they really came from Spain through France; they paid no duty into France, and all that France gained was the carriage and transit. He was, however, satisfied with the concession which the right hon. Gentleman was going to make. The cork-cutters thought it was better than nothing. There had been, they thought, a gross blunder on the part of the Government, and he left the working classes and the Government to settle this blunder between them. He had heard from the hon. Member for Birmingham that the cork-cutters were in a trade's union, and five minutes afterwards he heard the same thing from the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Accordingly he went out and asked these persons whether the fact had been correctly stated. The men admitted that they had formed themselves into a trade's union for their own protection, and they added that there was not a place in England which could say that one of their men was ever thrown upon the parish.

COLONEL SYKES said, he had received a memorial from the cork-cutters of Aberdeen, who complained that the original proposition of the Chancellor of the Exchequer would operate almost entirely to the advantage of the Spanish and French manufacturers.

MR. POTTS stated that information had been forwarded to him from the constituency which he represented (Barnstaple), to the effect that the trade would be ruined if the duties were abolished. He was unable, however, to explain the special grounds for that conclusion.

MR. CLAY thought that no rule could be of so cast-iron a character as to be incapable of bending to circumstances; and in cases of this kind he would ask, first, what would be the result to our own trade, and then the effect upon the consumer. He believed that the original proposal of the Government, coupled with the prohibition of the exportation of cork wood from Spain, would be ruin to the trade at home, while the injury to the consumer from a departure from the usual rule would be but trifling. In such a case, he thought, they might depart from the general rule. He believed that if the duty on Spanish corks were retained the Foreign Secretary's representations to the Spanish Government might lead to reciprocal advantages and concessions. The noble Lord might direct the British Minister in Spain to say, "See the temper of the House of Commons. Remove your obnoxious prohibition of the exportation of cork wood, or do not be too sure that they will not take the same course with regard to Spanish wines that they have taken on corks." He did not know whether they would have another opportunity of voting on this particular question, but if they had not, he should not regret that no opportunity had been lost of doing justice to an interest that he expected would suffer very materially, if it were not entirely extinguished.

Amendment agreed to.

Resolution amended accordingly.

Resolution agreed to, as far as "Quinine, sulphate of."

"Silk, Millinery, or Manufactures of Silk, and any other material, as denominated in the Tariff."

Amendment proposed after the word "Tariff," to insert the words "after the 1st day of October, 1861."

MR. ELLICE (Coventry) said, that, although he was sensible of the exertions which the hon. Member for North Warwickshire had made for what he believed to be the interest of the silk manufacturers in the county of Warwick and the city of Coventry, and the labourers employed by them, he did not think that the proposition which he had now submitted to the House would be for their benefit. If the duty was to be abolished, the only effect of agreeing to that proposition would be to continue for an indefinite period the panic and suspense which had followed the declaration of the Chancellor of the Exchequer with respect to the Treaty with France. He (Mr. Ellice) had on the strength of the declarations made last year by Members of Her Majesty's Government, stated to his constituents that there would be no treaty with France, and that he should therefore vote for the abolition of all duties upon French silk manufactures, in the confidence that the manufactures of his constituents would be admitted on an equal footing into France. He wished, therefore, to set himself right as regarded his seeming deviation in this instance from the advocacy of free trade. He was one of a deputation who accompanied the late Mr. Tooke to wait upon Mr. Huskisson and Lord Wallace for the purpose of promoting free trade. In the discussion of Mr. Huskisson's measures subsequently, he certainly maintained the interest of the silkweavers of Coventry, because he considered that it would be unfair to make them the first subjects of the experiment; and he demanded the reduction of the duty on corn as an equivalent. He denied, therefore, that he was inconsistent, and he said the late Sir Robert Peel had always stated that he referred in vain to his (Mr. Ellice's) speeches to find an argument in favour of protection. Since then all restrictions had disappeared. He (Mr. Ellice) had voted for a repeal of the corn laws in 1828 long before that repeal took place. In consequence the silk trade had emerged from the state of misery and periodical ruin in which it was plunged while the system of protection prevailed; and he was not now afraid with a little time the panic would cease, and the silk trade become righted. He would not be a party to raising a panic with regard to the ability of English artisans to compete with those of any country in the world. All he asked was that in making treaties of commerce, the Government should satisfy those who were affected by them that in dealing for equivalents they had been treated with fairness and justice. If these duties had been reduced upon principles of trade or revenue, the Coventry people would have had no right to complain; but they had a right to demand that their interests should not be sacrificed for political objects. He hoped that in the convention which was to follow the confirmation of this Treaty the Chancellor of the Exchequer would induce the French Government to abolish the duties on silk manufactures imported from this country. If that were done the silk trade would not have so much reason to complain. Nothing could be so great a mistake as to say that the silk duty acted as a protection; that it did not do so was proved by the fact that under the present system we exported annually £2,000,000 worth of silk. An additional argument was to be found in the memorial of the silk manufacturers of St. Etienne, who stated that they were not opposed to the abolition of the protection. He thought that, in the present state of the measure, they should be very careful how they remitted duties that fell on articles of luxury.

Mr. Ellice

Mr. ROLT said, he had always thought that the less legislation there was on the subject of trade the better, and that it was impossible to have too great freedom of trade with a view to the accumulation and distribution of wealth by the employment of capital on labour. In other words, he thought that trade for those purposes should be perfectly free. At the same time, it also appeared to him that the accumulation and distribution of wealth were not the only objects they had to take into their consideration. They were bound to see whether that principle, as applied to any particular case, was or was not affected by moral, political, or fiscal considerations. Admitting the principle to be correct, one of the first things they were bound to do, when they came to apply it, was to ask what changes it was likely to produce in the channels of trade, and what the probable effect of those changes would be. If there was a sudden change in the channel of any particular trade, the great probability was that there would be loss and suffering; capital employed in one direction could not find immediate employment elsewhere, and a year or more might elapse before the trade could right itself. These were considerations which they ought to apply to the case before them. It was argued on the Ministerial side of the House that it was far from clear that in the case of silk there would be any change in the channel of trade; that the silk manufacturers would go on just as before, only stimulated to greater exertions by the necessity for increased and improved production; and former reductions of duty were pointed to as proving these assertions. But any former case in which a reduction of duty had been made furnished no precedent for what was likely to occur when the duty was wholly abolished. They could not refer to former cases to prove, to anything like reasonable certainty, what would happen now—all they could arrive at was probability. Now, no wise man would propose to act on a probability without considering what were the chances of things turning out contrary to his expectation, and whether without any great sacrifice provision might not be made for the contingency. When it was considered that probable anticipations might fail—that they might find themselves deceived—that a change in the channel of the silk trade might take place, and capital go elsewhere, leaving thousands of suffering workmen behind—the least they could do was to take precautions for providing, as far as they could, against such an event. He would admit, looking only to the principles of free trade, that it would be wise to sweep away those duties; but then there arose not only questions as to revenue, but also the consideration that results of a most serious kind might follow—that the change might be attended with suffering and misery, compared with which the losses sustained in the most severe campaigns in the field would be as nothing. In the face of such contingencies he asked if it was not prudent to guard, as far as possible, against them? Was the delay of a few months unreasonable? Might not this delay prevent these serious consequences, and in any view of the case could it be seriously prejudicial. The right hon. Member for Coventry (Mr. Ellice), said he was informed by manufacturers of Coventry that delay would be of no use, and the hon. Member for North Warwickshire was told by the same class of manufacturers that delay would be of great consequence to them. It appeared to him, however, that this matter hardly required evidence. The danger apprehended was possible—nay probable. The contrary had not been and could not be proved. The silk manufacturers ought to be allowed time to turn round, and to see how, if that became necessary, they could employ their capital elsewhere. He asked why silk had been specially excepted from the operation of the 14th article of the Treaty, in which Her Majesty reserved to herself the power of retaining, on special grounds, for a limited period half of the duties on articles the free admission of which was stipulated by the Treaty? The people engaged in the silk trade could not more readily than those engaged in other trades all at once turn to other employments for a subsistence; their numbers were as large and their prospects of misery as great as were those of persons employed in branches of industry in respect to which the power of exception reserved by that 14th Article might be exercised. Even now, if the matter were brought under the consideration of the French Government, they could scarcely hesitate to modify the Treaty so as to postpone its operation for a given time with respect to silk. Such a postponement would have no serious effect on the general operation of the Treaty, while it would afford time to some 200,000 of our fellow-countrymen to adapt themselves to the altered circumstances in which their industry would be placed.

Mr. BASS said, he could not see the equity of immediately remitting the duties on French goods, while the reduction on those of English origin imported into France was to be postponed some fifteen months. The silk manufacturers complained that a very considerable portion of their manufactures would be replaced in that interval by French goods, and they asked, as he thought very reasonably, for time to adapt themselves to their new position. Delay had been conceded in the case of gloves and various other articles, and why should it not be granted in that of silk? It was not a question of free trade or protection, but one of wisdom and prudence in carrying out an important arrangement. He trusted the Government would take the matter into consideration.

Mr. BROCKLEHURST said, that the point at issue was a very simple point. Those engaged in the silk trade made, he thought, a very fair and equitable request—they asked that their goods in France should be received upon the same terms as French goods were received here. They had taken alarm at the position of inequality in which they would be placed in the competition they would have to wage with the French manufacturers, and they naturally looked to a House of Commons composed of English gentlemen to interpose to protect them from that injustice. If the Government would give them an assurance that in any convention that might be entered into they would do their best to see that their industry had fair play they would be satisfied.

Mr. BARROW said, the advocates of free trade were now driving their train at something more than express speed, and this was just one of those cases in which they might slacken their pace in order to avoid injuring those who, in being shunted, stood in such danger of violent collision. His common sense told him that the artisans in this branch of manufacture would want time to transfer the industry of themselves and their families to new fields, if they should find it necessary to do so; and it was only fair and right that a reasonable interval should be allowed them for that purpose. It had been insinuated that a Member representing agricultural interests had no right to interest himself in this question. He certainly represented an agricultural constituency, but he came there to consult with a view to the benefit of the whole nation; and when he believed that the interests of an important body of the labouring population were likely to be seriously prejudiced by hasty legislation, he held himself bound to interfere in their behalf, and to vote for what he believed would conduce to their benefit, regardless of the circumstance that they did not form part of the agricultural community. Therefore, believing that the Amendment would afford some relief to a large industrial interest he should give it his support.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he was bound to say that his right hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, and the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Brocklehurst) had treated this question in a liberal manner, showing what great progress had been made in appreciating its whole scope and bearing. His right hon. Friend and other hon. Members had asked no more than for an engagement on the part of the Government to do all that they could to liberate English silks imported into France from the payment of duty. He thought he might say, on behalf of his noble Friend the Foreign Secretary, that it would give him great pleasure to labour for such an end; but he could not presume to predict the degree of success his noble Friend might be able to attain in any particular case. When, however, once a country like France had taken so great a step as was involved in the engagements of the present Treaty, and had performed a double process—on the one hand opening to her producers, the great mass of the people, the English market; and, on the other hand, depriving her great protected interests of that description and degree of protection which they had hitherto had, and putting them in a position essentially different from that in which they heretofore stood, he must say, after such a change as that had been effected, all that remained to be done would be comparatively easy. We should stand, after this engagement had been once contracted, in a very different position in relation to France, from that in which we had stood heretofore. Hitherto there had been an idea, whenever we had asked for any relaxation of Customs laws, that we had some selfish object in view—that, in fact, free trade was a system through which we hoped to enrich ourselves and rob the rest of the world. Until we got rid of that fundamental fallacy, there was very little chance of making any progress; but he thought that fallacy would be effectually exploded by the Treaty we had concluded with the Government of France. There would, for the future, be not only the interest of the consumers working in the direction of free trade, but the classes who had been deprived of protection, who having for the most part learnt that it had been a fictitious and unreal advantage, would be disposed to require the universal and impartial application of the new system. The hon. and learned Member for Gloucestershire (Mr. Rolt) had said that the abolition of duty had been postponed in other cases, and he seemed to complain that silk had been made an exception. The reason why silk had been made an exception in the Treaty was, that the Government felt they should look at the silk trade as a whole; and so regarding it, they came to the conclusion that it should be dealt with immediately. He thought they had been supported in a marked manner by the testimony of those Gentlemen who were most intimately acquainted with the wishes of the silk trade. For example, his right hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, a very high authority, had told the House that in the interests of the silk trade, of which he had always been a faithful and hardy champion, he deprecated entirely the Motion made by the hon. Member for North Warwickshire. Considering that the testimony from so experienced and enlightened a guardian of the special interests of the silk trade, considering also that the commercial world in general deprecated delay, and that, according to the hon. and learned Member for Gloucestershire himself, there was a high probability that there would be no distress, no displacement of labour, and no change in the channels of trade, he thought nothing more was required to induce the House to confirm the Resolution at which the Committee arrived last night, and to reject the Motion of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire.

Mr. Barrow

MR. FRANK CROSSLEY said, he had known the hon. Member for North Warwickshire as a prophet for many years; but fortunately for the country he had been a false and not a true prophet; and now very little reliance should be placed on his predictions of the ruin of the silk trade. The hon. Member said that within the last few years we had doubled our exports of silk manufactured goods:—Now, could we have exported these goods if they were dearer here than abroad? The hon. Member had given us one reason for affording protection to the British silk manufacturer, that in France the dyes were superior to those of this country. On this point he begged leave to join issue with the hon. Gentleman. He believed that our dyes, both from vegetable and animal substances, were in many instances superior to those of France; and he knew that not only had articles containing a mixture of materials been sent from France to Bradford to be dyed, but Bradford dyers had been induced by the offer of high wages to go to France, on account of their superior skill and the excellence of their colours. So also with regard to "taste" in design. Superiority in taste was not the peculiarity of any particular country; but even admitting that France excelled us in that matter, we could no doubt prevail upon French artists to come here, just as Bradford dyers had been persuaded to go to France. If he were engaged in the silk trade he should have no objection whatever to the removal of protection to-morrow, because in spite of the prophecies of Gentlemen opposite, he had never known a trade that was injured by the withdrawal of an artificial protection. The great advantage of there being no import duty was that the goods made there would be as cheap or cheaper than in any other country, consequently manufacturers would have the world for their market rather than be shut up to the island on which they lived.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, the hon. Member for the West Riding evidently did not understand the silk trade. He seemed to wonder how a protected country could extend its export trade. Why, France and Belgium, in both of which countries protection was the rule, had increased their export trade in a much greater ratio than this country within the last few years, and so had the United States. It was stated a short time since by the Duke of Brabant in the Senate of Belgium, that since 1842 the trade of England had increased by 124 per cent, but the trade of France had increased 159 per cent, and the trade of Belgium 204 per cent; France and Belgium maintained protective tariffs. The hon. Member could not account for these facts according to his system, for he seemed to think that trade extends only by means of free imports. It was also a fact that large quantities of silk were sent from the West Riding to be dyed in France, and the French Government charged a very heavy export duty upon them on their return. All the silk trade wanted was an assurance from the Government that they would in earnest negotiate for the removal of the prohibition in France which excluded the great bulk of the silk goods manufactured in the Coventry districts, before we were asked to admit, duty free, all the products of France, and that the change in the terms of importation should take place at the same time in England as in France. Surely, a more reasonable request could not be made to any English Administration.

COLONEL DICKSON said, it was with reluctance he rose to add a few words to the debate at this late hour, but he had failed on former occasions to catch the Speaker's eye, and therefore he had contented himself with giving a silent vote in the minority in each division, though he must add that to that minority he was proud to belong. The discussion had been confined, for the most part, to those who were older in debate than he was; and he felt that the question which had been put from his side of the House had not drawn forth those answers from the Ministerial bench which he and every lover of his country had a right to expect. If he had doubts before, those doubts were greatly increased by the contradictory arguments in favour of the silk manufacturers, which were used on the different sides of the House. The arguments of his hon. Friend the Member for Warwickshire, and the arguments of the right hon. Member for Coventry, though both were in favour of the silk manufacturers, were so different that he would have been puzzled how to decide between them if he had not observed that his hon. Friend the Member for Warwickshire backed out his opinions by his vote, while the right hon. Member for Coventry spoke one way while he voted the other. If there was another reason to induce him to oppose the Budget, it was the speech he had heard from the hon. Member for Birmingham last night.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman is out of order in referring to a speech made in a past debate.

COLONEL DICKSON apologized for his involuntary breach of the rules of the House, but he must say that the whole debate appeared to him to be characterized by an undue reference to the influence of France. He was himself most anxious for an amity with France, and he was for peace at any price except that of national honour; but he could not agree to remove these duties in the hurried manner that was proposed.

SIR JOSEPH PAXTON said, that the remarks of the last speaker with respect to himself and his colleague were entirely unwarranted. On the part of his constituents there was no wish for delay; both the merchants and the weavers wished this matter to be settled, one way or the other, as soon as possible. To continue the existing state of things another year would only keep up the agitation, and the interests of those concerned would suffer in the meantime.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The House divided:—Ayes 51; Noes 179: Majority 128.

Resolution, as amended, agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. MASSEY, MR. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, and Mr. LAING.

CUSTOMS ACTS.—COMMITTEE.

House in Committee, according to order.
Mr. MASSEY in the Chair.

(In the Committee.)

Resolution 4, That the Duties of Customs chargeable upon the Goods, Wares, and Merchandise hereinafter mentioned, imported into Great Britain and Ireland, shall cease and determine, namely,—

Goods, being either in part or wholly manufactured, and not being enumerated or described, nor otherwise charged with Duty, and not prohibited to be imported into or used in Great Britain or Ireland; but if any such Goods shall be composed of any Article liable to Duty, as a part or ingredient thereof, then such Goods shall be chargeable with the full duty payable on such Article, or if composed of more than one Article liable to Duty, then with the full Duty payable on the Article charged with the highest rate of Duty.

5. Cork Duties.

Resolved,

Duties of Customs charged upon made, shall cease and determine March, 1862.

ion Reducing the Duty on and Gloves (Under Treaty).

NCELLOR OF THE EXCHE- with regard to gloves he be- was a general desire for an ion of duty. The object of e as it stood in the Resolution the present season, but that n the 1st of August; and occurred to alter his determination he should substitute at a subsequent opportunity the date of August 1, 1860, for the date of February 1, 1861.

Dickson

Resolved,

"That, in lieu of the Duties of Customs now chargeable on the under-mentioned Articles on their Importation into Great Britain and Ireland, the following Duties shall be charged until the days hereinafter mentioned, and that from and after those days the Duties shall cease and determine, namely,—

Until the 31st day of March 1862, inclusive.

	s. d.
Corks, namely, ready made	the lb. 0 3

Until the 31st day of March 1861, inclusive.

Hats or Bonnets, namely,
Of chip	the lb. 1 3
Of Bast, Case, or Horsehair	the lb. 1 3
Of Straw	the lb. 1 3

Until the 1st day of February, 1861, inclusive.

Leather Manufactures, namely,

Gloves of Leather.

Habit Mitts	the dozen pairs	1 3
-------------	-----------------	-----

— Gloves,	the dozen pairs	1 9
-----------	-----------------	-----

Men's Gloves	the dozen pairs	1 9
--------------	-----------------	-----

Women's Gloves or Mitts,	the dozen pairs	2 3
--------------------------	-----------------	-----

Agreed to.

7. Paper Hangings to be reduced (Under Treaty).

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he should not attempt to pre-judge the important question of the paper duties now leviable under the Excise. He hoped, however, that the Committee would agree to this Resolution, so that there might be no delay, on the understanding that the subject should be revived in case the House should decide against the remission of the paper duties generally. A report had within the last few days been addressed to the Treasury by the Board of Inland Revenue on this subject, and as it contained some useful information he proposed to lay it before the House.

SIR FITZROY KELLY asked when the general question of the paper duties would be considered?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER had addressed a letter to the hon. Member for Somersetshire (Sir W. Miles) stating that the regular form of raising the question would be when the Bill for abolishing the paper duties should be introduced. It would be for the hon. Member to decide in what stage of the Bill he would take the sense of the House as to the proposed abolition of the paper duties.

MR. BRIGHT said, that it would be very convenient if the day could be at once fixed. Could the Chancellor of the Exchequer say Monday?

SIR FITZROY KELLY objected to so early a day as Monday; but said ample notice would be given with respect to the proposed Amendment.

In reply to Mr. PULLER,

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he hoped that the Committee would go through the Resolutions to-night, in which case the Address in approval of the Treaty would be moved on Monday.

MR. LIDDELL asked whether a drawback would be allowed on the stocks held by the paper manufacturers? He was told that those stocks were very large, and he hoped that the right hon. Gentleman, in spite of his inexorable mood during the last few days, would consider their claims to a drawback.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he had been in communication with the parties on this subject, and begged it would be understood that he had not refused the concession of the drawback. He hoped to be able to announce the intentions of the Government in the course of a few days.

SIR FITZROY KELLY wished, with reference to the drawback upon wines, to ask what time, and in what form, this question of construction would be submitted to the House, as the decision very much depended upon the will of the Government.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the hon. and learned Gentleman must be aware that it was impossible for him to enter into that question. He was not prepared to submit the question to the House, but he would take care that upon as early a day as possible an opportunity should be given to hon. Members of expressing their views on the subject.

SIR FITZROY KELLY gave notice, that, if no substantive Motion were submitted to the House, whenever a Bill was brought forward, he should take that opportunity of raising the direct question.

LORD WILLIAM GRAHAM wished to ask whether the duty on paper would be immediately lowered, or whether the reduction would be postponed till the decision of the House on the general question was arrived at.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER stated that he was in communication with certain parties relative to the drawback to be allowed on paper, but no decision had yet been arrived at on the subject. He would take care to submit to the Committee at as early a date as possible the decisions of the Government. As to wines, the duties would be immediately lowered, a bond being taken from the importers to abide by the decision of the House on the whole question of the Excise duties.

Resolved,

"That, in lieu of the Duties of Customs now chargeable on the undermentioned articles on their importation into Great Britain and Ireland, the following Duties shall be charged until the 15th day of August 1860, inclusive; and that from and after that date the Duties shall be the same as the Excise Duties for time being on Paper of British manufacture."

Paper, namely,— s. d.

Printed, Painted, or Stained Paper

Hangings, or Flock Paper, the cwt. 14 0

Pasteboard . . . the cwt. 15 0

Afterwards,

SIR WILLIAM MILES said, he understood it had been asked whether he intended to proceed with his Motion on the paper duty. He did intend to proceed with it. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was kind enough to say he would consult his convenience. His convenience was the public convenience. Having had some conversation with the right hon. Gentleman, it was his intention to move the Amendment on the second reading of the Bill, and he understood that the Bill would be brought in at the early part of the week, and that the second reading would be taken on Friday.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The Bill will be brought in early on Monday evening, and on that evening we shall be able finally to fix on the day for the second reading.

Resolution proposed—

"That Spirits or Strong Waters not being sweetened or mixed with any article so that the degree of strength thereof cannot be ascertained by Sykes' Hydrometer, pay for every gallon of the strength or proof by such Hydrometer, and so in proportion for any greater or less strength than the strength of proof, and for any greater or less quantity than a gallon, 8s. 6d."

8. Spirit Duties.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE moved an Amendment, "That the duty on Foreign Spirits be 9s., instead of 8s. 6d. a gallon." He thought that an error had been made in the calculation. He said that, unless this change was made, strong foreign spirits would be smuggled into this country under the name of cheap wine, at a great loss to the revenue, and also to the British distiller. He found by the instructions sent by the noble Lord to the negotiators, it was proposed that the import duty should be 10s.

posal which he made on behalf of Lord Aberdeen's Government was to reduce the duty from 8*d.* to 4*d.* Such strong remonstrance, however, was made by the journeymen of the trade as unfortunately induced him to modify that proposal, and raise it to 6*d.* instead of 4*d.* The consequence of that was an immediate strike for an increase of wages, which lasted for ten months; and in almost every instance the increase demanded was obtained. Such a movement, of course, could only last for a time. Some of the masters held out against the strike, and took boys into their employment, who had shown themselves perfectly fit for the work; and by degrees it died away. The enormous evil of a prolonged struggle was thus inflicted on the trade in consequence of the reliance placed on a high protective duty. He would next show the House the inconvenient working of the existing system, by which the free importation of corks was prevented. There was an immense demand for cork in Australia; but the space it occupied rendered the freight very costly. The consequence was that almost all commodities sent to Australia that had the power of containing anything had their interstices filled up with cork. Hats, carriages, pieces of furniture, everything that admitted of it, was filled with cork when exported to Australia; and the effect of the high duty was to compel the use of the inferior corks of English workmanship, instead of the superior corks from abroad, upon which the exporters from this country could not afford to pay the duty. These facts showed, he thought, in this particular case almost more than any other he had ever known, that the influence of perfect freedom of trade was absolutely required for the benefit not only of the public but likewise of the workmen themselves. His right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade stated the other night that a great impulse would be given to the cork trade by the reduction of the wine duty; and so far from exciting the incredulity it did on the part of some Members, that observation, if liable to any criticism whatever, was liable to the remark that it was little more than a truism. There could be no doubt that the demand for cork would be greatly increased by the reduction of the wine duty, and with that enlarged demand it was exceedingly desirable there should be also the further advantage of an open trade, without any restrictions upon the employment of apprentices, and without those strikes and suspensions of labour for months together by which the journeymen, imagining they had got possession of some talisman which gave them the command of the market, were induced to inflict the severest injuries on themselves. If there had been an error in the proposal at all, it had been in postponing to too distant a date the final abolition of the duty; but he knew the House liked to lean to the side of indulgence in these cases, and perhaps on that ground the delay might be justified in a transition of such importance. He wished the House to know that, in point of fact, that portion of his Resolution which was required by the Treaty of France, if adopted, constituted the material portion of it, and the only point they would probably think worth contending about. We imported from France three-fourths of the consumption of corks, and from Portugal and Spain together only about a seventh. The imports from France might be said to absorb the whole of the imports to this country. In 1859 the total import was 452,000*lbs.*, of which 409,000*lbs.* came from France. A very large part of that was, no doubt, Spanish cork; but he put it to them whether it was possible to make a distinction. It was contrary to the genius of our legislation, and he thought they would not think it either necessary or desirable. As he said on a former occasion, he wished the proposition to be considered on its own merits, and not merely as part of the Treaty.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE thought they had sufficient elements of discord in the House already without the right hon. Gentleman being at the trouble to introduce the various subjects he had referred to in regard to this trade. He denied many of the right hon. Gentleman's assertions altogether, for he had evidently been misinformed. The cork-cutters were not that exclusive body he had tried to make them out. What they wanted was not protection. They were quite ready to enter into competition with the whole world; but they demanded that if the Government reduced the duty they should take care to secure to them a supply of the raw material by the manufacture of which they gained their livelihood. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that the difficulties of the trade had been caused by trades' unions, and that some of the masters had sent to Catalonia to obtain a supply of labour. He (Mr. Duncombe) should like to know who these masters were; for he felt assured

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

1,073,000 gallons, yielding a revenue of £1,225,000, the import in 1848 only reached 1,107,000 gallons, and the duty fell off to £830,000. He (Mr. Bass) was apprehensive that similar results might arise from this further reduction. It might be said that the great increase in price, namely, from 4s. 6d. in 1845 to 11s. at the present time, was owing to the vine disease; but he was assured that the vineyards which produced the wine used for distilling had been but slightly affected, though it was quite true that the wine might have been used to some extent in lieu of other wines.

SIR EDWARD GROGAN said, that as he had received no communication from his constituents after the supplemental Treaty was published as to the duty fixed for foreign spirits, he was bound to conclude that they were satisfied. He wished, however, to know whether any steps would be taken to procure the admission of British spirits into France at a reduced duty?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he was not aware that there were any very strong reasons why we should enter into a communication with France with respect to the duties which she levied on the importation of spirits. There were, however, no good grounds why France should refuse to admit British spirits on liberal terms—inasmuch as she exported that article herself to a very considerable extent. In answer to the hon. and learned Member for Ayr (Mr. Craufurd), he might observe that no plan had been organized for the purpose of allowing a drawback upon foreign grain in distilleries. He wished, at the same time, to add that the matter was open to consideration, although it was a point with respect to which he was prepared to give no positive assurance. In reference to the arrangement which was proposed by the Government in the case of the duty under discussion, he could only say that it was one which had been adopted after very careful examination, and after the holding of repeated communications with members of the spirit trade who, he was bound to say, were gentlemen characterized by much intelligence as well as much moderation in the advocacy of their claims. He might here take the opportunity of observing that the statement of his hon. Friend the Member for Finsbury, to the effect that somebody had been despatched by the Government to Paris immediately after he had given notice of his Amendment, was only of value so far as that both circumstances had taken place. The truth was that the Government, owing to communications which had been made to them by the distillers of the three kingdoms, stating that they would labour under a disadvantage under the operation of the Excise laws which had not been calculated upon, and which, under minute examination, it was found would be likely to arise—had deemed it right to send an intelligent gentleman to Paris with the view of effecting certain arrangements in consequence; and it was, perhaps, not unnatural that the hon. Gentleman should attribute that circumstance to alarm on the part of the Government as the probable result of his Amendment. Now, the hon. Gentleman had gone on to contend that the original duty of 8s. 2d. a gallon had been fixed upon foreign spirits without consultation with the Customs and Excise; but he could assure his hon. Friend that the contrary was the fact; and that he had taken no step in this direction without consulting the officers of Inland Revenue, who differed entirely from the hon. Member. In answer to the question why the proposal of a 10s. duty had not been adopted he might state that, after due consideration, it had been deemed inadequate to meet the circumstances of the case. The operation of a 22s. and a 15s. duty on brandy had been to exclude from any competition with British spirits all but the finest qualities of French brandy; so that the argument with respect to levying a higher duty on brandy in consequence of its greater value was not so strong as it appeared to be at the first blush. Another reason why a 10s. duty had not been adopted was that it was found necessary to provide not only for the importation of French brandy, but also for that of other descriptions of spirits manufactured in France from corn and beet-root as well as the spirit made in Holland, and more especially the cheap spirit manufactured in Germany, on which it would be impossible to justify the imposition of a 10s. duty by any reference to their value. The basis upon which negotiations had been entered into with France on the question 10s. duty by any reference to their value, was that of perfect freedom of trade, so far as regarded the abandonment of differential duties; so that the Government had, in the first instance, been very naturally led to impose the same rate of duty as had, for a series of years, been fixed on colonial spirits. When, however, the statement of the distillers and rectifiers had been submitted to the consideration of the Government, it was found that the matter stood in a different position from that which they had supposed. It was the general opinion of the distillers that the surcharge of 5*d.* would be sufficient; and with the exception of some of the rectifiers, he believed there was a general disposition to recognize this as an arrangement which ought to be satisfactory. The article of rum, he admitted, stood in a position altogether anomalous. He did not think it possible to increase the rates of duty on rum, as the disadvantages of the Excise laws would not admit of it. But rum was a limited production, proceeding from the tropics, and therefore it was an article in which the distiller at home did not very much fear competition. It was quite necessary, however, to afford the same advantage to the rum of foreign countries as to rum from our own colonies. The article of tafia from any colony of France looked rather suspicious; but as regarded Martinique there was a bond fide trade in that kind of spirit, and it was a well-known commodity. This was a general answer to the questions which had been put, and this was the arrangement which, upon the authority of the best practical officers and the heads of the Board of Inland Revenue, he thought well suited to meet difficulties which, he admitted, were complicated and to solve them in the fairest manner of which they were susceptible.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, that by the Supplemental Treaty the Government had confessed their ignorance and their error. If they had consulted the Excise, how came it they had originally fixed the duty at 8*s.* 2*d.*? The differential duty was not sufficient, even as arranged by the amended article. That duty was in favour of foreign brandy. It was not the gin-distiller, but the distiller of brandy in this country who would be ruined by the arrangement.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the hon. Gentleman was not justified in the contradiction which he had offered to him. The hon. Gentleman ought to have known that it had never been the practice for Chancellors of the Exchequer to send for whole Boards and enter into consultation with them as to any proposed changes. What he did was to send for the head of a Board, and upon all occasions his communications to the Board were made to the head. Who was the hon. Gentleman's informant on the subject he knew not, but this he could tell him, that with regard to the frequent alterations in these duties the head of the Board of Excise was fully informed from the first.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

Question put, "That '8*s.* 6*d.*' stand part of the proposed Resolution."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 191; Noes 48: Majority 143.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON asked, Whether there had been any correspondence with the French Government to obtain the same remission of the amount of duties payable on rum from the British Colonies admitted into France.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, there had been no negotiation as to British spirits imported into France, and he was not prepared to state accurately what was the precise difference between the import duty in France levied on British colonial spirits and the duties of excise levied on spirits in France. He thought, however, that the changes made by France under this Treaty were much larger than those made by England, if measured by the relative position of the two countries.

MR. E. CRAUFURD said, he hoped the British distillers would be allowed to supply the Navy. He wished also to ask, whether the allowance for wastage in bond would be made according to the actual quantity wasted?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the question had been brought under his notice during this discussion for the first time, and he would consider it.

Resolution agreed to.

Resolved,

"That in lieu of the Duties of Customs now charged on the articles undermentioned, the following Duties shall be charged thereon, on importation into Great Britain and Ireland, namely,—

	s.	d.
Spirits or Strong Waters, not being sweetened or mixed with any article so that the degree of strength thereof cannot be ascertained by Syke's Hydrometer, for every gallon of the strength of proof by such Hydrometer, and so in proportion for any greater or less strength than the strength of proof, and for any greater or less quantity than a gallon	8	6
Of and from a British Possession in America or the Island of Mauritius, and Rum of and from any British Possessions within the limits of the East India Company's Charter, in regard to which the conditions of the Act 4 Vic. c. 8, have or shall have been fulfilled . . . the gallon	8	3
Rum Shrub, Liqueurs, and Cordials of and from a British Possession in America or the Island of Mauritius, or a British Possession within the limits of the East India Company's Charter, qualified as aforesaid

the gallon	8	3
Rum of and from any Foreign Country being the country of its production
the gallon	8	3
Tafia, of and from any Colony of France
the gallon	8	3
Other Spirits, being sweetened or mixed so that the degree of strength cannot be ascertained as aforesaid, and Perfumed Spirits to be used as Perfumery only.	12	0
Spirits, or Strong Waters, imported into the United Kingdom, mixed with any ingredient, and, although thereby coming under some other denomination, except Varnish, shall nevertheless be deemed to be Spirits or Strong Waters, and be subject to Duty as such.
Water, Cologne, the flask (thirty of such flasks containing not more than one gallon)	0	5 each when not in flasks, as Perfumed Spirits	12	0
the gallon
Resolutions to be reported.
To report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.
House resumed.
Resolutions to be reported on Monday next.
Committee report Progress ; to sit again on Monday next.

MR. JOHN POPE HENNESSY.

Mr. JOHN POPE HENNESSY, being in his place pursuant to the Order of the House of the 28th day of February, expressed his regret that having, through inadvertence, neglected to sign the Declaration required by the Standing Orders, and forgetting his summons to attend the Committee on Group 1 of Railway Bills, he had started for Ireland, whence he had immediately returned on being served with the Order of the House ; and then he withdrew.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN, as he was the Member who moved the issue of the order for the hon. Member's attendance, wished to say that it was with the deepest regret that the Committee of Selection had felt it to be their duty to report his absence. Nothing but the extreme inconvenience which that absence had caused would have induced them to take the step, particularly as there was reason to believe that the hon. Member acted in forgetfulness. But he was sure that the hon. Member was totally unacquainted with the extreme inconvenience he had caused to the parties appearing before the Committee. That inconvenience had been not only one of delay, but one of very great expense to the parties—not only to the railway company, but to private individuals, who had been put to expense in having to retain counsel for another day. But as he (Colonel W. Patten) understood, from the expressions of the hon. Member, that he regretted the inconvenience he had caused, his duty would probably be performed if he now moved that the hon. Member be directed to attend the Committee on Monday next, at twelve o'clock.

Ordered, That Mr. JOHN POPE HENNESSY do attend the Committee on Monday next, at Twelve of the clock.

THE FRENCH TREATY.

NOTICE.

Mr. BYNG gave notice that on Monday after the report of the Resolutions, it was his intention to move that a humble address be presented to Her Majesty expressing the concurrence and approval of the House in regard to the Commercial treaty between Her Majesty and the Emperor of the French.

Mr. AYRTON said, the hon. Member for Sunderland, having given notice of an Amendment on the Address, was anxious that the terms of it should be put in writing in order that he might know how to meet it.

Mr. BYNG promised that the hon. Member for Sunderland should be in possession of the terms of the Address on Monday morning.

Mr. BLACKBURN asked the noble Lord at the head of the Government whether it was their intention to move that the Motion of the hon. Member for Middlesex (Mr. Byng) with reference to the French Treaty should have precedence of the other orders on Monday.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON :—It is intended to move the Address in question after the Resolutions of the Committee have been reported. I apprehend it will be competent for the House to allow the Motion to come on then.

Mr. BLACKBURN : Does the Government intend to move that the Motion shall have precedence of the orders of the day ?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON : Care will be taken to do only what is regular.

House adjourned at half after Twelve o'clock till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, March 5, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1^a Qualification for Offices Abolition ;
2^a Administering of Poison.
3 Companies (1860) ;

ADDRESS ON THE COMMERCIAL TREATY WITH FRANCE.

THE ADDRESS. NOTICE.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE said, it would be probably a convenience to their Lordships that he should state the course which Her Majesty's Government intend to take with respect to a Vote of this House in reference to the Treaty of Commerce with France. Their Lordships would recollect that his noble Friend the President of the Council stated that as soon as the different Votes on Customs and Excise duties passed the House of Commons, a Resolution for an Address to the Crown would be moved there, according to the precedent set by Mr. Pitt. That Address would be moved in the House of Commons to-day, and, in the event of its passing this evening, and being brought up to this House to-morrow, he would venture to propose to fix Friday as the day on which the Address would be taken into consideration. His noble Friend behind him would give notice of a Motion as soon as the Address of the House of Commons was brought up; of course it would be impossible to give a formal notice earlier. It was not absolutely certain that the discussion would take place on Friday, because, in the event of there being an adjourned debate in the House of Commons, the Resolution could not come up until Thursday, and the next day would be too short a notice for proceeding upon a matter of such importance. If the Address did not come up until Thursday his noble Friend would name Monday instead. But if the more definite day were preferred, he would name Monday in either case, although some noble Peers, he believed, would prefer Friday, if possible.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, he would throw no obstacle in the way of the Government bringing the question forward when they deemed it most convenient. It did, however, happen that it would be more convenient to him if the discussion was on Friday rather than Monday; but that was a matter that was not for a moment to be considered. He could only say that whatever day the Government might fix upon for the discussion, he would endeavour to be in attendance. He should certainly throw no obstacle in the way of the subject being fully considered. It was most important that the whole subject should be considered, commercially and politically.

EARL GREY said, that while he concurred with the noble Earl in not wishing to throw any obstacle in the execution of the Treaty, he felt so strongly on the subject that he did not join in any Address which would express the approbation of their Lordships' House to it. He apprehended that the assent of the House to the Address was not essential to the operation of the Treaty, and that being so, he should not concur in an Address which he held to be unnecessary, and which would make the House partly responsible for the Treaty.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE said, that if the Address were brought up to-morrow, his noble Friend would give notice to move a similar Address on Friday. If it were not brought up to-morrow, he would give notice on Thursday for Monday.

LACE FACTORIES.—PETITION.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY presented a Petition from Inhabitants of Nottingham and its vicinity, signed by 10,000 persons, including merchants, manufacturers, magistrates, clergymen, and members of the town council, and praying that the Lace Factories be brought under the Operation of the Factory Act. They stated that when the Factory Act was passed the lace trade by machinery was very peculiar in its nature, and limited to a few factories, whereby the bobbin-net machines in the lace trade were omitted from the Factory Act, but since then the trade, through the many improvements in the machinery itself, and also in the fabrics, had become, and was now, almost as important a branch of manufacture as any in England; and that many thousands of women and children were now engaged in the lace manufacture without any official control of parties in authority. It was unnecessary to detain their Lordships by stating the many reasons which rendered the change desirable. The principle reasons were:—First, the many and irregular hours at which women and children are called upon to work in the lace factories have a most pernicious effect both on the mind and body. Night labour of the juvenile population is especially destructive of their health and morality. Children of both sexes are liable to be called upon at any hour of the night or day, and as it is "quite uncertain how long they may be required, whether for two hours or the whole night—a ready excuse is found for staying out, and every facility afforded for forming improper connections." The absence of proper restraints, "the entire want of parental control," accruing from the present system of employing children and young persons as threaders and winders is the most prolific source of immorality. Secondly, perhaps the greatest evil is the entire neglect of instruction; the great majority of children employed at lace factories begin first to work from seven, eight, and nine, to thirteen years of age. Thirdly, the absence of legislative provision to guard dangerous machinery renders the workers peculiarly liable to accidents, which are often of the most serious and fatal character. Fourthly, the entire absence also of legislative sanitary measures—as lime washing, painting, &c., the heat and effluvia of the rooms in which they work, and the exposure on winter nights to excessive cold on leaving the factories—all seriously impair the constitution of the young, and render them peculiarly susceptible of disease. The master manufacturers themselves were, almost without exception, anxious that the trade should be brought under the operation of the Factory Act; and, as they had seen the benefits which that Act conferred on many thousands of workpeople, he intended to bring in a Bill to extend it to lace factories.

THE EARL OF FAVERSHAM supported the prayer of the petition.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE said, it was unnecessary for him to say more than a single word on this subject, and that word was in justice to the manufacturers of a large and important town with which he was personally connected, and the seat and centre of this lace manufacture. It was only due to them to say that the principal manufacturers of the town were ready to give the noble Earl the most liberal support in attaining the object he had in view. He did not mean to say but that some of the manufacturers, of small capital, might deprecate the enactment of such a measure; but if the small manufacturers were dealt with liberally and gently and the system introduced gradually, he believed there would be no opposition to the noble Earl's Bill.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said,

he would show every consideration to the small manufacturers.

Petition to lie on the Table.

COMPANIES (1860) BILL.

BILL READ 3^d AND PASSED.

Bill read 3^d (according to Order).

On Question That the Bill do pass,

LORD WENSLEYDALE proposed certain Amendments to the Bill, the effect of one of which was to make it compulsory on all companies to publish half-yearly statements of their affairs.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he felt bound to oppose this Amendment. The Bill had been prepared under the direction of the Board of Trade, and he considered the Amendments objectionable.

Amendments withdrawn.

Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

ADMINISTERING OF POISON BILL.

SECOND READING.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in moving the second reading of the Administering of Poison Bill, said it had for its object to correct a serious defect in the existing law in regard to the administration of noxious substances. As the law now stood, if poison was administered with intent to murder it was a capital offence, and in his own experience he had seen it punished by the extreme penalty of the law; but if no intent to murder could be proved, the law was most deplorably defective, because it was held that by common law it was not an offence to administer poison unless with intent to murder. The effect of this state of things had been that in various cases where poisonous substances had been administered, and had produced the most serious and distressing results, the offenders had escaped punishment, because it could not be proved that they had given the poison with intent to murder. The Bill consisted of two clauses. The first provided that the administration of poison with intent to endanger life or to do grievous bodily harm should be regarded as felony, and punished with penal servitude. The other provided that in the event of the administration of poison being without intent to do grievous bodily harm, and with intent only to annoy and aggrieve it should be regarded as a misdemeanour, and punished with three years' imprisonment.

Bill read 2^d.

House adjourned at a Quarter before
Six o'clock, till To-morrow
half-past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, March 5, 1860.

MINUTES.] NEW WRIT ISSUED.—For Roscommon, v. Thomas William Goff, esquire, void election.
PUBLIC BILLS.—1° Indiotable Offences (Metropolitan District; Paper Duty Repeal; Customs; 2° Savings Banks and Friendly Societies Investments.

ROSCOMMON ELECTION.

House informed, that the Committee had determined,—

“That Thomas William Goff, esquire, is not duly elected a Knight of the Shire to serve in this present Parliament for the County of Roscommon.

“That the last Election for the County of Roscommon, so far as regards the Return of Thomas William Goff, esquire, is a void Election.

“And the said Determinations were ordered to be entered in the Journals of this House.”

DEFENCES OF PORTSMOUTH.

QUESTION.

LORD ASHLEY said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that the Fortifications now in progress at Hilsea for the defence of Portsmouth are commanded, at a distance of 2,000 yards, by Portsdown Hill, and whether the Government intend to take any measures for putting Portsdown Hill in a proper state of defence?

SIR DE LACY EVANS said, he should be glad to know if these works were conducted by Officers of skill and experience?

CAVALRY FIELD OFFICERS.

QUESTION.

CAPTAIN ARCHDALL said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for War, Why Field Officers of the Cavalry are excluded from the advantages of the late Warrant, being prohibited from taking troop horses as chargers; whether he is aware that the receipts of a Lieutenant Colonel of Cavalry from his pay and allowances are 1s. 10d. a day less than the pay and allowances of a Lieutenant Colonel of Infantry; and whether, such being the case, he will raise the pay and allowances of a Lieutenant Colonel of Cavalry equal to those of a Lieutenant Colonel of Infantry?

SIR HENRY STRACEY said, he also would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether General Officers appointed to Regiments of Cavalry will in future be obliged to repay the difference, although the prices of Commissions in the Infantry and Cavalry have been equalized?

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, with regard to the question put by the noble Lord (Lord Ashley), the House must be aware that in consequence of the great additional range now attained by rifle ordnance, the lines at Hilsea were commanded by the works on Portsdown Hill, at the same time that these works still added greatly to the strength of the fortress. However, the whole subject was under the consideration of the Government, and formed part of the inquiry under the review of the Commission on Fortifications; and he could inform the hon. and gallant Member for Westminster (Sir De L. Evans) that he was assured the officers in charge of the works at Hilsea were highly competent for the duties imposed upon them. With regard to the Question of the hon. and gallant Member for Fermanagh (Capt. Archdall) he had in the first place to state that he believed he and the hon. and gallant Member were at issue as to the facts, for he believed that Lieutenant Colonels of Cavalry received 2d. a day more than Lieutenant Colonels of Infantry, the fact being that in the one case forage was supplied by the Commissariat, and in the other money to pay for forage was given; hence the difference. With reference to what fell from the hon. Baronet (Sir H. Stracey), he had only to say that, as for the future, Officers of Cavalry would not receive any difference, so also would they not have to pay any difference.

THE ARMY IN THE COLONIES.

QUESTION.

MR. ADDERLEY said, he wished to ask the Secretary for War whether the Committee has yet reported, which he stated last Session to be sitting, on the subject of the Expenditure from the British Treasury on the Military Defences of the Colonies, and on the principle on which such expenses ought to be apportioned between the Imperial and Colonial Treasuries, and on the best mode of carrying out such apportionment; and, if they have made their Report, whether he will present it to the House?

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT, in reply, said that the Committee on this subject had been appointed before he came into office. They had made their Report, but he had consulted his noble Friend the Secretary for the Colonies as to its production, and his noble Friend was of opinion that for the present there was an objection to its being laid upon the Table; it being, in fact, a confidential Report to that Department.

CLANDESTINE MARRIAGES. QUESTION.

MR. COLLINS said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, having regard to the wilful and notorious violation of the Law by Edward James and Jane James at the Shrewsbury Register Office, in December last, and their non-prosecution for the same, he is prepared to recommend any mode for giving greater efficiency to the Law for the prevention of clandestine and fraudulent Marriages in Register Offices.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that since he had replied to the hon. Gentleman upon a former occasion he had received a letter from the Clergyman of the parish stating that the attempt at prosecution in the locality had failed, and in consequence of that he (Sir G. Lewis) had taken steps to direct that a prosecution should be instituted against the parties.

THE ARMSTRONG AND WHITWORTH CANNON.—QUESTION.

MR. H. BAILLIE said, he rose pursuant to notice to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether he intends to continue the manufacture of Armstrong's Guns after the remarkable results of recent experiments with Whitworth's Guns, both as to their range and the accuracy of their fire; whether it is an ascertained fact that Armstrong's Guns cannot be used unless there is at hand a large supply of water, so that the Gun may be washed out after each shot; and whether the Whitworth Gun may not be used for any length of time without the aid of water; and whether the Committee appointed to decide on the respective merits of the Armstrong and Whitworth Cannon adopted the Armstrong Gun without going to Manchester to look at Mr. Whitworth's Gun, after having previously fixed a day on which they were to have visited Mr. Whitworth's works for the purpose of examining his Gun?

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, that nothing could apparently be more satisfactory, considering the small number of experiments which had been made, than the result in the case of Mr. Whitworth's gun, so far as fouling was concerned. He might also state, in reference to Sir William Armstrong's gun, that when it had been first used it had been found necessary to employ a wet sponge, not indeed at every discharge, but at certain intervals. A new lubricating wad had, however, been introduced by him, by the operation of which that objection had been obviated, and the guns could now be used without the application of water. With respect to the question whether the Committee which had been appointed to decide on the respective merits of the Armstrong and the Whitworth cannon had adopted the former without going to Manchester to look at Mr. Whitworth's gun, he could only say that he was not in a position to give to it a positive answer. He believed, however, that it was quite true that the Committee had not visited Manchester, but had taken the Report of another Committee who had inspected the Whitworth gun. It must be borne in mind, however, that at the time to which the hon. Gentleman's question related, Mr. Whitworth's present gun, which had produced those admirable results which had since been accomplished, did not exist; and he might, perhaps, be permitted to take the present opportunity to state the course in the matter which he had determined to pursue. He had invited Mr. Whitworth to send his gun or guns to Shoeburyness, and there, not by means of short trials, but of those lengthened experiments which were necessary, to test the relative merits of the two guns in question for all purposes, including not only accuracy of aim and distance, but, above all, efficiency as used against an enemy. By such competition he had no doubt useful results would be attained and great improvements effected. As the case at present stood the Whitworth gun had, so far as he was aware, exceeded the Armstrong in range, and very nearly, if not quite, equalled it in accuracy. The subject was one, he might add, to which the Government felt it to be their duty to pay the utmost attention. They deemed it, therefore, to be the best course to try both guns, and he was certainly by no means prepared to say that there existed any such difference between them as to induce the Government to prevent the completion of the Armstrong guns which were now being made.

THE ARMSTRONG GUNS SENT TO CHINA. QUESTION.

CAPTAIN LEICESTER VERNON said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War. Whether there be any foundation for the rumour that, with the Armstrong Guns sent to China, under command of Colonel Crofton, Royal Artillery, it has been found expedient to send civilian workmen belonging to Sir William Armstrong's manufactory, for the purpose of attending to details which in ordinary cases fall within the duties of the gunners?

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, he did not believe that it was necessary that any large number of skilled workmen should be sent out with the object to which the question of the hon. and gallant Gentleman related, inasmuch as the ordinary gunners could work the guns referred to as well as anybody else. At the same time it was manifest that whatever was new required more than the usual amount of care and experience in order to be efficiently dealt with, and the Government had therefore deemed it right that there should be somebody at hand who might be able to remedy at once any defects in the guns which might arise. He was informed that only two such persons accompanied the expedition.

UNIFORM SYSTEM OF VALUATION.

QUESTION.

MR. HUNT said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether there will be any objection on the part of the Government to introduce into the House, on an early day, the Bill which he stated on the 1st instant, to be already prepared, providing for a uniform system of Valuation throughout England.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he had already introduced several Bills, which had been postponed from day to day owing to the pressure of more important business. There was now in print a Bill on the subject to which the hon. Gentleman alluded, which there would be no difficulty in at once introducing; but he was not aware that it was such as to enable the hon. Gentleman to form a judgment on the point involved in his Question, inasmuch as it would not provide immediately such a valuation as to lay at once the foundation of a Parliamentary Franchise.

CHARITABLE BEQUESTS ACT (IRELAND).

QUESTION.

SIR WILLIAM SOMERVILLE said, he rose to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland if it is intended during the present

Captain Leicester Vernon

Session to introduce a Bill for the Amendment of the Charitable Bequests Act (Ireland)?

MR. CARDWELL said, he was in communication with the Board, and that a Bill upon the subject had been prepared.

ECCLESIASTICAL COMMISSION.

QUESTION.

MR. RIDLEY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how soon he proposes to introduce the Ecclesiastical Commission Bill?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he hoped to be able soon to introduce a Bill on the subject.

VALUATION IN SCOTLAND.

QUESTION.

In reply to Mr. HOPE,

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that the Valuation Roll as it stood would be taken for the basis of the new constituencies.

ROMAN CATHOLIC CHARITIES BILL.

QUESTION.

In answer to Sir ANDREW AGNEW,

MR. BOWYER said, he was in communication with the Government with respect to this Bill, and that when certain amendments which it was deemed desirable to introduce into it had been agreed upon between himself and the Attorney General, which he hoped would be soon, it would be introduced.

BREECH-LOADING CARBINES.

QUESTION.

In answer to Mr. DAMER,

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, breech-loading carbines would be issued to the Yeomanry Regiments, called out for a week's training, if they could be provided.

THE FRENCH TREATY.—EXPORT OF RAGS.

QUESTION.

MR. HANKEY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the provisions of the French Treaty applied to French Colonies in respect of duties upon British goods imported by those Colonies; and if goods shipped to Bourbon, Martinique, &c. from England, or from an English Colony will be admitted on the same terms as if shipped to France?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, the provisions of the French Treaty did not apply to the French Colonies, with the exception of Algeria; so that goods shipped from England would not be admitted to Martinique and the other French Colonies on the same terms as if they were shipped to France. He might at the same time observe that he hoped no long period would elapse before the provisions of the Treaty would be extended to the French Colonies. He might add, also, that the influence of the Government would be used in favour of that extension. He also wished to take the present opportunity to state that the repeal of the Duty upon the admission of rags into this country for the purpose of manufacturing paper had been under the consideration of the French Government, and that the Council of Ministers were prepared to recommend to the Legislative Body the removal of that prohibition.

ANNEXATION OF SAVOY AND NICE WITH FRANCE.—QUESTION.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, he wished to ask the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs a question, of which he had not been able to give him notice, inasmuch as the Papers to which it related had not—although they had been sent to all the morning journals of Saturday—been placed in the hands of Members until that day. In page 12 of those papers he found that Lord Cowley, under date of the 25th January, thus addressed the noble Lord:—“My Lord,—Since I addressed your Lordship yesterday on the subject of the annexation of Savoy to France.” Now, there was none of the Papers which had been laid before the House dated January 24th, so that it was clear the noble Lord had received a Despatch which he had omitted from the correspondence. What he desired under these circumstances to ascertain was, how the omission occurred, and when the noble Lord will lay the Despatch to which he had alluded on the table.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he would have been prepared, had he received any notice of the Question to give an answer. At present he could only say he would examine the Papers and see for what reason that Despatch, to which the hon. Gentleman had alluded, had been omitted. There had been a great hurry to get the Papers printed, and he was in hopes that they would have been all delivered on Saturday, but it appeared that been had not the fact.

BERKELEY HOUSE—QUESTION.

MR. EWDIN JAMES said, he would beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works, Whether he can state to the House the sum paid by the Metropolitan Board of Works for the site of Berkeley-house, upon which that Board is erecting a building for their own use; and what sum is to be expended by the said Board in the construction of such building?

MR. COWPER said, that the Board had purchased the expiring lease for the sum of £500, and had sold the old materials for £799. They held under a lease of ninety-nine years at a rent of £500 a year for the first ten, and £350 for the remainder of the term, and the amount they had contracted to expend in the erection of the building, including extras, was £16,000.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he desired to know whether the right hon. Gentleman exercised any control over the Board?

MR. COWPER stated that it was only through the courtesy of the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works that he was enabled to give the reply he had done to the question of the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone. He had no authority to interfere with their proceedings.

SCOTCH HERITABLE BONDS. QUESTION.

In answer to Mr. CRAWFURD,

THE LORD ADVOCATE expressed a hope that he would be enabled in two or three weeks to lay on the Table a Bill on the subject of Heritable Bonds in Scotland?

OUR RELATIONS WITH CHINA. QUESTION.

SIR DE LACY EVANS said, he would beg to ask the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs when he proposes to allow the House to express its opinion upon the policy of the Government in reference to our relations with China, and whether the noble Lord will have any objection to lay upon the Table a statement of the present expenses, and of the salaries of those Gentlemen who form the Diplomatic Mission, and he should be glad to see an estimate of the probable expenses both of this Mission and the nature of the charges that would be required for maintaining our relations with that Nation.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, when the hon. and gallant Member brought forward the Motion of which he had given notice, he would make a statement of the estimated expenses of the Mission. Perhaps the hon. and gallant Gentleman would assign a day for the purpose. With regard to the other question, he should have no objection to lay upon the Table a return of the whole of the expenses and salaries.

SIR DE LACY EVANS said, the noble Lord would perhaps allow him to state that he would put his Notice on the paper for the next night of Supply.

CUSTOMS ACTS.—REPORT.

Fourth Resolution agreed to.

Fifth Resolution, That the Duties of Customs chargeable upon Corks ready made shall cease and determine after the 31st March, 1862.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER stated, that it had been agreed in Committee that the duty on "Corks squared for rounding" should cease and determine forthwith; and he therefore moved that words to that effect should be added to the Resolution.

Fifth Resolution amended, by inserting before the word "That" the words "That the Duties of Customs chargeable upon Corks squared for rounding shall cease and determine :—

Resolution as amended, agreed to.

Sixth Resolution, "Gloves."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he should move the substitution of August, 1860, for February, 1861, as the day when the abolition of the duties should take effect.

Sixth Resolution amended, by leaving out the words "February 1861," and inserting the words "August 1860," instead thereof.

Resolution, as amended, agreed to.

Seventh Resolution, "Paperhangings, and Pasteboard."

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he wished to inquire, whether the Resolution on this subject was not merely provisional and dependent on what the House should ultimately determine in regard to the paper duties. He also wished to know whether the contemplated abolition of the French export duty on rags would come under a special Article of the Treaty?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the subject of the abolition of

Sir De Lacy Evans

the export duty on rags was to be considered by France; but there was no intention of embodying it in the Treaty. The items of paper manufacture in the article now before the House were quite distinct from the general question. The duties were inserted in this place, exactly corresponding with what was stipulated in the French Treaty; but they did not essentially involve the general question. Besides the Resolutions were revocable by the House. They had no final or binding force until they were embodied in Bills and received the assent of the Crown.

Other Resolutions agreed to.

On the Question that leave be given to bring in the Bill.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the House having now voted the duties on spirits for the ensuing year as enumerated in the schedule, he would have to ask it to go into Committee of Ways and Means that night in order to vote certain drawbacks on both rectified and unrectified spirits.

Leave given.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. MASSEY, Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, and Mr. LAING.

THE COMMERCIAL TREATY.—ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY.—SAVOY AND NICE.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I rise, Sir, to make the Motion of which I gave notice, That the other Orders of the day be postponed till after the Motion for an Address to Her Majesty on the Treaty with France shall have been disposed of; and I take this opportunity of making an appeal to my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland (Mr. Lindsay), who has given notice of an addition to the intended Address, which may create a very considerable difference of opinion. That addition relates to the differential duties on shipping—a matter that may very fairly be brought under the consideration of this House. But it would, I think, be undesirable to insert it in an Address approving the Treaty, which does not touch the question of those duties. And if my hon. Friend would be kind enough to separate the two subjects, and take the discussion on his proposal on another day, I undertake on the part of the Government to assist him in obtaining an opportunity of bringing it on as a substantive Motion some day before Easter; which I suppose will be sufficient for his purpose.

Motion made, and Question proposed,—

"That the other Orders of the Day be postponed until after the Notice of Motion for an Address to Her Majesty on the subject of the Commercial Treaty with France.

MR. LINDSAY said, that he was unable to answer the noble Lord's appeal until he had himself, in turn, made an appeal to the hon. Member for Middlesex (Mr. Byng). That hon. Gentleman had given a notice of Motion for an Address respecting the Treaty with France; but the terms of that Address were not before the House. It was the general rule on so important a matter that the House should be in possession of the words of the Address at least one clear day before they were called upon to discuss it. The terms of the Address itself not being before the House, of course the terms of his own proposed addition to it were not before the House either. They could therefore have no opportunity of judging whether the words he proposed to add were consistent with the Address and should be discussed in conjunction with it, or whether they should form the subject of a separate and substantive Motion. He thought the words which he wished to add ought to be discussed at the same time as the Address to Her Majesty; because the noble Lord forgot that the 3rd Article of the Treaty distinctly referred to the dues on British shipping, as it specified that the differential duties levied by France against the shipping of England entering her ports were in nowise to be altered. If, therefore, he knew whether or not they were to defer the discussion of the Address until its terms were regularly before the House he would be better able to respond to the noble Lord's appeal.

MR. KINGLAKE said, he rose to state very briefly the grounds on which he intended to oppose the Motion of the noble Viscount. At an unusually late hour for notices of Motion on Friday night, and after a very extraordinary speech from the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) the noble Viscount at the head of the Government gave notice of the present Motion, and requested, as it seemed, the hon. Member for Middlesex (Mr. Byng) to give notice of the Address, the discussion of which they were now called upon to accelerate by that Motion. The very preamble of the Treaty which they were asked to sanction began by declaring that it was the object of the high contracting parties "to draw closer the ties of friendship which united their two people." Now, they would be trifling with that great subject and taking part in the emptiest of all imaginable forms if they consented to enter on the question presented to their attention without having a far more accurate knowledge than they now had of the relations really subsisting between this country and France. As lately as Tuesday last the noble Lord who was the constitutional exponent of the views and opinions of Her Majesty's Government on foreign affairs stated in that House, with a frankness which was characteristic of him, that if the proposed annexation of Savoy and Nice should unfortunately be persisted in, the Emperor of the French would expose himself to the distrust and hostility of Europe. On the day when the noble Lord made that statement he had himself been pressed to postpone his Motion, but he had persevered in going on with it because he knew that in this matter time was a vital element. The correctness of his conclusion was verified by the fact that within forty-eight hours of the moment at which the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary made that statement the Emperor of the French pronounced a speech from the throne, which seemed, as far as he could understand its somewhat ambiguous phraseology, to place the great empire of France in a position of something like antagonism to this country. One portion of the Emperor's speech was, he thought, perfectly unexceptionable in its tone and language; and if he could only bring himself to believe that that part of the speech represented the real views of His Majesty he would not be there endeavouring to postpone the Motion of which his hon. Friend the Member for Middlesex had given notice for that evening. The Emperor said:—

"This reassertion of a claim to a territory of small extent has nothing in it of a nature to alarm Europe and give a denial to the policy of disinterestedness which I have proclaimed more than once, for France does not wish to proceed to this aggrandizement, however small it may be, either by military occupation or by provoked insurrection, or by underhand manœuvres, but by frankly explaining the question to the Great Powers."

If he could only bring himself to believe that that was all he would be very well content to let the Motion proceed. But he found that in other passages His Majesty spoke of the proposal for annexing Savoy and Nice, as though it were a matter resulting from some right possessed by the Emperor of the French. The Emperor also appealed to one of the most dangerous principles to which any potentate could appeal—namely, the principle of natural boundaries. Now, one plain sentence might remove all the obacurity which hung upon that question; let it be said that the determination to consult the great Powers of Europe meant that which any plain man would understand when he spoke of consulting another. Let it only be understood that France would not proceed to this annexation without the assent of the other great Powers, and then they would all enter on the discussion of the Commercial Treaty in a spirit that would conduce to the peace and tranquillity of Europe. It, however, so happened that rumour rather supported those questionable portions of the Imperial speech which spoke of the proposed annexation as a matter of necessity, and left them less room than they would like for believing that the fair and courteous expressions contained in other passages were the true indication of the Emperor's meaning. As a ground for postponing the debate on which they were now invited to enter, he must beg the House to remember that from July to the present time two negotiations, or to speak more accurately, one negotiation and one discussion, had been going on simultaneously. He alluded, first, to the negotiation with respect to the Commercial Treaty, which had ripened into the instrument with which they were now acquainted. But, unfortunately, the discussion relating to the proposed annexation of Savoy seemed—as far as he could judge from the hasty perusal of the correspondence which the late delivery of the papers had permitted him to bestow upon them—to have dragged on and reached an unfavourable phase precisely after that period when the assent of our Government to the Commercial Treaty was obtained. It was of the utmost importance that the House should have had the opportunity not only of glancing at these papers, but of reading them, and carefully collecting their meaning, before they were called upon to express an opinion upon the Commercial Treaty. When he spoke of the opinion which they might express with regard to that Treaty he did not refer to the House would not depart from its ordinary course of proceeding, or, by the vote for which the noble Lord had asked, accelerate the consideration of this Address. Had the question come on in its ordinary course, he should have felt very much disposed to submit to the consideration of the House some Amendment which might have given them an opportunity of deciding whether they ought not to have better means than they now possessed of forming an opinion upon this subject before they voted an address to the Crown. As it was, it of course followed that he felt no difficulty in opposing the Motion of the noble Lord, as one which tended to accelerate the consideration of a question which, in his opinion, was not ripe for discussion.

MR. BYNG said, that having been appealed to by his hon. Friends the Members for Sunderland and Bridgwater, it was only respectful to them and to the House that he should answer that appeal at once and in the shortest possible manner. If the House generally was anxious to see the terms of the Motion in which he should have the honour of proposing that an Address should be presented to Her Majesty approving the Commercial Treaty with France, he felt that he had no course open to him but that of postponing the Motion for that Address until Thursday, in the meantime placing upon the paper the exact terms in which he should propose it. As he was sure that his hon. Friend the Member for Bridgwater (Mr. Kinglake) would not wish him to go into a long discussion of foreign affairs, he would only say by way of explanation that he understood a fortnight ago from the Chancellor of the Exchequer that it was intended that an Address of this kind should be proposed at the earliest possible moment after the House had in Committee approved the various reductions of the Customs' duties. It was on that account only that he had given notice of his intention to make this proposal to the House, and if it was the general wish that the Motion should be postponed to Thursday next, he would accede to that desire.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: In accordance with what has fallen from my hon. Friend (Mr. Byng), and in deference to what is evidently the wish of the House, I beg leave to withdraw the Motion which I have made. I will only say, in explanation, that in the course of the discussions which took place upon the previous stages of this matter, my right hon. Friend stated, in deference to what we believed to be the general wish of the House, that at the earliest moment after the Resolutions had been gone through and reported, an Address would be proposed to the House in confirmation and approval of the Treaty in general; therefore, if the course which has been pursued appears to hon. Members to have been more sudden and rapid than usual, it was adopted in deference to what we supposed to be the wishes of the House. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli), the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Lindsay), and another active Member of this House were in possession of the words of the Address yesterday, or certainly this morning. I beg leave to withdraw the Motion for the postponement of the Orders.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he wished to ask whether the hon. Member would lay the terms of his Motion on the table before Thursday next.

MR. BYNG said, he was prepared then to read the terms in which it was couched if his hon. and learned Friend wished it.

MR. DISRAELI: I have always understood that the earliest moment convenient for taking into consideration any matter of importance is the earliest moment consistent with the House having the opportunity of consideration. I am very glad that Her Majesty's Government have changed their course, because I do not think that the Members of this House would have had an opportunity for consideration if they had been called upon to vote an Address to the Crown with which they had not, speaking generally, had any opportunity of becoming acquainted. Nor was the course originally adopted by Her Majesty's Ministers consistent with the usual custom of this House, because on the last occasion of similar importance which I can recall—namely, when the treaty of peace with Russia was concluded—notice of an Address to the Crown was given on Monday for that day week, and upon the Saturday following the language of the Address was laid upon the table, so that not only had we a week's notice of the intention of the Government, but we had also forty-eight hours' notice of the language of the intended Address. That is a precedent which I am sure none of us will question, and of which I am sure that you, Sir, will approve, because I believe that the hon. Gentleman who moved that Address was Mr. Evelyn Denison. As the noble Lord has referred to my being in possession of the language of the proposed Address, I cannot but say that it appears to me that Her Majesty's Ministers, with a desire to conclude this business which is hardly well considered, have followed the precedent of Mr. Pitt's time, without reflecting that the circumstances of the two cases are, owing to the course which they have followed, very different. In the Address which hon. Gentlemen will see upon the paper to-morrow, having expressed our duty and satisfaction, we are requested to go on to say, "We shall proceed to take such steps as may be necessary for giving effect." The fact is we have already taken those steps. ["No, no! The Bills."] That is a formal affair; the decision of the House has been arrived at. In the case of 1787, when the Address from which this is copied was moved, not a single vote in the Committee of Customs had been taken, the mode of levying the duties had not been altered, and therefore there is a great difference between the two cases. However, that is a question on which I will not dwell now. I am extremely glad that the noble Lord has taken the course which he has done of postponing the Motion, and I am sure he must see its propriety, because it was, I believe, past midnight on Friday when the notice was given. At that time a great number of Gentlemen, including my right hon. Friend the Member for Droitwich (Sir J. Pakington) had left the House, and many of them left town on the following morning. However, the House will now have an opportunity of becoming acquainted with the language of the Address and weighing the whole subject. With regard to the time for its consideration, I should think Friday would be a more convenient day than Thursday, as it would interfere with no other arrangements, and I would therefore suggest to the noble Lord that it would be more acceptable to the House if he would fix the later day instead of the earlier.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON was understood to say that this would lead to inconvenience in case of the adjournment of the debate.

MR. HORSMAN said, he wanted to call the attention of the House to the fact, that during the present Session they had willingly given to the Government facilities for conducting business such as had been asked by or accorded to no Government before. Since the night when the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer in-introduced his Budget the Government had been allowed to appropriate every notice day for the discussion of their financial Resolutions—a circumstance unknown till the present Session. No such indulgence was given to Sir Robert Peel in 1842 or 1845, nor was it asked by or granted to the right hon. Gentleman himself in 1853, although on all those occasions the financial changes and the unsettlement of the trading interests of the country were greater than they had been on the present occasion. More than this, the Government, to facilitate the passing of the Customs' duties, had been allowed to appropriate Thursday for the introduction of the Reform Bill. All this had been cheerfully conceded; but he thought the House ought to put a limit upon these concessions, which had in no previous Session been demanded by any Government. There had, of course, been occasions on which there had been adjourned debates upon the Budget which had, to suit the general convenience, taken precedence of notices of Motion; but to the present Government had been readily and cheerfully conceded that which had never been asked before. He was apprehensive that this course might be drawn into a precedent for the future, and he therefore submitted that the Government ought not to press the House too far, and that, instead of asking for next Thursday evening, they ought, in accordance with previous usage, to fix the consideration of this Address for Friday.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: Sir, I cannot allow this conversation to close without expressing my satisfaction that the Government and the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Byng) have thought it right to take the course which they have done, and my earnest hope that the extraordinary notice given on Friday night will not be drawn into a precedent. I must say that since I have had the honour of a seat in this House I can remember no instance in which the conduct of the Government had so much the appearance of an intention to surprise, and, if possible, strangle the discussion of great interest and importance which was given by Mr. Byng for Middlesex between 10 o'clock on Saturday morning, the course which was taken by the Government and by the hon. Gentleman on their behalf was, not only not discourteous, but I am very glad that the Government have seen fit to change their course. I entirely concur with my right hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Horsman) in what he has said as to the practice of occupying Thursday nights with Government business. It is not unusual, perhaps, at a certain period after Easter, and on Motion made for that purpose, to give up the Thursday evenings to Government business, but the course now proposed is one of a very different kind. I hope, therefore, that the Government will not persevere in their intention to bring on this Motion on Thursday evening. The noble Viscount has intimated across the table that the reason for taking that course is the possibility of the debate being adjourned. In answer to that, I will say that the Government must take the chance which all Governments have on all occasions taken when bringing forward Bills on Government nights; and, therefore, hope that the House will not sanction this proposal.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I think, Sir, that the right hon. Baronet (Sir John Pakington) seeing there is no difference of opinion as to the course which ought to be pursued, might have abstained from making the deliberate charge which he has thought proper to prefer against the Government of endeavouring to stifle discussion upon the Commercial Treaty with France. I do not think the Government have shown any desire to stifle discussion. We are perfectly satisfied with the results of the discussion which has taken place, and perhaps it is some dissatisfaction with those results that has induced the right hon. Baronet to make his unnecessary charge. But, however that may be, I think my right hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Horsman) is labouring under a misapprehension with respect both to principle and to fact. In the first place, with regard to the acceleration of public business, I must always, whether in or out of office, protest, as I have always protested, against the assumption that it is a favour to the Government to allow them to proceed with their measures on days that do not properly belong to them. It is not at all for the convenience of the Government that they should be permitted to take a larger share than usual of the time of the House. My right hon. Friend must know that a rapid rate of proceeding brings an additional and a very inconvenient amount of labour upon the Government. It is not a regard for our own convenience then, but a regard for the general interests of the country and the very definite and pressing interests of the whole commercial and trading classes that makes us anxious to arrive at an early conclusion on the Budget. But I think likewise my right hon. Friend is quite wrong in point of fact. I am not prepared to quote chapter and verse of the precedents at the present moment, but, unless my recollection greatly deceives me, we did, upon many nights in 1842, proceed with the tariff when the Government had not regular precedence. Undoubtedly that was not the only instance, for under all Governments, when the case has appeared to be of sufficient urgency to the public interests to justify it, a similar demand has been made and acceded to by the House. Of course that is a question entirely in the discretion of the House; and whenever the Government perceives the existence of a general adverse disposition on the part of the House it will at once withdraw such a demand. But I think my noble Friend (Viscount Palmerston) has given on this occasion one very special reason why it is eminently for the convenience of all parties that we should go on, as proposed on Thursday. If there is to be an adjourned debate we shall be able to carry it on after an interval of only a few hours, instead of one of three days, and those gentlemen who may wish not to be detained in London will be liberated at a much earlier period. But it so happens that if any one will take the trouble to turn to the notices which stand for Thursday he will see that it is a day eminently convenient for the Motion of the hon. Member for Middlesex (Mr. Byng) to be made. It must also be remembered that it is not the case of the Government endeavouring to bring forward an order upon a notice night. The hon. Member for Middlesex gives notice of a Motion, and proposes to place it on the paper for Thursday. It may stand very well upon its own merits as a notice which will only compete with other notices, and which will not displace any without the full consent of the movers. It seems to be forgotten that the Government have not, after all, received the favours of which we have heard so much. All we have been enabled to do by the aid and kindness of many hon. Members has been to occupy the later portions of two or three evenings which otherwise might not have been occupied at all. On Thursday night, it is true, my noble Friend the Secretary for Foreign Affairs was permitted to bring forward a very important subject at an early hour; but on Tuesday night the hon. Member for Bridgwater (Mr. Kinglake) in the exercise of his discretion, called the attention of the House to a question of which he had given notice, and although we were allowed to occupy the latter portion of the evening no inconvenience was experienced by any one. It so happens, however, as I have already said, that the notices for Thursday next are not very numerous, and I believe they will be found to be either such as are not likely to lead to prolonged discussions, from the nature of the subjects, or such as cannot lead to prolonged discussion because they are agreed to. The Motion relating to dockyards has been agreed to, and the Motion on our relations with the Neapolitan Government is, I understand, one that cannot be conveniently discussed in detail in the present state of affairs and the present state of the House as to information. I must say, therefore, it would be little better than a waste of time if we were not to take the convenient opportunity of proceeding with the important Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Middlesex on Thursday, with the view of closing the discussion on Friday in case the House should wish for an adjourned debate. But that rests in the discretion of the House, only we are not disposed to take the opinion of two or three hon. Members for the general wish of the House, as is sometimes done. My belief is, that the general inclination of the House, as far as we are able to gather it, is in conformity with the notice given by the hon. Member for Middlesex—namely, that he should proceed with his Motion on Thursday.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, he wished to remind the House that the Government had done no more than accede to the suggestion of the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Lindsay), that the Motion for an Address on the subject of the French Treaty should be postponed for a day or two. It seemed to him, however, that the question which had been raised by the hon. Member for Bridgwater (Mr. Kinglake) was one of still greater importance, or rather one the importance of which could scarcely be exaggerated. It was not simply a question whether on Thursday or Friday the House should signify its assent to or disapproval of a Commercial Treaty, or whether that discussion should be deferred till another occasion. Neither was it a question whether the House should express its opinion on the contemplated annexation of Savoy and Nice to France. The question was, whether the House should embrace the present opportunity, when matters seriously affecting the relations of this country and the whole of Europe with France were before the public, of signifying its assent to a treaty, by which, in the words of the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Office, our relations with France were to be rendered closer and more intimate. The hon. Member for Bridgwater had well pointed out that the question raised by him in his speech was of far greater importance than the mere annexation of a small portion of territory. It not only affected the independence and security of Switzerland, as the hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth had stated, in such eloquent and forcible language, but any one who looked at the map must see that it had a very important bearing upon the relations of France with Germany. It had also an important bearing upon the relations of France with Italy, where in consequence of the proposed annexation France might exercise an influence far more commanding and a power far more formidable than had at any time been exercised by Austria. But the question was one of still greater importance to Europe, which might possibly see in the project of annexation, said to be entertained by the Emperor of the French, a key to the claims and the future policy of France. The hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth (Sir Robert Peel) had the other evening called attention to the language used by his Majesty, and the noble Lord (Lord John Russell) would see by the authorized version of that speech in The Moniteur that the hon. Baronet was correct in his interpretation. But there were other passages in the speech of the Emperor eminently calculated to raise the suspicion and misgivings of Europe. His Majesty spoke, for example, of what he called the "natural limits" of France. The House would see, therefore, that the question was of the greatest European importance, and one in which this country stood. What was the point at the present moment? A single country in Europe would the policy of the ex-who now wielded the des- with anxiety and alarm. A country in Europe the did not look to France ke fear. Yet there was not a country in Europe that was prepared to take the initiative in such a matter. All the nations of Europe looked to England, where there was a free Parliament, a free press, a free expression of public opinion. They relied upon us to take the initiative, and he believed that if we did so they would follow our example. What, however, was the position in which the Government wished to place this country? Instead of using language, not such as the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Office had used, but language recording our earnest, emphatic, and unflinching protest against the annexation of Savoy and Nice, the Government proposed that, passing by the discussion to which the noble Lord the Foreign Minister had himself invited the House, Parliament should take into consideration the clauses of a Commercial Treaty with France at the very moment when the policy of France was creating distrust and alarm throughout Europe. On Friday night the noble Lord opposite declared that the question of the annexation of Savoy and Nice was one for the consideration, not of the Crown or of the Government, but of the people of England and the House of Commons, and yet he was now asking the House to parade itself before Europe in the act of drawing closer the bonds of alliance with France, as if there was an identity of policy and of interest between the two countries. The present was not the time for such language as the Foreign Minister had held. He granted that the noble Lord, as appeared from the recently published correspondence had remonstrated against the course pursued by France, and against the project said to be entertained by the Emperor, and so far as it went he did not complain of the attitude of the noble Lord. But we wanted more than the mere language of remonstrance. It was not sufficient for the noble Lord to write to Turin that the surrender of the cradle of his illustrious family would be "a blot on the escutcheon" of the King of Sardinia. That was mere rhetoric, rather than the earnest and vigorous protest which we desired. We were bound by the faith of solemn treaties. We had treaties with Austria, with Prussia, and with Russia, and what the country wanted was a solemn protest against a project which, he feared, was not only entertained, but in part accomplished, and which he believed to be dangerous alike to the interests and the tranquillity of Europe. Under these circumstances, he would suggest to the noble Lord that the consideration of the clauses of the Commercial Treaty should not take place until the House had the opportunity of clearly and decidedly expressing an opinion as to this annexation of Savoy and Nice. He did not doubt that that opportunity would be found, either by the action of some Independent Member, or by some proposition on the part of the Government, to take the papers into consideration; and then, on Monday next, if the noble Lord proceeded to the consideration of the clauses of the Commercial Treaty, a course would be adopted by which the public service would be greatly benefited.

Gerald

MR. BRIGHT said, that he should like to know, though perhaps he might assume, that the language of the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down was the language of the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire and of the Earl of Derby, who, in "another place," was the leader of the party to which the right hon. Gentleman belonged. The hon. Gentleman has been for many years a Member of the House, but he had not taken a very active part in the discussions until within the last twelve months, when, from the official position in which he was placed, it was necessary for him to do so; and it must be admitted that the hon. Gentleman, when in office, conducted the business of his department, as far as that House was concerned, in a satisfactory manner. He, therefore, the more regretted to be obliged to say that he observed that a very remarkable change had taken place since the hon. Gentleman quitted office; and he did not know that he had heard for a long time a speech in that House which had given him more astonishment and pain than that which the hon. Gentleman had just delivered. He did not ask the hon. Gentleman to please him in the speeches which the hon. Gentleman made; and he certainly in his speeches did not try to please hon. Gentlemen opposite; but he did ask that when hon. Gentlemen addressed the House, they should well consider the gravity of the question, and endeavour, as far as other countries were concerned, not to import into the discussion any unnecessary irritation. From what had been observable during the last fortnight or three weeks, it was quite obvious that the Commercial Treaty with France was very unpleasant to hon. Gentlemen opposite. There were many reasons why it should be so, some which they were not likely to admit, and which it was not necessary for him to state; but he would ask them whether it was a manly course to endeavour, when the Commercial Treaty was on the point of being concluded by the ratification of the House, and when throughout the country there was but one voice with respect to it, and when that House had already shown itself most unmistakeably in its favour—was it manly, he would ask, to associate the treatment of that particular question, and of the Government in respect to it, with another question which might or might not be important, but which necessarily involved considerations likely to create irritation here and perhaps elsewhere? The hon. Member for Bridgwater and many other hon. Members had strong feelings on this question of Savoy. What course did they propose to take? Did they propose to take out of the hands of the Crown or of the Government the management or control of the matter? If they believed that there was anything in the papers not creditable to the noble Lord who had the management of the Foreign Affairs of the country or to the honour of the Crown of England, was not the floor of the House open to them, and could they not propose a Motion with respect to those papers on any night in this or next week to the effect that the conduct of the Government was not creditable, and that the interests of the country had not been duly regarded? Then the matter would be fairly discussed and battled out, and if the hon. Gentlemen opposite could carry a vote of censure, then the great object of their ambition would be attained; the Government would be turned out, and hon. Gentlemen opposite would sit on the Ministerial benches, and when they did they would, he presumed, from the force of circumstances, carry out precisely the same policy. There was not a few persons in this country who regretted the course taken by the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) on this question, for no doubt that right hon. Gentleman prompted the virtuous indignation of the hon. Member for Horsham (Mr. S. FitzGerald). That course was one not void of some considerable peril. He (Mr. Bright) had seen the course followed by the party opposite in 1853 and 1854. There was not an insinuation of any kind which was not resorted to at that time with the view of damaging the Earl of Aberdeen's Government, and more especially the Earl of Aberdeen himself, though such a course might occasion war and did, no doubt, much to make the unfortunate war that ensued inevitable. ["Oh, oh!"] He did not ask hon. Gentlemen opposite to agree with him; he was only telling them what a great number of people believed, and the opinion was growing stronger every day, that there were persons occupying high positions before the public who would rather see a great alienation from France—even though it might lead to the terrific consequences of another war—than a growing friendship between England and France, which was likely to result from the Commercial Treaty. He agreed with the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire very much in this, that Government could not be very well carried on in this Parliament without something that assumed the character of party, but still he had no great affection for what were called great party fights. At any rate, there were many subjects in the course of a Session on which party fights might be taken, but, in the name of all that was sensible, all that was humane and just to mankind—he would not say to England—let them banish from their party discussions questions of irritation like that raised to-night—questions which grew by this sort of discussion, and, sometimes in a very short time, acquired a magnitude beyond the control of those who first raised them. If they could conceive themselves for a moment to be sitting in France, instead of in England, and hearing this kind of discussion—if they could suppose England and France to change places on the question of Savoy, and England to desire annexation, while France was opposed to it, could not hon. Gentlemen then perceive that the sort of tone in which the matter was taken up, and the sort of menace which the hon. Gentleman offered, was precisely the kind of thing which made—if such a thing were possible—war absolutely inevitable? The hon. Gentleman proposed, in effect, that the House should not proceed with the Commercial Treaty until the question of Savoy should be settled. [Mr. S. FITZGERALD: No, no!] Did he misunderstand the hon. Gentleman? [Mr. S. FITZGERALD: Yes.] Then he retracted the statement; but he was quite sure that the tone of the hon. Gentleman's observations led to that conclusion. Besides, he would ask, what was the object of tying the two things up together, unless one was to be made dependent on the other? He ventured to say that no words that could be put into a Resolution would more decidedly cause a rupture between France and England than words declaring that the House would not consider the Commercial Treaty until the question of the annexation of Savoy was settled. Now, he was not going to discuss that question; but a great deal might be said for it on the part of France, and against it on the part of England. It appeared to him one of those questions which had better not be stirred, but which, being stirred, concerned the people of France, of Sardinia, and of Savoy much more than the people of England. As a matter of material interest it did not concern England at all, but only as a matter of sentiment, as all were desirous here that nobody should destroy the old landmarks of Europe. It was impossible, however, for any person in the position of the governor of a great country to have stated his case, his wishes and intentions, in more fair and open language than that read by the hon. Member for Bridgwater. The hon. and learned Member, indeed, admitted that if the words he read were the only words in the matter he would take the same view of them; but those were the only words which referred to the action of the Emperor. The other words referred solely to the Emperor's wishes and rights, but the words which the hon. and learned Member read to the House are the only words which referred to what the Emperor proposed to do. If, however, any hon. Gentleman felt aggrieved on the subject, let him bring forward a specific Resolution, and then the noble Lord the Member for London would be enabled to defend his course on this question; but he implored the House not to let it appear that it preferred a party embarrassment, a party victory if it might be—or the peril of breaking up the friendly relations between this country and France, to the acceptance of that great Treaty, on which the people of England believed their future commercial interests to a very considerable extent depended. He had not risen to defend the Government, but when a question of this sort was made a ground of attack from night to night, he was anxious to place it in its real light, and he believed he placed these attacks, which tended to sacrifice the commercial interests of the country, imperil peace with France and therefore with Europe, in their real light when he stated that they were made for a party object, of which a great party ought to be ashamed.

Mr. Bright

MR. LIDDELL said, he was prepared to answer the question of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright), and in doing so he believed he would be giving expression to a feeling which prevailed among a large portion of the House. The hon. Gentleman had asked what they were prepared to do in reference to that question of Savoy; and he (Mr. Liddell) had to reply that he for one was not prepared to take the course which the hon. Gentleman had marked out for himself—namely, to treat the annexation of Savoy to France with a pusillanimous indifference, if with nothing more. It was very convenient for the hon. Member (Mr. Bright) to evade the main point of this question, but the fact was that England stood pledged to maintain the independence of Switzerland, and that independence was seriously endangered by the proposed annexation. He rose, however, principally for the purpose of urging his hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland (Mr. Lindsay) not to accept the offer which had been made to him by the noble Lord at the head of the Government. His hon. Friend had given notice of an Amendment in the third Article of the Treaty; but if his hon. Friend were to accede to the suggestion of the noble Lord he would find himself placed very much in the position of the man who shut the stable door when the steed was gone, for his Motion would be fixed for some day after the House had given its assent to the Treaty. He did not wish in any way to endanger the success of the Treaty; on the contrary, he believed that it would be eminently advantageous to this country; but he was anxious that the third Article, which would subject British shipping to an unjust charge, should be discussed by the House under the circumstances which would afford them the best chance of obtaining its alteration.

MR. WHITESIDE: The hon. Member (Mr. Bright) has entirely misunderstood what fell from my hon. Friend near me (Mr. S. FitzGerald). The hon. Member has imputed to Gentlemen on this side of the House, that, for a party object, they are desirous of catching at this question of Savoy in order to expel the Ministry from their places. Now, I think he will see upon reflection that that imputation is not one which he ought to have made. How has this difficulty arisen? Has it been created by any act of those around me? By no means. The person who jeopardizes the peace of Europe is he who does not respect the faith of treaties—who says that geographically he is entitled to one country, and that logically he is entitled to another. That is the argument in reference to Savoy and Nice. Does any imputation rest on the Foreign Secretary? No. I have only looked into these despatches; but as far as I have read them I think that they reflect honour upon the noble Lord, and that throughout the correspondence he has asserted the interests of peace, the interests of his country, and the interests of Europe. But our object is, in accordance with the noble Lord's own speech the other evening, to strengthen the hands of the Ministry by expressing clearly and distinctly the opinion of Parliament, not as the hon. Member (Mr. Bright) supposes, upon the internal affairs of France, but upon an intended encroachment by one Power on the territories of another country, guaranteed to that other country by the faith of treaties. The effect of such an expression of opinion by Parliament, as I believe, will be not to create war, but to prevent it; and the hon. Gentleman wholly mistook what my hon. Friend said, because, when he expressed a hope that Parliament would protest against annexation, the hon. Gentleman should recollect that a protest is not war, but a substitute for war. For example, when the French army marched into Switzerland, the Earl of Malmesbury protested, but we did not go to war. And I venture to say that, if a distinct and manly protest be made by England and the other great Powers of Europe against this first attempt to violate the treaties which guarantee the peace of Europe, that protest will be attended with better results than even the manifold despatches of the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary. The hon. Member (Mr. Bright) was therefore rash in his imputation upon my hon. Friend and the Gentlemen near me, who are desirous to maintain peace, but at the same time are desirous to preserve the faith of treaties and the honour of their country.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE: I will not attempt to impugn the motives of the hon. Member (Mr. S. FitzGerald). His motives may be pure and honourable, but I do take upon myself to question the discretion of his speech. When an hon. Gentleman who has occupied the position of Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs makes such a speech respecting the Emperor of the French, I must say that I think it highly indiscreet and very much to be deprecated. What must be the effect produced on the highly inflammatory susceptibilities of the French people when they hear of such observations made, amid the cheers of his party, by a Gentleman who has held so high a position? I do not believe the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli) inspired him with that speech, or that he approves of the statements expressed in it, for the right hon. Gentleman is far too sensible of the value of the French alliance; and the right hon. Gentleman who has just spoken also sees so fully the indiscretion of the speech that he has endeavoured to explain it away to the satisfaction of this House and of our neighbours across the water. But if we are every night to be making this an opportunity for discussing the affairs of the French Government and of Sardinia, what is to come of it? Are we to lay hold of this Commercial Treaty, which is meant to be one of amity, and turn it, instead, into a source of war? By the course you are pursuing I firmly believe that you are laying the foundations of enmity between the two countries. As to the policy of annexation, I do not agree with the views of the hon. Member (Mr. Bright). I think he made that speech under some momentary irritation, and I am sure that after consideration has led him to repent of many of those sentiments. If, however, the question may be regarded from another point of view, let us, when the proper time arrives for doing so, give it a calm, candid, and open discussion; but do not let us have hon. Members rising and giving utterance, night after night, upon the mere withdrawal of a Motion, to such irritating sentiments. I heard with great pleasure the speech made the other night by the hon. Baronet (Sir R. Peel). It was a speech distinguished by a strain of eloquence such as is seldom heard within these walls, and I trust that we shall often hear the hon. Baronet again, but I also hope that to eloquence he will join discretion, and will not on every possible occasion make Savoy the staple of debate in this House. I have confidence in the hon. Secretary. From the right hon. Gentleman it would seem that we all are to be guided by the Lord who is conducting our affairs with judgment. Let us, then, assist him in what we are able—namely, by what is done in this House as a matter of course, but to strengthen and assist. Without imputing blame to the hon. Gentlemen, I think the House not to be led away by any anti-Gallican feeling, and not to mix up this Savoy question with the Commercial Treaty, which we have a fair prospect of debating on Thursday evening.

Mr. ROEBUCK: Not being of any party whatever, I think I may reply to the question of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright), why we mix up the two subjects of the Commercial Treaty and Savoy. For the Treaty of Commerce no man is more anxious than I am; but, at the same time, I have my own opinion about the annexation of Savoy. I will tell the hon. Gentleman, then, why we connect the two. With the internal affairs of France we have nothing to do. The French place whom they please at the head of their Government. They present him to the world, and with him we negotiate. It is, therefore, the duty of England to negotiate with the present Emperor of the French. We do not ask how he came to the Throne. We do not ask what is his character. We do not, when negotiating with him, express what we think of the man. All these questions must enter into our minds; but we negotiate with him candidly, freely, honestly, though we have our own opinion as to the result of that negotiation. Now being, as I said, of no party, and not being a Government official, I think it my duty on the present occasion, simply as a representative of the people of England, to state frankly what I accept as the result of the Commercial Treaty, supposing it had passed. With the great people of France I have the most earnest desire to maintain the most friendly relations. I believe it is for the happiness of mankind that these two great nations should be upon relations of amity. As the French nation has chosen its governor, with him I am quite prepared to deal; but I cannot help forming my own conclusions as to the result of this negotiation. The result of this negotiation will, I believe, very much depend upon the character of the man with whom we have to deal. Now, what does that man do? Upon this occasion I am not simply to consider what the hon. Member for Birmingham calls the danger of the question. I have to consider the honour of England. I say that if at this time we did not speak our minds, we should be truckling to the Emperor of the French. We should not be the England which I believe we are. I say that this man even now when he is entering into friendly relations with us, is breaking all the treaties we have made, and is casting dishonour upon England by making it appear that we are his friends, while he is doing a disgraceful and dishonourable act. ["Oh, oh!"] I do not mince my language. I do not fear that man, but I have a fear lest England be thought to truckle to him. What is he doing? He invites us to enter into friendly intercourse. To that invitation I willingly accede. I think he has done boldly by so doing. I think he has acted doubly boldly, when, having quarrelled with his priests, he ventures to quarrel with his Prohibitionists at the same time. But he has done a bolder act. At the same time that he invites England to be his friend, he seeks to break the treaties which England has made. He talks of acquiring les versants des Alpes. If I understand what that means, he will go still further. The man who talks of geographical reasons for wishing to approach the Alps, may for the same reasons desire to approach the Rhine. And so, if we now stand by with "bated breath" while he approaches the Alps, we shall by-and-by see him acquire the Rhenish provinces of Prussia, and crush Belgium in his grasp. What shall we do then? We shall be driven to do that which we ought to do now, and proclaim boldly that we think it would be dishonourable to do that which he is about to do. I do not ask for war; I know there is pugnacity at the bottom of all the hon. Member for Birmingham does. When I say I do not wish to fight he laughs at me. But, Sir, there is something in the grave and solemn declaration of a great people like the people of England even that the Emperor of the French must regard. I have known the time when a declaration of this House stopped him short in his career. I think the noble Lord at the head of the Government will remember that time. I recollect the time when this House was solicited to alter the legislation of England to please him. This House refused to consent to that. We stopped him short in his career then, and what has been his course since then? During the Italian war, and after it, the Emperor of the French did all he could to make friends with the despots of Europe, and all he could to throw off the English alliance. Why do I say that? I take the expression of opinion in the press of France to be the expression of the Emperor's opinions. Having failed to win the friendship of the despots of Europe, he fell back upon his old Ally, and then he silenced by one blow the press of France. ["Oh!"]

Hon. Gentlemen may cry "Oh," but is that not true? Did he not issue his fiat, and did not all the insolence and all the impertinence against England at once cease? Aye, I have faith in the English House of Commons, although some may be base enough to truckle to an Emperor; and I am sure this House of Commons will maintain the character, the dignity, and the honour of England. To go back to what I was saying:—the Emperor of the French turned round, and again cultivated the friendship of his old Ally. We were sworn friends again, but I cannot forget what that phase of that man's life disclosed. ["Question!"] You may not like what I say, but I am sure it is the question for us to consider. I say, what are we to do? Are we at once, and without consideration, to accede to this Treaty of Commerce? I am most anxious at once to close with this Treaty of Commerce if we can. But I would not close with it in such a way as to appear to sanction the proceedings of the Emperor of the French in the annexation of Savoy. Therefore, I say the consideration of this question ought to be deferred until the House has had an opportunity of declaring its opinion as to the annexation of Savoy. I am quite sure a large majority of the House would at once adopt the honourable language of the noble Lord the Member for London and declare itself hostile to that annexation. And here I must say, if the noble Lord will permit me, that I think the honour of England is quite safe in his hands—that his language has been in accordance with the views of the people, and that nothing could be better than the manner in which he has declared his honest feelings upon this matter. I call upon the House of Commons to say what the noble Lord has said, and to declare its opinion upon this matter before we say that we are willing to enter into a Treaty of Commerce between the two nations. I only ask the House to do that, and then when it has declared the annexation of Savoy to be against the honour and dignity of England to say to France, "If you will enter into negotiations, we wish to have peace and content between the two countries, and we will even sacrifice our feelings to gain that end."

MR. CONINGHAM said, that although for one he was not at all disposed to truckle to the Emperor of the French, he felt bound to protest against the use of such language as they had just listened to as applied to the ruler of a friendly nation. He knew that the language applied in that House to the Emperor was in France considered to be the expression of the sentiments of that House towards the French nation. Nothing could be more injurious to the interests of both nations, more injurious to the interests of civilization. Hon. Gentlemen opposite professed now great sympathy for Savoy, but when Poland was divided, when Cracow was absorbed, when the Russians marched into Hungary, he did not remember there was any protest on the part of the great Conservative party. The annexation of Savoy was a question in which England had an interest, but if the districts contiguous to Switzerland were to be given to that republic he thought that arrangement would much modify the views which would otherwise be entertained of the proposed transaction. He would add that the whole discussion that evening had been of a most irregular character, and he earnestly deprecated the repetition of sentiments which he believed were calculated to sow the seeds of distrust and hostility between the two most civilized countries of the world.

Lord JOHN RUSSELL: Sir, if any hon. Gentleman in this House thought it necessary to propose for consideration the whole question of Savoy, to find fault with the mode in which that question has been treated by Her Majesty's Ministers, or to take the matter entirely out of the hands of the present Government, that would be an intelligible and, may be, a useful course of proceeding. It may be that we have spoken too tamely upon the subject, that men of higher abilities and more animated spirit may be able by the use of other language to deter the Government of France from proceeding in any way with the annexation of Savoy. Those who could succeed in persuading the House to adopt that view might take the place of those who have hitherto conducted the negotiations and proceed to put their views in practice. But there is one course which institutional consistent reposed in and which,

the main-tween this case is the ing discus-lar points
sive vote, but always

pointing out the person whom the French by immense majorities have chosen to rule over them as a ruler whom we must distrust, against whom we ought to be perpetually prepared. That course must tend to alienate the two countries, and to bring about at length a total rupture of amicable relations. Now, I am sorry to say that that is a course which some hon. Gentlemen think it convenient to take, and I must on this occasion ask them really to come to some definite Resolution as to what they themselves propose by their speeches on this question. What has happened is this,—I must again state it as the matter has been so prominently brought forward.—It appears that when there was a discussion between France and Sardinia—when there was a measure of concert arranged between them with respect to the defence of Sardinia against Austria—some question was raised, or some conversation passed, on the subject of annexing Savoy to France. The war began; the war ended with the annexation of Lombardy to Sardinia, and with no further conquest on the part of France. It was understood, that, according to the preliminary treaty of Villafranca and the subsequent treaty of Zurich, the Grand Dukes of Tuscany and Modena were to return to their dominions; that the Pope was again to have possession of the Romagna; and that Lombardy alone was to be the prize of the King of Sardinia. The Emperor of France was the man who promoted that arrangement, and did all he could to bring it to a successful result; and it was fully understood that in that case there would be no question of the annexation of Savoy. Well, that arrangement did not please the Italian people; the Emperor of France said he would not use force to coerce their inclinations; and those inclinations were evidently in favour of their living under the rule of the King of Sardinia. The Emperor of France, when it was tolerably clear that such would be the probable result, said, it was desirable for the security of France that she should have the slopes of the Alps that lay towards France, and that she should have her frontier strengthened. On that question Her Majesty's Government differed with the Emperor of France; and I will say for myself that I never for a moment concealed our opinions upon it from the Emperor of France. I was not wanting in telling him, frankly and plainly, what our opinions were of that annexation, and what were the consequences which we feared might follow in Europe from carrying it into practical effect. But other Powers have to take their part. The Emperor of the French took his part so far that he declared to Her Majesty's Government, both through his own Ambassador and through his Minister for Foreign Affairs, that he would not proceed to that annexation without consulting the great Powers of Europe. It might be feared that by a sudden military occupation he might seize the capital of Savoy and the passes of the Alps; but he has declared in the face of all Europe that he will not so proceed. Those other Powers to which he has referred have to be consulted. We have told him frankly our sentiments on the subject, and I do not know that we could have done so in language stronger or more direct. But the question remains still to be decided in what way the other Powers of Europe will be consulted. Will they be asked to give their opinion to the Emperor of the French? Will it be expected by the French Government that if those Powers maintain objections to this annexation, they will speak out on the subject? All I can say is, that hitherto they have not done so. Her Majesty's Government have spoken out on the subject, as has also the British Parliament; and the British public, and I may say all Europe, will soon know the manner in which we have spoken. But the other Powers have not yet spoken; I cannot doubt what the opinion of those Powers is on the subject in question, but I doubt in what way they will express themselves. Now, is it at such a moment, let me ask, and upon such a subject, that the House of Commons will consent, day after day, to listen to vague discussions founded on no definite Resolution? It is my persuasion—I may be totally mistaken on that point, because other circumstances may occur to disappoint any such prophecy—but my persuasion is that if the language of disapproval is held in Berlin, is held in Vienna, and is held in St. Petersburg, that this project of annexation will not be persevered in. I have said we do not know as yet in what language those great Powers will express themselves. Nay, more; the very Power which is most interested in this question—the Government of Sardinia itself—has not yet spoken on this subject. The Members of this House and the public may have seen two despatches which have appeared in the Moniteur, and have since been reproduced in the newspapers here, which contain a project for the settlement of Italy, suggested by France, and one of which despatches ends by stating that in case that project were adopted it would still be necessary, for the security of the frontiers of France, to add Savoy to the dominions of the Emperor. That question concerns Sardinia more than any other Power in the world. The province to be annexed is naturally the part of his dominions of which the King of Sardinia must be the most proud; it is the country in which his house arose; and in the course of time it has numbered among its people many of the most gallant and skilful of officers and many of the bravest of men, who fought to maintain the rights and power of his family, and who by their deeds have adorned the page of history. The King of Sardinia must, therefore, be much interested in that province. Yet, while the Government of the King of Sardinia have answered at great length, and with much detail, so much of the French proposal as relates to Italy, with regard to Savoy, Count Cavour has said that he reserves that as the subject for a separate despatch, and that he will treat it very soon in that separate despatch, which he will communicate to the Government of France. Then, I say again, when the Power most of all interested in this question has not yet decided in what way it will act, that this is not the moment in which we should come to a precipitate conclusion. But this I will say, that whatever may be said with respect to Savoy, my opinion is that the Treaty of Commerce with France is destined, if it obtains the approbation of the Parliament of this country, to strengthen the ties of friendship between the two nations, to increase the wealth and stimulate the industry of both, and that by thus giving a greater number of our own people and a greater number of the people of France an interest in the blessings of peace we shall delay, perhaps prevent, that calamity of war which, I think, it is the business of every European statesman to use his utmost efforts to avert. With these convictions I shall be ready, without entering into this question of Savoy, to give my earnest support to the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Middlesex (Mr. Byng) whenever he may bring that Motion forward; and when he does so, I trust the House will consider the question of the Treaty of Commerce as the main subject of our deliberations. Is there anything, I ask, connected with this question of Savoy to prevent our strengthening those relations which already exist with France by ties of commerce? I believe there is not, for my part. I cannot understand the part which the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Rock) takes in this matter. I cannot imagine anything more pernicious than to indulge in invective on such a subject against a neighbouring Sovereign without any definite object. If we have to bring forward at a future time the question of Savoy, after having disposed of coals and other matters of commerce germane to the Treaty, do not let hon. Gentlemen confine themselves to those general terms of solemn protest. The hon. Member for Horsham (Mr. S. FitzGerald) says we are to make a solemn protest. What is the meaning of that? I can understand the rest of the great Powers telling the Emperor of France, in a manner perfectly friendly, but, at the same time, in a manner perfectly firm, that this annexation would alarm Europe, and that the additional territory he would gain would be as nothing to the consequences it might entail upon him. I can understand that being said by the Powers of Europe in terms which would give it due force. But I can understand nothing by "a solemn protest" but this—"We offer our Resolution; accept it, and we will remain on friendly terms with you; refuse it, and we shall go to war!" I cannot imagine the great Powers of Europe going to the Emperor of the French with "a solemn protest" and then remaining contented with a flat refusal. It does not appear to me, therefore, that that is a course likely to lead to peace, or one calculated to prevent the Emperor of France carrying out the object he has in view. It does not appear that when the hon. Member (Mr. S. FitzGerald) was in office any great concern was felt on this subject. The Earl of Malmesbury was informed, as I am told, at the time that there was a story going about—said to rest on authority—of an agreement between France and Sardinia for the cession of Savoy. When I was told of it I said to my informant he should go to the Earl of Malmesbury. It did appear that the Earl of Malmesbury directed Earl Cowley to make inquiry on the subject, but in doing so he mixed it up with several other matters. Earl Cowley replied that he had asked Count Walewski about these several matters, and that Count Walewski did not make any observation with regard to the territorial question. If the Earl of Malmesbury had been very serious on this subject, he would surely have written again to Earl Cowley, and would not have been content with Earl Cowley saying that Count Walewski had made no observation on the territorial question. He would have asked of Earl Cowley, "Do they deny what is alleged with respect to Savoy? or, if they ever entertained it, have they given it up?" If I had been in office and Earl Cowley had written to me that he had received an unsatisfactory answer, I should certainly have asked him to put the question again. But this extreme zeal which we now see on the subject—a zeal which I must say, with all respect for the hon. Gentleman, goes beyond the mark, because it tends to endanger the continuance of the peaceful relations that exist between the two countries—is a newborn zeal, which the hon. Gentleman did not exhibit when he was in office. I wish to maintain the honour and dignity of the Queen and the honour and dignity of Parliament, but it does not seem to me that irritating discussions and imputations cast upon the French Government which are not to lead to any practical result or vote of the House can in any way contribute to that object. There was a discussion, the newspapers told us, some evenings ago in the other House of Parliament on this subject. I read with great pleasure the various speeches said to have been made on that occasion by the Members of different parties. It appears to me that they expressed in a grave and solemn way their opinions upon this question, and, if the House of Commons comes to give its opinion on the same question, I trust it will do so in the same spirit. The hon. Member for Tamworth (Sir Robert Peel) delighted the House the other night with his eloquence, and the language he employed was such as became the gravity of the subject; but I am sure that the use of exciting and irritating language and casting imputations on foreign Governments will add nothing to the dignity of this House, and nothing to the security of the peace of Europe.

Lord John Russell

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, the noble Lord had, unintentionally he was sure, done injustice to his predecessors in office. The noble Lord had informed the House that the Earl of Malmesbury on hearing the rumour of a treaty between France and Sardinia had contented himself with instructing Earl Cowley to demand an explanation from the Government of France, and that upon Earl Cowley stating that Count Walewski gave no answer whatever to his application, the Earl of Malmesbury allowed the matter to rest there. Now, the noble Lord, speaking from memory, had forgotten the state of the facts, and had—unintentionally, no doubt—misstated them. The late Government did not allow the matter to drop, in the way stated by the noble Lord, but obtained from the French Government a positive contradiction of the rumour that Earl Cowley had been instructed to bring before them. He hoped therefore that the noble Lord would take the earliest opportunity of unsaying what, from momentary forgetfulness, he had stated to the House on this subject. With reference to the question immediately before the House, he could not reconcile the tone of the noble Lord's speech that night with the one which he had delivered on Friday evening. The noble Lord on Friday invited the co-operation of both Houses of Parliament in the protest he was making against the proposed annexation of Savoy; but on the present occasion he understood him to deprecate discussion in that House, and that, too, while he seemed to approve the discussions which took place in the other House of Parliament. The noble Lord objected to what he called a precipitate judgment on the part of that House; but those who, like the hon. Member for Sheffield and himself, held that the Commercial Treaty ought not to receive the final sanction of Parliament till some deliberate expression of its opinion was given on this most momentous of all the questions of the day, found that the noble Lord himself had laid the foundation for the view they took in the first despatch he wrote on the subject of the Commercial Treaty. In that despatch the noble Lord gave special prominence to the importance of the Commercial Treaty in a European and political sense, though now he wished them to look at it simply on commercial grounds. The noble Lord said:—

"Its general tendency would be to lay broad and deep foundations in common interest and in friendly intercourse for the confirmation of the amicable relations that so happily exist between the two countries; and, while thus making a provision for the future, which would progressively become more and more solid and efficacious, its significance at the present moment, when the condition of some parts of the Continent is critical, would be at once understood, and would powerfully reassure the public mind in the various countries of Europe."

After this announcement on the part of the noble Lord, how was it possible for him now to ask Parliament to disavow, in their consideration of this question, the Commercial Treaty and the "critical condition of some parts of the Continent of Europe?" Would he deny that the condition of some parts of Europe was at this moment "critical?" And was the noble Lord entitled to ask them to refrain from giving an opinion on the causes that led to this critical condition of certain portions of Europe before their assent was given to the Treaty which the noble Lord said would enable France and England to lay deep the foundations of a common interest and a friendly intercourse? The noble Lord objected to what he seemed to think were teasing repetitions of the debate on the subject of Savoy. Everybody would agree with the noble Lord that they ought to discuss the question in a fair and legitimate manner, but he and those around him thought that that discussion should take precedence of the one in reference to the Treaty, which, according to the noble Lord was to prove to Europe that England and France marched side by side in general policy.

LORD HARRY VANE said, he thought they would hardly accomplish the object they all had in view, namely, to deprecate the annexation of Savoy to France, if they coupled that subject with the commercial Treaty. And if it were declared that Parliament would not assent to the latter unless the Emperor first gave an assurance that he would not proceed with his project in regard to the former. The country was unanimous in the desire to prevent the accomplishment of that annexation, and he agreed with the noble Lord (Lord J. Manners) in thinking that much value was to be attached to an expression of the opinion of Parliament on the subject; but he could not countenance the idea that any advantage would attend the use of violent and vituperative language towards the head of the French Government. He agreed with the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary in thinking that if this annexation was to be prevented it must be done by the united action of Europe, and not by a single protest of our own. The House was quite prepared to express its disapproval of the annexation, but to couple the two questions together, as had been proposed, might have a most injurious effect, as leading to an opinion in France that the Parliament of England were animated by feelings hostile to the Emperor of the French.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that as an independent Member of the House he wished to point out that they ought to alter the course of proceeding they had marked out. When the treaty of 1786 was negotiated preliminary Resolutions were laid on the table, so that the House of Commons of that day had an opportunity of discussing the political bearing of the proposed Treaty independently of its commercial and financial phases. Had the Government pursued that course on the present occasion the difficulties the obstacles of which they now complained would not have arisen. Instead of pursuing that course the Government had preferred to plunge the House into a consideration of the Treaty in a Committee of Ways and Means, telling them they were bound to accept it by important political considerations, yet defeating all discussion upon the Treaty, which involved these very political considerations. It was most unfair on the part of the Government, when such an eventuality as the proposed annexation of Savoy was occurring, to ask the House to express an opinion upon the Treaty without placing any Resolution before them for their consideration. The hon. Member for Birmingham said, "Perish Savoy!" And, as if to accomplish the object which the hon. Member seemed to desire, the House was about to enter into commercial transactions with France affecting £1,000,000 of our revenue, and the Government were offering whatever advantage that sacrifice of revenue entailed as a subsidy to France? The House of Commons was perfectly right in demanding a fair opportunity of deliberately stating that if they granted commercial and financial advantages to France through a commercial Treaty, they did not do it with a view of subsidizing France that she might crush the freedom of Savoy. He had been delighted to hear the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck). Some of his expressions with respect to the Emperor of the French were, perhaps, too severe; but he rejoiced to hear an independent Member vindicate the right of the British House of Commons to put its own interpretation upon its own language and its own acts. He would repeat that, whatever the inconvenience might be of which the Government might consider themselves entitled to complain, was entirely attributable to the fact that they had departed from the precedents of the House. Due time should have been and ought still to be given for the consideration of the proposed address to the Throne.

Mr. Newdegate

Because they were in danger, by hasty action, of having their friendship for France misinterpreted into a feeling of indifference to the interests of Savoy.

MR. BENTINCK said, he only differed from his hon. Friend who had just spoken upon one point. He went all lengths in the opinion that the House ought to have ample time for considering this question of Savoy before they accepted the Treaty with France. He would even go further, and say that the worst thing that could happen for the honour and happiness of England was that the Treaty should ever be ratified at all. But concurring, as he did cordially, in the strongest language that could be used against such a course being pursued, he as heartily deprecated the use of personal language and coarse invective. Such language never hurt those against whom it was addressed; it only recoiled upon those who uttered it; but whatever its effect might be it was discreditable both to the House of Commons and to the country which they represented. He agreed with the hon. Gentleman who had addressed them, that the Government had only themselves to blame for the difficulty in which they were placed; they should have placed a definite Resolution before the House, and courted its opinion; but, instead of taking that course, they had simply followed the same course they had pursued from the commencement of the Session and endeavoured by every means in their power to stifle discussion. He could admit the representations of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the general interests of the country required that there should be no delay in passing the Resolutions. It was, of course, natural that the class represented by the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. B. B. B.) should be in favour of it, because they were pecuniarily interested in the successful termination of the negotiation; and the hon. Member for Birmingham even exercised a powerful control over the proceedings of Her Majesty's Government (Mr. Bentinck) was not surprised at the Government endeavouring to hurry proceedings before the House, and to stifle all discussion. Indeed, so much did the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer endeavour to stifle discussion that it had given rise to the belief that there must be some object in this precipitating matters, and that an impression was felt that, if certain negotiations were not explained satisfactorily, stacles might arise to the completion of the pending arrangements. Now, he confessed he should be too glad to see any obstacle interposed to the success of the proposed Treaty. He believed that almost every interest in England was opposed to this Treaty. [A laugh.] Hon. Members might laugh; but let them compare the number of hon. Gentlemen representing commercial interests who have spoken favourably of this Treaty with the number who had spoken against it. The reason why the Government had carried their Resolutions was that those who opposed the Treaty, instead of wisely uniting for a common purpose, had been cut to pieces in detail. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bright) had charged those who sat upon the Opposition benches with not pursuing a manly course in regard to this Treaty. But he (Mr. Bentinck) would ask the hon. Member for Birmingham whether it was manly to sacrifice the honour and interests of England merely for the beneficial results to a particular class of a Commercial Treaty? Because such was the result of the hon. Member's observations: there was nothing that he would not sacrifice for that Treaty. If that was the hon. Member's opinion of what constituted a manly course he (Mr. Bentinck) could only say their views differed very materially. The hon. Gentleman had taken occasion to observe that they were sitting in the English House of Commons and not in the Parliament of France; but many speeches of the hon. Gentleman had given him the impression that they ought rather to be addressed to the Congress of the United States, to the proceedings of which it was the avowed object of the hon. Gentleman to assimilate their debates. With regard to the hon. Gentleman's imputation that Members on the Opposition side of the House were actuated by party feelings, he totally disclaimed it. They were only actuated by a conviction that the Treaty was alike prejudicial to the honour and interests of this country.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE inquired whether the Motion with respect to an Address to Her Majesty regarding the Commercial Treaty with France would be brought forward on Thursday or Friday?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: On Thursday.

MR. STIRLING said, some very important papers had been published that morning in the newspapers, which formed no part of the Correspondence that had been laid on the table of the House. The noble Lord likewise had stated that a very important despatch might be expected from Count Cavour in reply to that addressed to him by the French Government. As it was natural to suppose that the Sardinian Government would wish the greatest publicity to be given to their opinions, he had no doubt, copies of both documents would be forwarded to this country. He wished, therefore, to inquire whether these papers would be laid on the table before the debate was taken on the Address to the Crown, respecting the Commercial Treaty with France. He put this question because, like many eminent Members of the House, he felt unable to separate the question of Savoy from the other matters involved in the Treaty. By this instrument they were about to enter into new and unnatural engagements with the Emperor of the French,—engagements which in July last the noble Lord on the Treasury bench had several times declared ought not to be entered into with any Power whatever. As an independent Member of Parliament, before he gave his assent to engagements with a foreign Power he had a right to ask how the Sovereign of that State observed older and more important engagements with other free States of Europe. He had a right to know how far the rights guaranteed by Treaty to Switzerland would be respected. On this subject the papers on the table of the House gave no satisfaction whatever, save that the representative of Switzerland in Paris was utterly unable to obtain information, and seemed to be haunting the British Embassy for the sake of the intelligence which might be gained in that quarter. It was, therefore, but reasonable that hon. Members, by the production of those papers, should be afforded an opportunity of making up their minds before they were called on to vote an Address to the Crown.

MR. COLLIER said, an appeal had been made by the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton to his hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland to withdraw his Motion, which proposed that further negotiations should be entered into for the purpose of inducing the French Government to enter into a supplementary treaty of navigation, and to relax their laws in favour of British shipping. He understood the noble Lord to make this appeal chiefly on the ground that to propose an addition of this kind to the Address, would be very inconvenient;

but he understood him at the same time to say that if the Motion were brought forward in a substantive form, a day would be given for the purpose, and he also collected that the noble Lord would not be disposed to give any opposition to the principle of the Motion. On the question of navigation he considered the Commercial Treaty to be defective, and the country, he thought, had reason to complain of the stringency of the French regulations, while our restrictions had all been abolished. He ventured to ask whether he had correctly understood the statement of the noble Lord? If he were correct he would advise his hon. Friend (Mr. Lindsay) to accede to the proposal of the Government.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs gave an assurance last year that the Emperor of the French had abstained from all intention of annexing Savoy.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: At that time he did, as will appear by the despatch of Count Walewski.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, the despatch of Count Walewski did state a possible event in which the Emperor of the French, even at that time, considered the annexation of Savoy indispensable; which was, in case any addition were made to Piedmont on the side of the Duchies or the Legations. He wished to know whether the noble Lord had any objection to produce the correspondence in which that eventuality was described, because it was quite clear that so far back as July, 1859, the Emperor of the French and his Government, in some way or other, declared to Earl Cowley that the annexation of Savoy should follow the occurrence of certain contingencies with regard to Sardinia. It was quite clear that if such a distinct declaration had been made, the Emperor of the French had a right to say that Her Majesty's Government received full warning.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: In answer to the question of the hon. Member for Perthshire (Mr. Stirling) with respect to certain despatches relating to France and Savoy, I have to state that no such despatch has yet arrived, and I do not know if it has yet been written. As soon as the reply of the Sardinian Government has been communicated I shall be ready to lay it on the table of the House, but it is impossible for me to say when that may occur, or to what further correspondence it may give rise. The despatches of M. Thouvenel have appeared in all the newspapers, but if the House wish for copies they will of course be laid on the Table. Respecting the discussion of the question of annexation in 1859 there is no public despatch whatever on the subject. Earl Cowley, from time to time in his private letters, said Count Walewski agreed that the annexation of Tuscany to Sardinia was impossible, but if such a case should ever by possibility occur, it would then be for France to consider whether her frontiers would be safe without the annexation of Savoy. But Earl Cowley, who has acted throughout with great discretion, did not think proper to introduce loose conversations or casual intimations into his official correspondence.

Mr. Collier

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I wish to explain a matter which is not clearly understood by the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth (Mr. Collier). What I did state to the hon. Member for Sunderland was, that if he would suffer us to discuss the proposition which he proposed as an addition to the Address to Her Majesty as a separate and substantive Motion, the Government could have no possible objection to the opinions which it embodied being expressed to the House; and they might even think that such an expression would assist them in any negotiation which might be made officially with France.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

CUSTOMS ACTS.—COMMITTEE.

House in Committee according to Order.
Mr. MASSEY in the Chair.

(In the Committee.)

Moved, That the Duties of Customs chargeable upon the goods, wares, and merchandise hereinafter mentioned, imported into Great Britain and Ireland, shall cease and determine, namely:—

“Ammunition, as denominated in the tariff.”

COLONEL SYKES inquired, whether there would not be some restriction on the importation of arms, such as existed with respect to the sale of fire arms manufactured in this country, which required to have the Tower brand upon them?

MR. LAING said, that the present Resolution only affected the import duties upon the articles specified, and had nothing to do with police regulations for the public safety.

“ Butter.”

In reply to Colonel UPTON,

MR. LAING said, that it would be declared duty free, and that if there was anything deleterious combined with it, it would be the duty of the Excise to interfere. As regarded the item of dates, they had gone on the principle of protecting the sugar revenue.

9. Resolved,

“ That the Duties of Customs chargeable upon the Goods, Wares, and Merchandise hereinafter mentioned, imported into Great Britain and Ireland, shall cease and determine, namely,— Almonds, not Jordan nor bitter.

——— Jordan.

Ammunition, as denominated in the Tariff.

Apples, dried.

Baskets.

Beads, as denominated in the Tariff.

Boxes, namely, Brass.

——— not otherwise charged with Duty.

Butter.

——— of and from a British Possession.

Candles, as denominated in the Tariff.

Capers, including the Pickle.

Cassia Lignea.

Cheese.

——— of and from a British Possession.

Cinnamon.

Cloves.

Coculus Indicus.

Copper, Manufactures of, not otherwise enumerated or described, and Copper Plates engraved.

Coral negligées.

Daguerreotype Plates.

Dates.

Eggs.

——— of and from a British Possession.

Extracts, as denominated in the Tariff.

Ginger.

Glass, Flint Cut Glass, Flint Coloured Glass, and Fancy Ornamental Glass of whatever kind.

Gongs.

Grains, Guinea and of Paradise.

Japanned or Lacquered Ware.

Liquorice Paste.

——— of and from British Possessions.

——— Powder.

——— of and from British Possessions.

——— Juice.

Mace.

Mustard, Flour.

——— Mixed or Manufactured, except Flour.

Nutmegs, as denominated in the Tariff.

Nuts, small nuts.

——— Walnuts.

Nux Vomica.

Oilcloth.

Onions.

Opium.

Oranges and Lemons.

Pears, dried.

Pewter, Manufactures of, not otherwise enumerated.

Pimento.

Platting, as denominated in the Tariff.

Pomatum.

Quassia.

Rice, not rough nor in the husk.

——— rough and in the husk.

Salacine.

Sauces, not otherwise enumerated.

Scaleboards,

Seeds, Caraway.

——— of and from British Possessions.

Ships, Foreign built, broken up, or sold to be broken up or abandoned by the owners, or sold as wreck, whether afterwards recovered or repaired or not.

Soap, as denominated in the Tariff.

Soy.

Spa Ware.

Spelter or Zinc, manufactures of, not otherwise enumerated.

Stearine.

Tallow.

——— of and from British Possessions.

Tin, foil.

——— manufactures of, not otherwise enumerated.

Veneers.

Washing Balls.

Yarn, namely, Woollen or Worsted, as denominated in the Tariff.

Resolution 10.

“ Gold Plate.”

MR. AYRTON said, that no homelmanufacturer could sell an article of gold or silver till it had been submitted to the assay of Goldsmith's Hall, and obtained their stamp as a proof of genuineness. If it was not exactly up to the standard, the article was liable to be broken up. This was often the cause of great expense to the manufacturer, and involved the necessity of being a little above the standard. He thought that gold and silver plate imported into this country ought to pay some amount of duty above that proposed (17s. per oz. troy for gold plate, and 1s. 6d. per oz. troy for silver) to represent the expenses of this process of assay, or be made liable to some similar process after importation.

COLONEL SYKES thought the public should be assured that the articles imported were really gold and silver.

MR. LAING said, the measures necessary to ascertain the purity of the articles would be taken by the Customs on the clearance, and the proper place to introduce the requisite provisions would be in the Customs Bill. He would take care before this Resolution was reported to be in a position to give full information to the hon. Member of what was intended to be done when the Customs Bill was introduced. He should be able to say, at a later stage, what those measures were.

10. Resolved,

“ That, in lieu of the Duties of Customs now chargeable on the articles undermentioned imported into Great Britain and Ireland, the following Duties shall be charged,—

		s.	d.
Plate of Gold	the oz. troy	17	0
— Silver, gilt or ungilt, the	oz. troy	1	6
Powder, namely,—
Hair Powder	the cwt.	0	4½
Perfumed	the cwt.	0	4½
Vermicelli and Macaroni	the cwt.	0	4½
Currants	the cwt.	7	0
Figs	the cwt.	7	0
Fig Cake	the cwt.	7	0
Raisins	the cwt.	7	0

Resolution 11.

“ Wood and Timber, hewn, and Lath-wood.”

COLONEL SYKES asked, whether any drawback would be allowed for the duty paid on stocks in hand?

MR. LAING said, the payment of drawbacks, unless under special arrangements, had been discontinued. On timber no drawbacks was intended to be given as there was no Excise survey.

COLONEL SYKES said, there were some kinds of timber that could be identified, and which were fairly entitled to a drawback.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER observed, that this was a question not affecting timber only, but was applicable to almost all descriptions of foreign goods liable to the law and duties of Customs, although there were some that could not be identified from their appearance with others that could. The holders of silks and of French gloves were in the same position with those of wood, and there was no way of dealing with the question except by drawing a line between those goods that were under survey and those that were not.

11. Resolved,

“ That in lieu of the Duties of Customs now chargeable on Wood and Timber, as denominated in the Tariff, Foreign and Colonial, on importation into the United Kingdom, the following Duties shall be charged:—

	s.	d.
Wood and Timber, hewn, and Lath-wood	1	0
— sawn or split, planed or dressed	2	0
Firewood, not exceeding three feet in length	1	0

Resolution 12.

“ Teak and Wood for ship-building purposes 1s. the load.”

MR. AYRTON moved the substitution of 5s. for 1s.

Amendment proposed to leave out 1s. and insert 5s. instead thereof.

Question proposed, “ That 1s. stand part of the proposed Resolution.”

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the nominal duty of 1s. had been put on in compliance with the representations of the trade. So far as the Government could ascertain, the general feeling of the trade was in favour of this nominal imposition which would afford the parties an opportunity of obtaining a correct idea of the quantity, measurement, &c., through the Customs-house lists.

MR. AYRTON said, he would withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

	s.	d.
Mahogany, Hard Wood, or Furniture
Wood	1	0
Staves, not exceeding 72 inches in length nor 7 inches in breadth nor 3½ inches in thickness (except Staves for Herring Barrels) the load	1	0

13. Resolved,

“ That so much of Act 16th and 17th Vic. c. 107, sec. 44, as prohibits the Importation of Malt, be repealed, and that the following Duty be charged thereon, on importation into Great Britain and Ireland, namely,—

	£	s.	d.
Malt	1	5	0

14. Resolved,

“ That the Duties and drawbacks of Customs now charged and allowed on the articles under-mentioned shall continue to be levied, charged and allowed, on and after the 1st of April 1860, until the 1st of July 1861, on Importation into the United Kingdom, or on Exportation therefrom to Foreign parts, or on removal to the Isle of Man for consumption therein, namely,— Tea.

Sugar, as denominated in the Tariff.
Molasses.
Cherries, dried.
Comfits, dry.
Confectionary.
Ginger, preserved.
Marmalade.
Plums, preserved in Sugar.
Succades, including all Fruits and Vegetables preserved in Sugar not otherwise enumerated.

House resumed.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow.
Committee report Progress; to sit again on Wednesday.

WAYS AND MEANS.—COMMITTEE.

House in Committee according to Order.
MR. MASSEY in the Chair.

(In the Committee.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he would now move the Resolutions by which he proposed to allow the British distillers a drawback of 2*d.* per gallon on raw spirits, and of 3*d.* on rectified in the case of exportation. These amounts were calculated by the officers of revenue as a just compensation to the distillers in respect of their Excise disadvantages.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, that it was usual to print Resolutions of this kind, in order that those who took an interest in such matters might have an opportunity of being present at the discussion of them.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the substance of the Resolution had been printed, and had been in the hands of Members some four or five days ago ; so that full notice had been given to everybody interested.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, that manufacturers of British wine had complained that by the propositions of the Chancellor of the Exchequer they were unfairly placed with regard to the foreign manufacturers, and he wished to know whether any relief could be afforded to them?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he had taken the case of the British wine manufacturers into his consideration, and could not see that they had any claim for relief. The articles of which they manufactured their wines were sugar, on which the duty would be reduced if we could have afforded it, and brandy and raisins, on which the duty would actually be reduced considerably. In fact, the manufacturers of British wines would pay less duty on their materials than the importers of foreign wines would pay under the reduced scale of duty. They could not therefore have much claim for relief.

Resolved,

" That, in consideration of the loss and hindrance caused by Excise regulations in the distillation and rectification of Spirits in the United Kingdom, there shall be paid to any distiller or proprietor of such Spirits in a duty-free warehouse, on the exportation thereof, on or after the date of this Resolution, an allowance of two pence per proof gallon.

" And to any licensed rectifier, who on or after the date of this Resolution, shall have deposited in a Customs warehouse for exportation Spirits distilled and rectified in the United Kingdom, the following allowances on the exportation thereof (that is to say) : On rectified Spirits of the nature of British compounds, not exceeding 11⁰/₁₀ O.P., as ascertained by Sykes' Hydrometer, an allowance of three pence per proof gallon ; and on Spirits of the nature of Spirits of Wine, an allowance of two pence per proof gallon.

House resumed.

Resolution to be reported To-morrow.

Committee to sit again on Wednesday.

SAVINGS BANKS AND FRIENDLY SOCIETIES INVESTMENTS BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made and Question proposed, " That the Bill be now read a second time."

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not proceed with this Bill in the absence of several hon. Members who were interested in the discussions on the Bill, but who had left the House not believing that there was any chance of the second reading being moved that evening. The question was an unfortunate one involving as it did the sum of £43,000,000 of money, while many savings banks objected to the measure. Perceiving by a gesture of the right hon. Gentleman, however, that he meant to press the second reading, he (Sir Henry Willoughby) begged to move the adjournment of the debate on the second reading.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER observed that when the House was in Committee he made a full statement of the nature of the Bill ; and in accordance with the pledge then given, he had allowed it to remain for several weeks in the hands of hon. Members before he had placed a notice of the second reading on the paper. Not having had the slightest reason to suppose that the proposed legislation was really deemed objectionable, he felt bound to persevere, knowing, as every hon. Gentleman must know, the difficulty he should otherwise have, in the pressure of business, to find opportunities for carrying forward a Bill of this kind. The hon. Baronet (Sir Henry Willoughby) said, that some savings banks had objections to the Bill. Why, savings banks could have nothing to say against it ; for what it proposed was that every depositor in a savings bank should have an absolute legal title against the State—as absolute as that possessed by the holder of Three per Cents. The hon. Baronet himself had often complained that the depositors in savings banks had not that security. If this Bill passed they would have it by as strong a title as it was in the wit of man to devise. If the hon. Baronet wished him to again explain all the provisions of the Bill he would repeat what he had stated when introducing it.

MR. GREGSON said, he took as great an interest in savings banks and friendly societies as the hon. Baronet could do; and he regarded the measure as one of great importance to the interests of the depositors in those institutions. He hoped the Bill was to be read a second time, and the discussion taken on the Speaker's leaving the chair.

COLONEL SYKES said, it was expected that a great political question would occupy the greater part of the night, and that the Customs Committee would take up the remainder; and under these circumstances he put it to the right hon. Gentleman whether it was fair in the then state of the House to proceed with the second reading? The Bill was a most important one and reserved an objectionable power to the Chancellor of the Exchequer which he, in common with other hon. Members, had always opposed.

MR. J. L. RICARDO said, he would appeal to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to postpone the Motion. He could not see that under its provisions the functions of the Chancellor of the Exchequer were much less powerful than they were under the present arrangement. He had himself asked several questions on this subject, and he understood that the Chancellor of the Exchequer promised to explain the provisions of the Bill fully on the second reading. He had no idea that the Bill would be discussed that night, and he had been in communication with several other Members, who agreed with him that the discussion should be taken when due notice had been given, and when all were prepared for it.

MR. AYRTON said, that he confessed he had understood the right hon. Gentleman to promise an explanation of the measure on the second reading. He (Mr. Ayrton) had moved for some Returns which he thought necessary to demonstrate the operation of the existing system. These had not yet been produced, and he felt it impossible to go into the discussion without them. The House was entirely taken by surprise, this Bill having come on when the whole evening was expected to be occupied with a great debate. The measure was most important both in its principle and in the application of it. They were to begin a new system—the Chancellor of the Exchequer was to sit before a great book, on which he was to inscribe debts against the nation, and what the effect might be it was extremely difficult to foretell. He objected to going on now with the second reading of the Bill, unless the Chancellor of the Exchequer stated it to be a matter of paramount necessity. If, however, he gave that assurance, he would offer no impediment, although he considered the plan of taking discussions on going into Committee, as a rule, very objectionable.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, he very much doubted whether, if notice were given, a fuller House could be got together than was then assembled. If Bills were not read a second time after notice given, the business of the House must come to a stand-still; and Governments had often been justly blamed for not pushing through their measures when they had the opportunity.

MR. W. WILLIAMS thought that the subject ought to undergo a full discussion, and as the Chancellor of the Exchequer had offered an opportunity for its consideration at a future stage, it might be as well taken then.

MR. BENTINCK said, he could not agree with the noble Lord the Member for Stamford, and he thought the second reading ought not to be taken that evening. The House was quite taken by surprise, in consequence of the rapidity with which they had gone through the various articles in the Customs Acts Resolutions during the half-hour that Members were absent at dinner. He begged to give notice that it was his intention, in the course of the evening, to ask the right hon. Gentleman when it was his intention to bring up the Report on the Customs Acts.

MR. LONGFIELD remarked, that he did not wish to obstruct the progress of the measure, but he thought it would give more satisfaction if it were brought forward after due notice.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, he thought this Bill extremely important. Many thousands were interested in it, and it was a little unfair to proceed with it after the notice given by the noble Lord at the head of the Government, to move "That the other Orders of the Day be postponed until after the notice of Motion for an Address to Her Majesty on the subject of the Commercial Treaty with France."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he must protest against the course taken by hon. Gentlemen on this matter. He was quite ready at that moment to explain the provisions of the Bill, and he hoped that this stage would be allowed to pass.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Debate be now adjourned," put, and negatived.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, it would, perhaps, be agreeable to some hon. Members that he should state the general objects of the Bill. They were of such a character that he did not expect any opposition to the second reading. He could conceive it possible that there might be some difference of opinion on some points in the clauses, and he quite agreed that great attention ought to be paid to the Bill when in Committee. But those who spoke of the enormous powers conferred on the Executive Government by the measure, should bear in mind that, if the Bill dropped, the Executive Government would retain their present powers intact, and that by passing the measure they would impose material limitations and restrictions on the powers which the Executive Government now possessed. The hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) said, the Chancellor of the Exchequer was going to write down obligations against the public in a book, and was greatly alarmed at the consequences which might ensue. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was only taking power to write down against the public a debt for which the State was already, partly in law, and partly in honour and equity, entirely liable. The present law authorized certain institutions called savings banks, acting to a great extent under voluntary and independent management, to receive the monies of those who were disposed to place them in their custody, with conditions as to interest and as to time and amounts of deposit and withdrawal, which were fixed in a certain degree by law, and in some points left to discretion. The law likewise presumed that these institutions would forward the monies which they received to an institution in London, where they passed into the immediate custody of the Government. The House would observe then, that the savings banks constituted an intermediate body between the Government and the depositor, and it was essential to keep that distinction in view, because the subject divided itself into two great departments, one which related to the conditions upon which the savings banks were constituted, and on which they received the money of depositors; the other which related to the receipt of monies from the savings banks by the Government, and the manner in which the Government managed the monies while they retained them in their custody until they restored them in answer to the calls of the savings banks. With the first of these departments the present Bill had nothing whatever to do. The government and management of savings banks, the responsibility or irresponsibility of the trustees or their officers, and the security which the depositor should, might, or did enjoy, constituted a subject well demanding the attention of the House; and he confessed it was a great disappointment to him to find that the Committee appointed a short time ago for the purpose of investigating the subject of savings banks paid no attention to the constitution or management of savings banks, or to the relations between them and the depositors, but confined their inquiry mainly to the management of the monies by the Government, which was, in point of fact, a great question of State policy, and absolutely distinct from that of the management of the banks themselves, when once they had complied with the conditions which were necessary to give an absolute title to the depositor for everything which had been received by the savings banks. The great principle advocated by the Committee and the first principle contained in this Bill was a substitution of a real and correct statement of that portion of the National Debt, which represented those monies, in lieu of an uncertain and untrue statement. At present the system was this,—The Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, who received the funds of savings' banks and friendly societies, invested those funds in Government securities, retaining such balances as they pleased. But from various causes, some of them political causes, some relating directly to the interests of savings banks, the money value of stocks held by the Commissioners, added to the cash in their hands, did not represent a sum precisely equal to the obligations. Their assets, in point of fact, were not equal to their liabilities. It was very much disputed as to what cause or what class of causes the deficiency was to be attributed. Those who had had the financial management considered, and he thought rightly considered, that it was mainly owing to the nature of the terms on which the monies were received. A fixed rate of interest was allowed by the State to the savings banks. It followed that when the funds were high and the rate of interest generally low there was great disposition to invest in savings banks, because then the fixed rate of interest offered to depositors something better than they were likely to obtain elsewhere; but when the Funds were low the case was exactly opposite. There was a great inducement for depositors to call for money, and sales of stock must take place to satisfy those calls. Therefore, the normal operation of the system was that the Commissioners were buyers of stock when the market was high, and sellers when the market was low. That was an obvious cause, and he believed the main cause, of the difference which existed between assets and liabilities. But, on the other hand, these funds were also made subservient to great public objects. At times, when financial operations of the utmost benefit and advantage to the public were in prospect, the purchases made on account of the nation through the medium of these funds greatly facilitated those operations. The examination of these proceedings was a matter of great consequence to the House, but had nothing to do with the security of the savings-banks depositors. However well the Government managed, and whatever profit they might make, it was admitted that the depositors had no claim to a single farthing. On the other hand, if the Government made ducks and drakes of £20,000,000 out of £40,000,000, the moral obligation existed for the restoration, entire and scathless, of the monies which the State had received. Therefore the financial part of the question was not a part in which the depositors were interested, and, to his mind, nothing could be more mischievous to the depositors than to pretend they had any concern in it, because it would recognize a liability in respect of it in them which they had not at present. At present there was no liability on the part of the depositors. They were entitled to say, "We have a fixed definite contract with you, and we do not expect or desire to claim anything beyond that contract." The management, however, was a matter of great importance to the public and one of the consequences of the mode of investment up to the present time had been that there was no correct statement of the liabilities of the State. At the present moment there was a difference of somewhat more than £2,000,000 between the sums of which the Commissioners stood possessed—if they realized all the stock they held—and the sums for which they were liable to different savings banks. The mode in which they proposed to manage the finances in future was, as the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) truly said, by opening a great book, in which would be written the sums themselves, with a provision for the rectification of the account from year to year. Instead of holding that vast amount of stock, with its varied and fluctuating value, they would cancel a great part of it, and in lieu of it enter in a book, which would contain the State deposit account No. 1, the capital sum. From time to time, when the accounts were nearly balanced, that capital sum would be so regulated as to represent as nearly as possible the total amount of the real obligations of the State to the savings banks and friendly societies instead of their being unaware of what was the actual amount of their engagements, and, in fact, supposing it to be a couple of millions less than it was. That was the explanation of the 1st and 2nd clauses of the Bill. The 3rd clause was framed on the principle of maintaining the annual charge somewhere about what it was now, and when construed in connection with a subsequent clause it provided that a limited portion of the stock should be held as dead—stock not liable to bear interest. The principle on which this would be done was exactly analogous to that on which they now regulated by law the unclaimed dividends on the National Debt. The arrangement proposed by the Bill was to convert into that actual statement of capital liabilities the greater part of the stock now held by the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, but at the same time to retain in their hands such a portion as might be sufficient to meet any probable, and perhaps any possible, amount of calls. The abstract possibility of calls which might go beyond the limit was, indeed, provided for by certain parts of the Bill, which gave powers for the reconversion of the State deposit account into marketable securities in case of need. Practically, however, they might treat that as a contingency to be almost put out of view. The general rule would be that about three-fourths of the liabilities would be hereafter represented by means of the sum inscribed in the State deposit account, and the other part would be held in stock, in various securities, and in cash. And this was the first

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

important restriction applied by the Bill to the powers of the Executive Government. At present the powers of the Executive were entirely uncontrolled with reference to the whole of these stocks. For the future they would be applicable only to about one-fourth part of these stocks—that was to say, to the portion of the assets of the Commissioners which would be ordinarily held in these securities, and not to the portion represented by the State deposit account, for that account could not be diminished by any act of the Commissioners, or of the Executive Government, except for the purpose of meeting absolute calls when they came from the creditor, that was, from the savings banks, and after all other means of meeting those calls should have been exhausted. The 5th clause provided another most important limitation of the powers of the Executive—namely, that deficiency Exchequer bills, and Ways and Means Exchequer bills, might not be funded by the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt. The House will remember that at present, whenever there was a deficiency in the public revenue, or, indeed, whenever there was a deficiency in the sum applicable to meet consolidated fund charges for the coming quarter, it was in the power of the Executive to supply that deficiency by means, not of the revenue of the current year, nor of the funds which Parliament when appealed to should provide, but by means of money obtained from the savings banks and friendly societies. Indeed, even when the revenue of the year was amply sufficient for the purposes of the State, still, from the peculiar arrangements of the quarterly charges on the Consolidated Fund, and from the power which the Government necessarily held to cause an issue of deficiency bills to meet the excess of those charges, it was now positively practicable for the Executive, from quarter to quarter, to issue deficiency bills, and subsequently convert them into part of the permanent debt of the country without obtaining the consent of Parliament. That power was entirely cut away by the fifth clause of this Bill. It was another question whether it was necessary that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should possess the power of converting Exchequer bills into stock. He was not prepared to say that this power ought to be done away with, or whether it would be proper to limit it, but he did not wish to preclude the discussion of it in Committee. He came next to a set of provisions in which, following not the details, but the principles of the Report of the Committee on Savings Banks, the Bill gave a larger liberty of investment for these funds than had heretofore existed. Hitherto the investments had been entirely confined to the Parliamentary stocks of this country, to Exchequer bills and Exchequer bonds. It would, of course, be very exceptionable to give any large latitude of investment to the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, provided they were to exercise any judgment on the sufficiency of the securities, dependent on their own choice only, and not limited by Parliament. Parliament ought to define very rigidly the space within which they should have the power of selecting investments. The limitations expressed in this Bill were therefore very strictly defined. It was proposed to leave them entitled, as they now were, to invest in any Parliamentary stock or security—that was, in any instrument issued by the authority of Parliament, and chargeable directly on the revenues of the country, whether by way of supply service or on the Consolidated Fund. But besides these there were other Parliamentary liabilities. There were certain guaranteed stocks with respect to which the ultimate liability of Parliament was just as full and entire as with respect to the stocks of this country. There were stocks, for example, like the Proprietary Stock of the East India Company, with regard to which a certain amount of guarantee had been provided by the Legislature. The Bill proposed, therefore, that the power of investment now possessed by the Commissioners should be so far enlarged as to include that description of security. The effect of that would be, that they would in no respect go beyond stocks with reference to which Parliament had made a special provision to secure them; and at the same time they would be enabled, as to a certain portion of their assets, to get a better interest and manage their funds more profitably for the country than heretofore. They would not, however, go beyond a certain amount, especially in a given time. He would take the Canada guaranteed loan of a million and a half for the sake of illustration, although a considerable portion of that was now provided for. It was not at all desirable, where a third party was the debtor, and the Parliament of England only backed him with a State guarantee, that the Commissioners for the reduction of the National Debt should acquire such a proportion of that stock as to become themselves the principal creditors. Parliament would then be placed in a false position. The Bill, therefore, proposed to limit the proportion of any stock of that character which the Commissioners might hold, as well as to limit absolutely the amount they might in any of these cases invest. It might be that other limitations would be suggested in Committee. Those he had specified were at any rate sound in principle, and would, he hoped, be taken as indications of the spirit in which the Bill had been framed. The Bill also contained other powers, enabling the Commissioners to make exchanges of securities under certain circumstances; but these could be better explained in Committee. Suffice it to say, that one of the objects of that exchange was to give the Commissioners the power of from time to time buying up certain stocks, of which the quantity was so very small in the market that they did not form a convenient medium of investment. The eighth and ninth clauses of the Bill related to the balancing of the whole of the accounts on the 29th of November, so as to represent the real amount of the liabilities of the State to parties. In the eleventh clause provision was made for giving to savings banks and friendly societies an absolute title in the funds vested under this Act in the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt; and it was intended likewise to provide, in the case of the failure of those securities, that they should have a claim on other funds of the State. He might mention that the general effect of the measure would be to create very considerable public economy. He could not say precisely to what extent that economy would go, because he did not know yet what the Commissioners would find it practicable and advisable to do in the way of varying their investments; but various sources of economy would be opened up. At present, for instance, the Commissioners were holders of some £40,000,000 of stock, out of which they proposed to cancel £31,000,000; and the law fixed £300 per million payable to the Bank of England for the management of the National Debt. That arrangement was a very reasonable one as long as the different portions of the property that constituted the debt were continually undergoing transfer from hand to hand; but now that the State had itself become the possessor of a vast sum, nearly the whole of which remained entirely without involving any cost or trouble in transfer or management in any form whatever, the bargain required revision. The change which was now proposed would therefore effect a saving on that account of between £9,000 and £10,000 a year; and over and above that he expected the Commissioners would realize a considerably better income from whatever investments they might make under the authority of the Bill in funds guaranteed by Parliament, though not regular Government stock. There would be no sudden or wholesale alterations, but in the course of two or three years the effect of the Bill would be to secure a permanent saving to the country of not less than £40,000 or £50,000 a year. He ought also to mention that, in addition to the forms of investment he had mentioned, the Bill gave power to the Commissioners to invest money for the purposes of the Exchequer Loan Fund. He did not intend in submitting that provision to ask the House at that moment to give effect to any practical proposal on the subject. The power would remain dormant till the House had the opportunity of considering whether it was really desirable we should go on advancing money out of the Exchequer to the Exchequer Loan Fund Commissioners for the purpose of enabling them to lend it to various parties in the country, or whether it would not be better to transfer that function altogether to the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, who would then have a new and profitable mode of investment open to them. He did not mean to throw any disparagement on the Exchequer Loan Fund Commission, which had proved a very useful institution, and had worked exceedingly well. But it was certainly a question to be considered, whether a State heavily indebted as we were, and holders of means of that kind continually falling in, ought not to use a portion of those means to carry on useful works, in preference to advancing money for that purpose from a fund which had to be raised by taxation. A Bill would have to be brought in to provide for such advances, for the receipt of the money by the Exchequer Loan Fund, and for its management, and the question could then be fully discussed. These were the principal provisions of the present measure, which he hoped would meet with the favourable consideration of the House, both on that occasion and in Committee.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

MR. HENLEY said, he did not rise to offer any opposition to the second reading of the Bill. As far as he understood the measure, its chief aim appeared to be to make such arrangements as would prevent £30,000,000 of the savings banks funds from being jobbed—he did not use the word offensively—for the purposes of Government at particular times. It was the general opinion that if that object could be gained without inconvenience it would be most desirable. He thought, however, that some of the provisions of the Bill would require great consideration in Committee. There was no doubt that legislation on this subject was necessary, inasmuch as the Government were pledged to pay to those depositors every farthing of their money which passed into their hands. The simpler the accounts were kept the better for all parties concerned. There was, no doubt, an impression abroad—whether ill or well founded he could not say—that great losses had been sustained by the improper treatment of the funds by those persons who had immediate control over them. These were the only observations which struck him as necessary to make on the present occasion. He hoped they would go into Committee at such a time as would allow the matter to be fully discussed, as they had all one interest in getting this question put on a sound and satisfactory footing. It was a matter on which no party feelings could have place as all must be anxious to do the best they could to promote the welfare of these most useful and valuable institutions.

MR. AYRTON said, that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not done complete justice to the Committee which sat upon this subject when he said that it had been chiefly employed in considering the transactions of the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt; because that Committee had also made a full inquiry into the proceedings of the savings banks throughout the country, and their relations to the Commissioners, and had made a report thereupon. The assertion that this Bill would give great security to the savings banks might lead to misapprehension, by giving rise to the opinion that such security did not now exist, which, as far as the capital was concerned, would certainly be erroneous. The real question at issue was, what was to be done when the funds in the hands of the Commissioners were insufficient to pay the claims of the banks for interest? It was felt that, whilst that was the case, the Chancellor of the Exchequer would come down to the House and propose the reduction of the interest, so that, in point of fact, the loss on all the dealings with the funds that had taken place would in the end fall on the depositors. At present the capital funds belonging to depositors in the hands of the Government was deficient about £4,000,000. That deficiency had arisen from three causes. The first was, that at the outset the House of Commons authorized the Commissioners of the National Debt to pay the savings banks a very high rate of interest, higher, in fact, than the funds yielded immediately after the Act was passed. The ordinary rate of interest subsequently declined, and there had been every year an increasing deficit accumulating at compound interest. He estimated the loss from that source alone at £3,000,000. The second cause of the deficit arose from the practice of buying at a high rate when money was abundant and when the investments in savings banks were considerable, and of selling at a much lower rate when there was a disposition on the part of depositors suddenly to withdraw their deposits. The loss on that account had not been frequent, but had occurred only on two or three occasions. Its amount was not clearly ascertained, but it could not be less than £100,000. The third cause of the deficit was the mode in which successive Chancellors of the Exchequer had dealt with the funds belonging to savings banks for the purpose of sustaining the credit of the country. He did not blame them for the manner in which they had used those funds, but the objection was that all the profits and advantages went to the nation at large, while all the loss was placed to the debit of the special account of the savings banks with the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt. There was still another cause of the deficit. The Commissioners, in order to pay the very high rate of interest which Parliament had allowed to depositors, had purchased $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent stock to a large amount, for which they had paid 10 per cent more than they would have for 3 per cent Consols, but in course of time the $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent stock was reduced to 3 per cent, and now it bore the same value as Consols. They had gained in the rate of interest for a certain time, but in the end a deficiency of 10 per cent had been created on all the $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent stock so purchased. All these causes combined had occasioned a gap in the capital of about £4,000,000, and the result was that at the present moment the funds belonging to savings banks produced £100,000 a year less than the interest annually paid to depositors. No Chancellor of the Exchequer had ever frankly come to the House and said—This is a loss which we must incur every year, and which should be provided year by year; but it had been added to the National Debt. This was a most injurious state of affairs. Mr. Hume had brought this matter before the House, and the Minister had twice met him by proposing a reduction of the interest, and he had no doubt the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, with his persuasive eloquence, might induce Parliament to authorize a further reduction. But the right hon. Gentleman, instead of doing that, had drawn up the Bill now before the House. What was the object of that Bill? It dealt in a very circuitous mode with a simple subject. It proposed that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should sit before a great book, and open an account No. 1, in which the first entry was to be a liability of the nation to the extent of £31,000,000. He did not know whether No. 1 was to be followed by No. 2 and a series of accounts, but certainly this provision of the Bill shadowed out a system which ought to receive the careful consideration of the House. The object which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had in view was to save £300 a year, paid to the Bank of England per million of stock for doing nothing at all; but what was there to prevent the right hon. Gentleman, instead of erecting the cumbersome and ominous system indicated by the present Bill, making the simple intimation to the Bank that it should no longer receive £300 per annum for keeping the account of each million of the capital fund of £31,000,000, which stood in the name of the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, and with respect to which no transfer or transactions of any kind ever took place? But it was said that the Bill gave improved powers of investment. It seemed to him, however, that those powers were exceedingly small. They were confined to a small part of the balance of the fund after deducting £31,000,000, and would give so small an additional interest to the Commissioners that he doubted whether it was worth while embarrassing the account with the responsibilities of the varied investments suggested by the Bill. What the Committee proposed was that a very large proportion of the entire fund, instead of being invested at 3 per cent, should be invested in securities, which for all practical purposes were as good as Consols, at the rate of 4 per cent, thus making it possible that the interest of the whole investments might be sufficient to meet the annual charge of the savings banks. He hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would give this point his renewed consideration, enlarge the field of investment, and so practically carry out the intentions of the Committee. It was said that very much was to be effected by the Bill for the safety of the depositors, but he could not discover that it placed them in a better situation than before, for he ventured to insist that the country already was absolutely pledged to make good the whole of their funds. On the other hand, there were certain funds of individual savings banks—the gains and savings which constituted a guarantee to make good deficiencies by losses and frauds—which were put in considerable jeopardy by the Bill. Then there was the power still remaining in the hands of the Chancellor of the Exchequer of dealing with the funds. The Committee were of opinion that that power should not be left entirely with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but that some persons should be joined with him in order to guarantee that the funds were not hastily and inconsiderately dealt with. If this power were given to the Chancellor of the Exchequer it should be given on definite principles, so that he should use the funds for the benefit of the savings banks alone, and not for the benefit of the nation by sustaining in the market this or that security. It was evident that these several points did require looking into by the Government, and he hoped that when the Bill was next before them, some attempt would be made to elucidate the difficulties that he had felt it his duty briefly to notice.

Mr. Ayrton

Mr. HANKEY said, he was not aware that the Bill would have come on for discussion that night, but he should certainly not like to give a silent vote in approbation of a measure which appeared to him fraught with great mischief. It contained all the objectionable features of the former Bill, though there was a great deal of merit in some of the new provisions. The clauses, however, which gave to the Chancellor of the Exchequer power over a very large amount of stock, enabling him to increase the amount of funded debt by conversion of unfunded debt without applying to Parliament, were clauses which ought never to be inserted in a Bill of this kind. At the same time he approved that part of the measure which permitted the Chancellor of the Exchequer to cancel certain parts of the debt ; but it was a dangerous thing to give that functionary the power of propping up in the market one description of security by selling stock at one time and buying stock at another. At a future stage he should point out how, in his opinion, the objectionable features of the Bill could be removed.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read 2^o, and committed for Monday next.

PACKET SERVICE (TRANSFER OF CONTRACTS) BILL.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

MR. HOPE said, he should like to know what would be the effect of the passing of this Bill on the labours of the Select Committee upstairs ? If the Government were able to deal with the subject so much the better ; but if they were, he trusted that the labours of the Committee would not be unnecessarily prolonged by their being called upon to go into the part of the inquiry embraced by this Bill.

MR. LAING said, that the question involved in this Bill had been brought before the Committee on Packet Contracts, and their opinion was that as this proposal merely provided for the transfer of the contracts from one department to another, and did not involve the mode in which the contracts were entered into, the Government might take upon themselves to deal with it.

MR. HOPE said, that as a Member of the Committee he was in a position to state that what they had declared was that if the Government thought fit to take the subject into their hands the Committee would leave it with them.

Clause I.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, he was exceedingly glad the Government had decided upon taking the Packet Service contracts into their own hands, and out of the hands of the Board of Admiralty. He thought if the Government would make a regulation that no man should belong to the Packet Service vessels unless he belonged to the reserve it would be well for the service, and there would be no difficulty in the matter.

Clause agreed to ; as were the remaining Clauses.

House resumed.

Bill reported without amendment.

To be read 3^o To-morrow.

SETTLED ESTATES ACT (1856) AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. WHITESIDE moved the second reading of this Bill.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. BYNG said, he rose with reluctance to oppose the further progress of this Bill, and to move that it be read a second time that day six months. He wished to disclaim any personal hostility to the gentleman whose interests would chiefly be affected by it ; but he was compelled to object to the Bill because many of his constituents were of opinion that it would interfere greatly with their rights, as well as the formerly expressed opinion of the Legislature. The subject was not a new one, having been before Parliament for the last twenty years. The gentleman whose property would be affected by this Bill had made many vain attempts to obtain building power upon the property at Hampstead. In the year 1829 the first application was made and refused. Since that period Bills were introduced almost every Session having the same object in view, but Parliament uniformly rejected them. Moreover, in the Leases and Sales of Settled Estates Act passed in 1856 it was provided that no such power should be granted by the Court of Chancery in cases where previous applications to Parliament had been unsuccessful. The will under which the gentleman in question took his property gave him power to grant building leases at Charlton, but not at Hampstead. The inference was that the testator had good reasons for the expectation. The chief grounds on which he opposed the Bill was because he did not consider that a private Bill should override a public Act ; and though the right hon. Gentleman had done his best to render the Bill as harmless as possible on public grounds, he (Mr. Byng) felt bound to move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

Amendment proposed to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."

MR. WHITESIDE relied upon the justice of the case to induce the House to pass the Bill. The gentleman in question, Sir T. Wilson, unfortunately for himself, lived within the jurisdiction of the metropolitan Members. He had an estate at Hampstead, and it was said that he intended to build on the Heath; but he had no more intention to do so than he had to build in the moon. He had consented to the introduction of a clause prohibiting him from building on Hampstead Heath, but that did not appear to satisfy all parties. The Judges had reported four times in favour of Sir Thomas Wilson: the House of Lords passed a Bill on the subject in 1854; and when that Bill came before the Commons the metropolitan Members had influence enough to throw it out. Since that time the question had been brought before the Court of Chancery, and, Sir William Page Wood, though he was prevented from entertaining the application, said there was nothing to induce him to think that the testator had the slightest conception of precluding those who came after him from building on the property in question. Every man who voted against this Bill would vote simply for this proposition—that a gentleman should not be heard in a Court of justice; for all that Sir Thomas Wilson asked was to be at liberty to represent his case to the Court of Chancery. His (Mr. Whiteside's) argument was founded upon the justice of the case, and he ventured to think that no Gentleman who respected justice could vote with the hon. Member for Middlesex.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, he could only suppose that the right hon. Gentleman was engaged to conduct the Bill through the House because no English Member would undertake it. He (Mr. James) dared to say that if a similar Bill, affecting a suburb of Dublin, were entrusted to an English Member, no man would be more eloquent against it than the right hon. Member for Dublin University. Besides, a similar Bill had been rejected by Parliament seven or eight times after the Judges to whom it was referred had reported against it. Although the Bill pretended to exclude Hampstead Heath it included the adjoining property, and the result would be, if the Bill passed, that Sir Thomas Wilson would be at liberty to build a wall entirely round the Heath. The object of the testator was, beyond all question, that the property should not be built upon at all; and an attempt was now made to hoodwink the House by introducing, in the guise of a public Bill, a measure which Parliament had over and over again rejected as a private Bill.

MR. ALCOCK said, he should vote against the Bill. This was the eleventh time Sir Thomas Wilson had attempted the same thing, although he had no more right to enclose Hampstead Heath than he had to enclose the moon. The fact was that the father of Sir Thomas Wilson was charmed with the Heath, and left it in his will that no son of his should build over it.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, he trusted that hon. Members unconnected with the metropolitan representation would give this matter a fair consideration. The object of the Bill was practically to modify a clause in a general Act of Parliament which prevented Sir Thomas Wilson doing that which every other subject, under kindred circumstances, was enabled to do by that Act,—namely, to apply to the Court of Chancery to ascertain whether, according to the intention of the testator, he, Sir Thomas Wilson, was, or was not, empowered to grant valid leases of the land in question. It would be an act of gross injustice to this gentleman to throw out this Bill merely because the property it referred to adjoined one of the most beautiful spots in the neighbourhood of the metropolis.

LORD FERMOY said, there was but one inference to be drawn from the will as to the intention of the late Sir Thomas Wilson. He had left three estates to his son. As to two of them he had given ample leasing powers; but as to the third, that in contiguity with Hampstead Heath, he had debarred his son from those rights. It was clear, therefore, that that prohibition was intended to be permanent for the purpose of protecting one of the most beautiful spots near London. Credit was taken in some quarters for not taking in the Heath; but it belonged to the copyholders, and who would dare to interfere with their rights? They could not, however, build round the Heath without doing so in some measure; for it would be necessary to make roads, and to cart materials for the purposes of the buildings. It was desired by this Bill to obtain the prohibited right by a sidewind, and destroy the right the public clearly had to the uninterrupted enjoyment of Hampstead Heath.

MR. GEORGE said, he should support the measure, as Hampstead Heath was specially excluded from its operation. If leasing powers were to be granted to any owner of a settled estate he saw no reason why that power should be excluded with respect to Sir Thomas Wilson.

MR. HANBURY opposed the Bill. The fresh air and brown heath of Hampstead were necessary to the health and recreation of a large portion of his constituents, and they were not prepared to yield an inch of it for the benefit of Sir Thomas Wilson. Every one, therefore, who voted in favour of a measure that rendered its enclosure possible voted for an infraction of a poor man's right.

Question put, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

The House divided :—Ayes 43 ; Noes 86 : Majority 43.

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Bill put off for six months.

House adjourned at half-past
Eleven o'clock.

INDEX

TO

HANSARD'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES.

VOLUME CLVI.

FIRST VOLUME OF SESSION 1860.

EXPLANATION OF THE ABBREVIATIONS.

1R. 2R. 3R. First, Second, or Third Reading.—Amend., Amendment.—Res., Resolution.—Com., Committee.—Re-Com., Re-committal.—Rep., Report.—Adj., Adjourned.—cl., Clause.—add. cl., Additional Clause.—neg., Negatived.—L., Lords.—c., Commons.—m. q., Main Question.—o. q., Original Question.—o. m., Original Motion.—p. q., Previous Question.—r. p., Report Progress.—A., Ayes.—N., Noes.—M., Majority.—1st Div., 2nd Div., First or Second Division.

When in the Text or in the Index a Speech is marked thus *, it indicates that the Speech is reprinted from a Pamphlet or some authorised Report.

When in the Index a † is prefixed to a Name or an Office (the Member having accepted or vacated office during the Session) and to Subjects of Debate thereunder, it indicates that the Speeches on those Subjects were delivered in the speaker's private or official character, as the case may be.

When in this Index a * is added to the Reading of a Bill, it indicates that no Debate took place upon that stage of the measure.

A BINGER, Lord
Endowed Schools, Com. cl. 7, 1225

Accessories and Abettors Bill
l. 1R. 253; 2R.* 1560

Accidents in the Streets,
l. Return moved for (Marquess of Westmeath), 2046

"Accrington," The Ship,
c. Question (Mr. Ald. Salomons), 718

ADAM, Mr. W. P., Clackmannanshire, &c.
Persian Army, Batta to the, 1469

ADDERLEY, Rt. Hon. C. B., Staffordshire, W.
Colonies—Troops in the, 2220

Address in Answer to the Speech,
l. (Earl Fitzwilliam), 7; Amend. (Earl Grey), 27; Amend, neg. 73; Her Majesty's Answer, 155
c. (Mr. St. Aubyn), 75; Report, 118; Her Majesty's Answer, 162

Adjournment of the House,
c. Motion (Viscount Palmerston), 811

Admiralty, The
c. Question (Mr. Kinnaid), 613

Admiralty Court Jurisdiction Bill,
c. 1R.* 1698

Adulteration of Food or Drink Bill,
c. 1R.* 327;
2R. 1094;
Com. 2025;
cl. 1, 2032; Amend. (Mr. Peacocke), 2035;
Amend. withdrawn, 2037; Amend. (Mr. Scholfield), 2038; Amend. (Mr. John Locke), 2039;
cl. 2, postponed, 2040; [o. q. A. 116, N. 25, M. 91], 2040;
cl. 3, 2040, [A. 58, N. 34, M. 24] 2042

ADVOCATE, The Lord, (Rt. Hon. J. Moncreiff), Edinburgh
Annuity Tax Abolition (Edinburgh), Leave 272, 282
Education (Scotland), 561
Heritable Bonds (Scotland), 2226
Medical Acts Amendment, 2R. 1906
Prisons (Scotland) Act Continuance, 2R. 263, 1702
Representation of the People (Scotland), Leave, 2085, 2094
Valuation (Scotland), 2224

Agates, &c.—Customs Acts,
c. Res. 4, 1901

AGNEW, Sir A., Wigtonshire

Bible in Spain—Martin Escalante, 330
Roman Catholic Charities, 2224

AIRLIE, Earl of

France, Commercial Treaty with, Correspondence moved for, 1106, 1130

ALCOCK, Mr. T., Surrey, E.

Financial Statement—The Budget, Res. 880
Settled Estates Act Amendment, 2R. 2288

American Ships, Outrages in

c. Question (Mr. M. Milnes), 229 ;—Coasting Trade, Question (Mr. Liddell), 1131

Ammunition—Customs Acts,

c. Res. 0, 2264

Anchors, &c. (Merchant Service)

c. Com. moved for (Sir J. Elphinstone), 497

ANGERSTEIN, Mr. W., Greenwich

Corrupt Practices Act Amendment, Com. moved for, 1093

ANNESLEY, Hon. Capt. H., Cavan Co.

Belts and Buckles of Soldiers, 1265

Annuity Tax Abolition (Edinburgh) Bill,

c. Leave, 272 ; 1R.* 392

Appeal in Criminal Cases Bill,

c. Leave, 118 ; 1R.* ib. ;
2R. 392 ; Amend. (Sir G. Lewis), 425

Apples, Raw—Customs Acts,

c. Res. 8, 1984

ARCHDALL, Capt. M. E., Fermanagh Co.

Cavalry Field Officers, 2219

ARGYLL, Duke of (Lord Privy Seal),

France, Commercial Treaty with, Correspondence moved for, 1121, 1123, 1348

India—Distribution of Prize Money, 205, 1319 ;
—Honours to Native Princes, 2142

Armstrong and Whitworth Cannon,

c. Question (Mr. H. Baillie), 2221

Army,

Belts and Buckles of Soldiers, c. Question (Mr. Griffith), 1263

Billeting—Wine and Beer Licences, c. Question (Mr. Wyld), 1569

Cavalry Commissions, c. Question (Sir H. Stracey), 1570

Cavalry Field Officers, c. Question (Capt. Archdall), 2219

Estimates, c. Question (Sir H. Willoughby), 687 ; Res. 880, 1275 ; Report, 1448

Flogging, c. Returns moved for (Mr. W. Williams), 1161 ; Amend. (Lord C. Paget, [o. q. A. 46, N. 124, M. 78] 1191

Guards, Head Quarters for the, c. Question, (Mr. H. Baring), 157

Army—cont.

Major Generals, Allowance to, c. Question (Sir H. Stracey), 806

Oaths taken by Recruits, c. Question (Lord W. Graham), 329

Queen's Officers and Company Officers, c. Question (Mr. Coningham), 1709

See China—Land Transport Corps—Militia—Rifle Corps

ASHLEY, Lord, Cricklade

Portsmouth, Defences of, 2219

ASTELL, Mr. J. H., Ashburton

Customs and Excise Departments, Messengers in the, 1565

ATHERTON, Sir W., see SOLICITOR GENERAL, The

ATTORNEY GENERAL, The (Sir R. Bethell), Wolverhampton

Customs Acts, Com. 1395 ; Res. 3 (Agates, &c.), 1975, 1976, 1979, 1980, 1981, 1983

East India Stock, Investments in, 262

Norwich Election, 1471

Roman Catholic Charities, 2R. 1317

Statutes, Consolidation of the, 1238

Attorneys and Solicitors Bill,

c. 1R.* 327 ;

2R. 686 ;

Com. cl. 5, 1551 ;

add. cl. (Mr. Mowbray), 1552 ; 3R.* 1698

l. 1R.* 1822

Attorneys, Solicitors, &c., (No. 2) Bill

l. 1R. 2044

Australian Mails,

c. Question (Lord A. Churchill), 220—Postage on Newspapers, Question (Lord A. Churchill), 723

Austro-Russian Treaty,

c. Question (Mr. Steuart), 2049

AYRTON, Mr. S. A., Tower Hamlets

Adulteration of Food, &c., Com. 2031 ; cl. 1, 2035, 2039 ; cl. 3, 2041, 2042

Budget, The, Res. 1537

Customs Acts, Com. 1407 ; Res. 3, (Agates, &c.), 1975, 1979, 1980 ; (Corks), 1999 ; (Feathers), 2106 ; (Silks), 2111, 2122, 2132 ; (Goods Manufactured) Adj. moved, 2133 ; Res. 10 (Gold Plate), 2266 ; Res. 12. (Teak Wood), Amend. 2267

France, Commercial Treaty with, 960, 1251, 1719, 2214

London Corporation, Leave, 283

Newspapers, Com. 548

Probate and Administration (India), Leave, 239

Representation of the People, Leave, 2067

Savings Banks, &c., Res. 198 ; 2R. 2271, 2281

[cont.]

BAILLIE, Mr. H. J., Inverness-shire
 Armstrong and Whitworth Cannon, 2221
 Customs Acts—Res. 1 (Duties on Foreign Wines), 1857, 1880
 India—Finances of, Com. moved for, 752
 Offices, Public, 2147
 Probate and Administration (India), Leave, 238
 Representation of the People (Scotland), Leave, 2094

BAINES, Mr. E., Leeds
 Budget, The, Res. 1586
 Trinity and St. John's Colleges, Cambridge, Address moved, 1059

Balfe, Mr., Case of
 c. Papers moved for (Colonel Dunne), 1094

BALL, Mr. E., Cambridgeshire
 Customs Acts—Res. 1 (Duties on Foreign Wines), 1874; Res. 3 (Cotton Manufactures), Adj. moved, 2004, 2005; (Silks) Adj. moved, 2130, 2131
 Financial Statement—The Budget, Res. 882
 France, Commercial Treaty with, 1472

BARING, Rt. Hon. Sir F. T., Portsmouth
 Budget, The, Res. 1609
 Customs Acts, Res. 3 (Corks), 1989, 2001
 Franklin's, Sir J., Expedition, 2147
 Packets and Telegraphic Contracts, Com. moved for, 302, 308
 Savings Banks, Res. 201

BARING, Mr. H. B., Marlborough
 Guards, Head Quarters for the, 157

BARING, Mr. T., Huntingdon
 Budget, The, Res. 887, 1743
 Customs Acts—Res. 1 (Duties on Foreign Wines), 1895; Res. 4 (Agates, &c.), 1903

BARING, Mr. T. G. (Under Secretary for India), Penryn, &c.
 India—Finances of, Com. moved for, 765
 Madras Irrigation and Canal Company, 1038

BARROW, Mr. W. H., Nottingham, S.
 Customs Acts, Report (Silks), 2198
 Savings Banks, Res. 202

BASS, Mr. M. T., Derby
 Customs Acts—Res. 1 (Duties on Foreign Wines), 1876, 1898, 1899; Report (Silks), 2198
 Financial Statement—The Budget, Res. 889

BATH, Marquess of
 Endowed Schools, Postponement of 2R. 504

BAXTER, Mr. W. E., Montrose, &c.
 Financial Statement, 559;—The Budget, Res. 879, 1506
 Miscellaneous Civil Service Expenditure, Com. moved for, 467
 Reform Bill (Scotland), 507
 Representation of the People (Scotland), Leave, 2086

BEACH, Mr. W. W. B., Hampshire, N.
 Budget, The, Res. 1606

BEACROFT, Mr. G. S., Leeds
 Warehousing Places (Manchester, &c.), Leave, 392

BENTINCK, Mr. G. W. P., Norfolk, W.
 Address in Answer to the Speech, Report, 149
 Customs Acts—Res. 1 (Duties on Foreign Wines), 1861, 1887; Res. 4 (Agates, &c.), 1902; (Apples, raw), 1984; (Corks), 1991; Report (Corks), 2185, 2186
 Financial Statement—The Budget, Res. 878, 885, 887, 1496
 France, Commercial Treaty with, 1230; Notice of Motion, 2260
 Gloucester City and Wakefield Election, Leave, 782
 Merchant Shipping, Com. moved for, 359
 Navy Estimates, 963, 999
 Navy, Manning the, Res. 1156
 Railway Accidents, 220
 Savings Banks, &c., 2R. 2272
 Serpentine, The, Nomination of Com. 2097
 Wines, French and Spanish, Duties on, 1838

BERKELEY, Hon. F. H. F., Bristol
 Army Estimates, 1313, 1314
 Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, 1572
 Serpentine, The, Nomination of Com. 2098
 Window Cleaning, 2R. 1550

Berkeley House,
 c. Question (Mr. E. James), 2226

BERNERS, Lord
 Delhi Prize Money, Papers moved for, 1318, 1320

Berwick upon Tweed Election,
 l. Petition (Lord Teynham), 687

BETHELL, Sir R. see ATTORNEY GENERAL, The, Beverley Election,

 c. Prosecution moved (Mr. Cobbett), 483; Amend. (Mr. W. D. Seymour), 489; Amend. withdrawn, 495

Bible in Spain—Martin Escalante,
 c. Question (Sir A. Agnew), 330

Bibles, Patent for Printing
 c. Question (Mr. Black), 610

BLACK, Mr. A., Edinburgh
 Annuity Tax Abolition (Edinburgh), Leave, 279
 Bibles, Patent for Printing, 610
 Education (Scotland), 538
 Masters and Operatives, 2R. 2022
 Representation of the People (Ireland), Leave, 2080

BLACKBURN, Mr. P., Stirlingshire
 Annuity Tax Abolition (Edinburgh), Leave, 281
 Budget, The, Res. 1594

BLACKBURN, Mr. P.—cont.

Customs Acts, Res. 3 (Agates, &c.), 1981, 1982, 1983, 1984

France, Commercial Treaty with, 2214

Representation of the People (Scotland), Leave, 2090

Valuation of Rateable Property (Ireland), Com. Amend., 1541, 1542

BLAKE, Mr. J. A., Waterford City

Customs Acts, Report (Corks), 2185

Bleaching and Dyeing Works, Labour in

I. Observations (Lord Brougham), 1822

Bleaching and Dyeing Works Bill,

c. Leave, 627; 1R. 631

BONHAM-CARTER, Mr. J., Winchester

Gloucester City and Wakefield Elections, Leave, 784

BOUVERIE, Hon. E. P., Kilmarnock, &c.

Attorneys and Solicitors, Com. add. cl., 1552

Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, 1572

Customs Acts, Res. 3 (Corks), 1903

Election Petitions Act Amendment, 211. 1557; Com. moved for, 1558

France, Commercial Treaty with, 1254

Friday Adjournments, Res. 163, 178, 543

Hennessey, Mr. J. P., and the Committee of 1981

—Amendments in Com. &c., 1475

Amendment, 2R. 2286

Wiltford

ors, 2R. 686

1 Law Courts, 232

Leave, 160; 2R. 545, 546

Wiltford

1 Law Courts, 238

nts of, 1565

rities, 2224

f, Papers moved for, 1961

Bill,

105

Birmingham

110, 1542, 1733

1412, 1447; Res. 1 (Duties, 1868; Res. 3 (Silks), 2110; agings), 2204

Water, 2R. 2049

Treaty with, Notice of Mo-

, Res. 182, 187

3

Service Expenditure, Com.

1 People, Leave, 2064, 2072,

f, 2168

. 182, 187

BRISCOE, Mr. J. I., Surrey, W.

Trinity and St. John's Colleges, Cambridge, Address moved, 1060

BRISTOW, Mr. A. R., Kidderminster

Church Rates Abolition, 2R. 671

Flogging (Army and Navy), Returns moved for, 1166

British Museum,

c. Question (Mr. Joseph Locke), 2154; Observation (Mr. Gregory), 2158; Question (Mr. Danby Seymour), 2177

BROCKLEHURST, Mr. J., Macclesfield

Customs Acts, Report (Silks), 2196

Bronze Coinage, The New

c. Question (Mr. W. Ewart), 1352

BROUGHAM, Lord

Address in answer to the Speech, 39

Bleaching and Dyeing Works, Labour in, 1822

Common Law Commission, Report, 1205

Cotton and Slavery, Returns moved for, 206

County Courts, Return moved for, 551

Endowed Schools, Com. cl. 2, 1215; cl. 7, 1224

Indictable Offences (Metropolitan District), 2R. 900

Italy, State of, 154

Plea of "Not Guilty," Explanation, 1967

Plea on Indictments, 1R. 1449, 1450

Prayer Book, Alterations in the, Papers moved for, 1105

Property, Law of, Com. 444

St. Georges'-in-the-East, 571, 802, 913

Savoy, Annexation of, Address moved, 597, 600, 1207

Transfer of Real Estate, Petition 325; 1R. 326; Explanation, 443

BROWNE, Lord J. T., Mayo Co.

Conveyance of Voters, Leave, 797

Holyhead, Steamboat accommodation at, 725

Navy Lieutenants, 917

BRUCE, Major C. L. Cumming, Elgin and Nairnshire

China—Lord Elgin and Sir M. Seymour, 1714

BUCHANAN, Mr. W., Glasgow

Address in Answer to the Speech, Report, 148

Representation of the People (Scotland), Leave, 2092

Budget, The—Financial Statement,

c. Res. (Chancellor of the Exchequer), 812;

Res. (Mr. Du Cane), 1475; Adj. Debate, 1573, 1726, [A. 223, N. 339, M. 116] 1818;

—see Customs Acts

BURGHLEY, Lord, Northamptonshire, N.

Army Estimates, 891, 892

China—War of 1857, 1469

Spanish Debt, The, 1035

BURRELL, Sir C. M., New Shoreham

Public House Licences, 1841

Window Cleaning, Com. 1548, 1550

Business of the House,
c. Question (Mr. Disraeli), 1704

BUTLER, Mr. C. S., Tower Hamlets
St. George's-in-the-East, 263, 807; Correspondence moved for, 1102

Butter—Customs Acts,
c. Res. 9, 2265

BUXTON, Mr. C., Maidstone
Flogging (Army and Navy), Returns moved for, 1171

BYNG, Hon. G. H. C., Middlesex
Budget, The, Res. 1602
France, Commercial Treaty with, Notice of Motion, 2214, 2232, 2233
Representation of the People, Leave, 2065
St. George's-in-the-East, 559
Settled Estates Act Amendment, 2R.; Amend. 2286

CAIRD, Mr. J., Stirling, &c.
Education (Scotland), 861
Prisons (Scotland) Act Continuance, 2R. 563
Representation of the People, Leave, 2066
Representation of the People (Scotland), Leave, 2089

CAIRNS, Sir H. M., Belfast
Coals, Export of, 1271, 1274
Customs Acts, Com. 1890, 1897; Res. 3 (Corks), 1992, 1996, 2000
Education (Ireland), 505
Endowed Schools (No. 2), Leave, 686

CAMPBELL, Lord, see CHANCELLOR, THE LORD

CANTERBURY, Archbishop of Endowed Schools, Com. cl. 2, Amend. 1210
Glebe Houses, Dilapidations in, 324
Theatres, Divine Service in, Res. 804, 1668

Cape of Good Hope, Governor of the
c. Question (Mr. A. Mills), 562

Carbines, Breech-loading
c. Question (Mr. Damer), 2224

CARDIGAN, Earl of
Italy, Central, Papers moved for, 1028

CARDWELL, Rt. Hon. E. (Chief Secretary for Ireland), Oxford City
Address in Answer to the Speech, Report, 127
Agricultural Distress (Ireland), 1351
Balfe, Mr., Case of, Papers moved for, 1096
Births, &c., Registration of, (Ireland), 1471
Budget, The, Res. 1658, 1659
Charitable Bequests (Ireland), 2224
Customs Acts, Res. 8, (Cotton Manufactures), 2005
Dublin Corporation Water, 2R. 2040
Ecclesiastical Commission, Irish, 562
Education (Ireland), 327, 506, 1704

CARDWELL, Rt. Hon. E.—cont.

Fairs and Markets (Ireland), 262
Foundling Children (Ireland), 1244
Holyhead, Steamboat Accommodation at, 725
Lunatic Poor (Ireland), 1038
Maynooth Grant, Com. moved for, 1051
Medical Acts Amendment, 2R. 1908
Medical Relief Expenditure (Ireland), 535
Murder, Attempted, (Ireland), 219
Perrin, Mr. Justice, Retirement of, 917
Representation of the People (Ireland), Leave, 2073, 2083
Volunteer Corps (Ireland), 811

CARNARVON, Earl of Endowed Schools, Postponement of, 2R. 501, 502; 2R. 705
Glebe Houses, Dilapidations in, 324
India, Emigration from—The French Colonies, 1927
Red River Settlement, 902
Spain and Morocco, 1660
Tasmania—The Legislative Council, 1451

CARNEGIE, Hon. Capt. C., Forfarshire
Representation of the People (Scotland), Leave, 2090

CAVE, Mr. S., New Shoreham
Adulteration of Food, &c., Com. 2029
Corrupt Practices Act Amendment, Com. moved for, 1093
France—Emigration Scheme, 536
Merchant Shipping, Com. moved for, 371
Public Improvements, Com. 1546

CAYLEY, Mr. E. S., Yorkshire, N. Riding
Customs Acts—Res. 1 (Duties on Foreign Wines), 1867

CECIL, Lord R. T. G., Stamford
Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Court, Leave, 622
Gloucester City Writ, Res. 187
Oxford University, Leave, 322
Representation of the People, Leave, 2068
Representation of the People (Ireland), Leave, 2080
Savings Banks, &c., 2R. 2272
Wakefield Writ, Res. 187

CHANCELLOR, The LORD (The Right Hon. Lord Campbell),
Accidents in the Streets, Return moved for, 2047
Attorneys, Solicitors, &c., (No. 2), 1R. 2045
Berwick-upon-Tweed Election, 688
Chancery, Court of, 1R. 155
Common Law Commission, Report, 1205
Companies (1860), 2R. 1461; 3R. 2218
Consolidation of Statute and Criminal Law, 1R. 253, 564, 565
Divine Service, Performance of, 1697
Endowed Schools, Postponement of, 2R. 504; 2R. 704, 714; Com. cl. 2, 1214, 1218
Glebe Houses, Dilapidations in, 324
Indictable Offences (Metropolitan District), 2R. 898; Com. cl. 2, 1562
Law and Equity, 1R. 1440
Marriage Law, 1824

[cont.]

[cont.]

CHANCELLOR, The Lord—cont.

Offences against the Person, 2R. 1559, 1560
 Plea on Indictments, 1R. 1450
 Poison, Administering of, 2R. 2218
 Prayer Book, Alterations in the, Papers moved for, 916, 1104
 Property, Law of, Com. 444
 Theatres, Divine Service in, Res. 804, 1694
 Transfer of Real Estates, 1R. 326

CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, (Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone), Oxford University

Address in Answer to the Speech, Report, 138
 Billenting—Wine and Beer Licences, 1569
 British Museum, 2180
 Bronze Coinage, The New, 1352
 Customs Acts, Com. 1375, 1377; Res. 1 (Duties on Foreign Wines), 1842, 1860, 1861, 1870, 1885, 1886, 1888, 1890, 1892, 1893, 1894, 1895, 1896, 1898 1900; Res. 4, (Agates, &c.), 1901, 1902, 1903; Rep. 1971; Res. 3, 1971, 1973, 1977, 1980, 1982, 1983, 1984; (China, &c.) 1985; (Corks) 1988, 1993, 1995, 1997, 1999, 2000; Amend. 2002, 2003; (Cotton Manufactures) 2004, 2005, 2099; (Embroidery) 2102, 2105; (Feathers) 2106; (Gutta Percha) 2107; (Silks) 2126, 2131; (Goods Manufactured) 2133; Report (Corks), Amend. 2185, 2188; (Silks) 2190; Res. 6 (Corks, Hats and Gloves), 2203; Res. 7 (Paper Hangings), 2204, 2205, 2206; Res. 8 (Spirit Duties), 2207, 2209, 2211, 2212; Report, 2227, 2228; Res. 11 (Wood, &c.), 2267; Res. 12 (Teak Wood), 2268
 Customs and Excise Departments, Messengers in the, 1565
 Customs' Establishments, 2180
 Financial Statement—The Budget, Res. 812, 832, 879, 1530, 1531, 1779, 1800, 1801
 France, Commercial Treaty with, 268, 269, 1543; Notice of Motion, 2236
 Harbours of Refuge Commission, 806
 Income Tax, Com. moved for, 482, 1572
 Malt for Cattle feeding, 1701
 Miscellaneous Civil Service Expenditure, Com. moved for, 469
 Packet and Telegraphic Contracts, Com. moved for, 290, 318
 Paper, Drawback on, 1701
 Postal Rates, 1933
 Public House Licences, 1840, 1841
 Rules of Procedure—Amendments in Committees of Supply, &c., 1475
 Savings Banks, &c., Res. 190, 192, 203; 2R. 2270, 2272
 Silks, Duties on, 1567
 Supply, Report, 271, 272
 Taxes, Collection of, 1932
 Ways and Means, Com. Res. 2008; Res. (Spirit Duties), 2268
 Wine and Beer Licences, 1353, 1839, 2146
 Wine and Spirit Duties, 1705, 1706
 Wines, British, Drawback on, 1571
 Wines, Foreign, Drawback on, 1566, 1567; Bonding of, 1568

Chancery, Court of, Bill,

l. 1R. 155; 2R.* 551; 3R.* 1907

Charitable Uses Bill,

c. Leave, 631; 1R.* ib.; 2R.* 1060; 3R. 1565
 l. 1R.* 1060

CHELMSFORD, Lord

Attorneys, Solicitors, &c. (No. 2) 1R. 2044
 Endowed Schools, Postponement of, 2R. 503
 2R. 695, 698; Com. cl. 2, 1217, 1221; cl. 7, 1222, 1223; Rep. Amend. 1564
 Indictable Offences (Metropolitan District), 2R. 892, 901; Com. cl. 2, 1560

CHILDERS, Mr. H. C. E., Pontefract

*Gloucester City and Wakefield Elections, Leave, 787

China,

Armstrong Guns sent to, c. Question (Capt. L. Vernon), 2222
Bruce, Mr., Instructions to, l. Observations (Earl of Derby), 1205 Demands of the Allies upon, c. Question (Mr. S. FitzGerald), 717
Elgin's, Lord, Mission to, l. Papers moved for, (Earl of Selkirk), 1461
c. Question (Mr. B. Osborne), 1136; Explanation (Sir M. Seymour), 1708; Observations (Major Cumming Bruce), 1714
Expedition to, c. Question (Sir H. Willoughby), 1266; (Gen. Peel), 1707
Hong Kong—Mr. C. Anstey, c. Question (Mr. E. James), 445
Relations with, c. Observations (Mr. B. Cochrane), 919; Question (Sir J. Pakington), 1840; (Sir De L. Evans), 2226
Troops for, c. Return moved for (Mr. S. FitzGerald), 716; Motion neg. 717; Arms for, Question (Mr. O'Brien), 723
War of 1857, c. Question (Lord Burghley), 1469

China, Porcelain, &c.—Customs Acts,

c. Res. 3, 1985

Church of England Services,

c. Question (Mr. Danby Seymour), 156

Church Rates,

l. Petition (Viscount Dungannon) 258; Com. Moved for (Duke of Marlborough), 259
 c. Returns moved for (Mr. Packer), 116

Church Rates Abolition Bill,

c. Leave, 118; 1R.* ib.;
 2R. 634; Amend. (Lord Montagu), 660, [o. q. A. 263, N. 234, M. 29] 682

Church Rates Law Amendment Bill,

c. Leave, 495; 1R.* 497

CHURCHILL, Lord A. S., Woodstock

Australian Mails, 220
 Customs Acts—Res. 1 (Duties on Foreign Wines), 1897
 Newspapers for Australia, Postage on, 723

Civil Service Appointments,

c. Com. Moved for (Mr. Hennessy), 1193

CLANRICARDE, Marquess of

Criminal Outrages (Ireland), Returns moved for, 1909, 1919
 Italy, Central, Papers moved for, 1023, 1035
 Savoy, Annexation of—Papers moved for, 1023

Clapton, Cemetery at
c. Question (Sir De L. Evans), 1838

CLAY, Mr. J., Kingston-upon-Hull
Bribery Prevention, Leave, 737
Civil Service Appointments, Com. moved for, 1201
Customs Acts, Res. 3. (Corks), 1998; Report, 2193
Gloucester City Writ, Res. 185
Merchant Shipping, Com. moved for, 363
Wakefield Writ, Res. 185

CLIFFORD, Mr. C. C., Isle of Wight
Japan, Trade with, 1352

CLIVE, Mr. G. (Under-Secretary of the Home Department), Hereford
Adulteration of Food, &c., Com. 2032, cl. 1, 2033, 2038; cl. 3, 2041
Free Church, Attempted Exclusion in a, 811
Police, Superintendents of, 1566
Public Houses and Beer Houses, 810
St. George's-in-the-East, 808, 810
Small Pox in London, 1241

Coal, Export of
c. Question (Col. P. Herbert), 1267; (Mr. Horsman), 1725, 1841;—see Customs Acts

COBBETT, Mr. J. M., Oldham
Beverley Election, Prosecution moved, 483
Coroners' Fees, 561

COCHRANE, Mr. A. D. Baillie, Honiton
China, Relations with, 919
France, Commercial Treaty with, Notice of Motion, 2261
Savoy, Annexation of, Papers moved for, 1965; Papers by Command, 2143

COGAN, Mr. W. H. F., Kildare Co.
Representation of the People (Ireland), Leave, 2077

Coinage Offences Bill,
l. 1R. 253; 2R.* 1560

COLCHESTER, Lord
China—Lord Elgin's Mission, 1468

COLEBROOKE, Sir T. E., Lanarkshire
Masters and Operatives, 2R. 2022
Representation of the People (Scotland), Leave, 2091

COLLIER, Mr. R. P., Plymouth
Beverley Election, Prosecution moved, 402
Conveyance of Voters, Leave, 796, 797
Corrupt Practices Prevention Act Amendment, 2R. 1081, 1087
Election Petitions Act Amendment, 2R. 1556
France, Commercial Treaty with, Notice of Motion, 2262
Statutes, Consolidation of the, 1238

COLLINS, Mr. T., Knarborough
Civil Service Appointments, Com. moved for, 1202
Conveyance of Voters, Leave, 796
Ecclesiastical Vestments, Leave, 2043
Gloucester City Writ, Res. 188
Marriage with the Brother of a deceased Husband, 1723, 2221
New Writs, Res. 179
Wakefield Writ, Res. 188

Colonial Chaplains, Salaries of
c. Question (Sir J. Pakington), 1702

Colonies, Troops in the
c. Question (Mr. Adderley), 2220

Common Law Commission,
l. Report, 1205

Companies (1860) Bill,
l. 1R.* 551;
2R. 1461; 3R. 2218

CONINGHAM, Mr. W., Brighton
Customs Acts, Res. 3 (Corks), 2002
France, Commercial Treaty with, Notice of Motion, 2250
Franklin's, Sir J., Expedition, 2153
Queen's Officers and Company's Officers, 1709
Representation of the People, Leave, 2073

Consolidated Fund (£407,649) Bill,
c. 1R.* 1131; 2R.* 1226; 3R.* 1469
l. 1R.* 1558

Conveyance of Voters Bill,
c. Leave, 796; 1R.* 916

COPPLAND, Mr. Ald. W. T., Stoke-upon-Trent
Customs Acts, Res. 3 (China, &c.), 1986

CORK, Earl of
Yeomanry, The, 2136

Corks—Customs Acts,
c. Res. 3, 1986; Amend. (Mr. T. Duncombe), 1988, 1992, [A. 118, N. 101, M. 73] 2002; Amend. (Chancellor of the Exchequer), ib.; 2nd Amend. 2185; Res. 5; Res. 6, 2203

Cornwall, Duchy of (Limitation of Actions) Bill,
c. Leave, 549; 1R.* 550; 2R.* 2143

Coroners' Bill,
c. 1R.* 1350

Coroners' (No. 2) Bill,
c. 1R.* 1837

Coroners' Fees,
c. Question (Mr. Cobbett), 561

Corrupt Practices Prevention Act.

c. Com. moved for (Mr. E. James), 1089, 1572

Corrupt Practices Prevention Act (1854) Amendment Bill.

c. Leave, 878; 1R.* 890;

2R. 1069; Motion withdrawn, 1089

Cotton and Slavery.

1. Returns moved for (Lord Brougham), 206

Cotton Manufactures—Customs Acts.

c. Res. 3, 2003, 2099

County Courts.

1. Returns moved for (Lord Brougham), 551

County Prisons (Ireland) Bill.

c. 1R.* 1698

COWPER, Rt. Hon. W. F. (Chief Commissioner of Works), Hertford

Berkeley House, 2226

Medical Acts Amendment, 2R. 1907

Nelson Monument, The, 1837

Richard Cœur de Lion, Statue of, 1837

Serpentine, The, Nomination of Com, 2095,

minial Law,

f, 2R. 502,
715; Com.
226; Rep.

istrict), 2R.

c. irit Duties),

nd. 1906

nd), Leave,

on Foreign
3 (Agates,
16; (Silks),
08
Res. 883

3

1242

, 355

lia), Leave,

4

CHOOK, Mr. J., Bolton

Bleaching and Dyeing Works, Leave, 699

CROSS, Mr. R. A., Preston

Bribery Prevention, Leave, 734

Public Improvements, Com. 1547

CROSSLEY, Mr. F., Yorkshire, W. Riding

Customs Acts—Res. 1, (Duties on Foreign Wines), 1864; Res. 8 (Corks), 1908; Report (Silks), 2200

Financial Statement—The Budget, Res. 883, 1517

Gloucester City and Wakefield Elections, Leave, 779

Masters and Operatives, 2R. 2026

Public Houses and Beer Houses, 810

CUBITT, Mr. Ald. W., Andover

London Corporation, Leave, 267

Customs Acts.

c. Notice of Amendment (Mr. Du Cane), 1226; Notice withdrawn, 1355; Amend. (Mr. Disraeli), 1374, [c. q. A. 293, N. 230, M. 68] 1443;

Res. 1 (Duties on Foreign Wines), 1842; Amend. (Mr. M. Milnes), 1867; Amend. withdrawn, 1882; 2nd. Amend. ib. [A. 72, N. 182, M. 111] 1888;

Res. 4, (Agates, &c.), 1901; Rep. 1970;

Res. 3, 1971; (Apples, raw), 1984; (China, &c.), 1985; (Corks), 1986; Amend. (Mr. T. Duncombe), 1988, 1992, [A. 118, N. 191, M. 73], 2002; Amend. (Chancellor of the Exchequer), ib.; (Cotton Manufactures), 2003, 2099; (Embroidery, &c.), 2100; (Feathers, &c.), 2105; (Gutta Percha), 2106; (Linen, &c.), 2107; (Silks, &c.), 2108; Amend. (Sir J. Paxton), 2111; Adj. moved, (Mr. Ball), 2130, [A. 28, N. 233, M. 205] 2131; [A. 68, N. 190, M. 122] 2132; (Goods Manufactured), 2132; Report, 2180; (Corks), Amend. (Chancellor of the Exchequer), 2185; (Silks), Amend. (Mr. Newdegate), 2194, [A. 51, N. 179, M. 128], 2203;

Res. 4; (Goods Manufactured), 2203;

Res. 5; (Cork Duties), 2203;

Res. 6; (Corks, Hats, and Gloves), 2203;

Res. 7; (Paper Hangings), 2204;

Res. 8; (Spirit Duties), 2206; Amend. (Mr. T. Duncombe), 2207, [c. q. A. 191, N. 48, M. 143] 2212; Report, 2227;

Res. 9, (Ammunition), 2264; (Butter), 2265;

Res. 10 (Gold Plate), 2266;

Res. 11 (Wood, &c.), 2267;

Res. 12 (Teak Wood), 2268;

Res. 13 (Malt), 2268;

Res. 14 (Tea, Sugar, &c.), 2268

Customs and Excise Departments, Messengers in the

c. Question (Mr. Astell), 1565

Customs Establishments.

c. Question (Mr. Maguire), 2179

DAMEN, Mr. L. S. W. D., Portarlington

Breech-Loading Carabines, 2224

DARNLEY, Earl of
Yeomanry, The, 2138

DAWSON, Mr. R. P., Londonderry Co.
Budget, The, Res. 1514
Fairs and Markets (Ireland), 262
Medical Relief Expenditure (Ireland), 533
Postal Rates, 1933
Representation of the People (Ireland), Leave, 2078

DEEDES, Mr. W., Kent, E.
Election Petitions Act Amendment, 2R. 1556
Friday Adjournments, Res. 171

Defences of the Country,
c. Question (Mr. Ellice), 1234;—see Plymouth
—Portsmouth

DE GREY AND RIPON, Earl, (Under Secretary for War)
Ordnance Maps—New Railways, 1837
Rifle Corps, 553, 556, 1317
Yeomanry, The, 2135

DENISON, Rt. Hon. J. E., see SPEAKER, THE

DENMAN, Hon. G., Tiverton
Appeal in Criminal Cases, 2R. 425
Bribery Prevention, Leave, 734

DERBY, Earl of
Address in Answer to the Speech, 44, 64, 65,
72
China—Instructions to Mr. Bruce, 1205
Endowed Schools, 2R. 695, 707; Com. cl. 2, 1219
France, Commercial Treaty with, 557; Papers
moved for, 1320, 2215
India—Emigration from—The French Colonies,
1924
Italy, Central, Papers moved for, 1028, 1032
Prayer Book, Alterations in the, Papers moved
for, 916
St. George's-in-the-East, 565, 571
Savoy, Annexation of, Address moved, 599;
Papers moved for, 1028
Tasmania—The Legislative Council, 1454, 1457
Yeomanry, The, 2141

DICKSON, Col. S. A., Limerick Co.
Army Estimates, 891, 1315
Customs Acts, Report (Silks), 2202
Militia, Disembodiment of the, 331, 524, 1261
Navy Estimates, 1000
Representation of the People (Ireland), Leave, 2082

DILLWYN, Mr. L. L., Swansea
Endowed Schools, Leave, 162

DISRAELI, Rt. Hon. B., Buckinghamshire
Address in Answer to the Speech, 88
Business of the House, 1704
Church Rates Abolition, 2R. 672
Customs Acts, Com. Amend, 1355, 1377, 1385;
Rep. 1970
Exchequer Bonds, 1230

DISRAELI, Rt. Hon. B.—cont.

Financial Statement, Postponement of, 558;—
The Budget, Res. 872, 1799, 1800, 1801
France, Commercial Treaty with, 1248, 1257;
Notice of Motion, 2233
Franklin's, Sir J., Expedition, 2157
Friday Adjournments, Res. 173, 769
Representation of the People, Leave, 2064
Savoy, Annexation of, 262, 445; Papers moved
for, 1959, 1966

Divine Service, Performance of
l. Petition (Lord Ebury), 1695;—see Theatres, Divine Service in

Divorce and Common Law Courts,
c. Question (Mr. Bovill), 232

Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Court,
c. Leave, 614; Previous Question moved (Mr.
E. James), 320, [A. 83, N. 268, M. 185] 629

DODSON, Mr. J. G., Sussex, E.
Budget, The, Res. 1512
Customs Acts—Res. 1 (Duties on Foreign Wines), 1869; Report (Corks), 2187
Hop Duties, 1228

DONOUGHMORE, Earl of Agricultural Statistics (Ireland), 715
Berwick-upon-Tweed Election, 688
Endowed Schools, 2R. 715
France, Commercial Treaty with, 556

DOUGLAS, Sir C. E., Banbury
Church Rates Abolition, 2R. 643
Recreation, &c., of the People, Com. moved
for, 1203

Drilling in Schools,
c. Question (Mr. W. Ewart), 1132

Dublin Corporation Water Bill,
c. 1R.* 716;
2R. 2048

DU CANE, Mr. C., Essex, N.
Budget, The, Res. 1475
Customs Acts, Notice of Amendment, 1326,
1355
Rules of Procedure—Amendments in Committee of Supply, &c., 1474

DUFF, Mr. M. E. G., Elgin, &c.
Budget, The, Res. 1522
Suez Canal, 1354

DUNBAR, Sir W. (Lord of the Treasury),
Wigton, &c.
Registration of Births, &c. (Scotland), Leave, 563

DUNCOMBE, Mr. T. S., Finsbury
British Wines, Drawback on, 1571
Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, Com. 1572, 1573

[cont.

[cont.

DUNCOMBE, Mr. T. S.—cont.

Customs Act, Res. 3 (Corks), Amend, 1987, 1992, 1995, 1996, 2002; Report, 2192; Res. 8 (Spirit Duties), Amend. 2206, 2208, 2211
 France, Commercial Treaty with, 331, 1354
 Friday Adjournments, Res. 178
 Gloucester City and Wakefield Elections, Leave, 771, 793
 Porpa, Giovanni, Case of, 1351
 Representation of the People, Leave, 2060
 Taxes, Collection of, 1932
 Wine and Spirit Duties, 1705, 1706

DUNGANNON, Viscount

Church Rates, 258
 Glebe Houses, Dilapidations in, 323
 Marriage Law, 1823, 1824
 Prayer Book, The, 2138
 Theatres, Divine Service in, Res. 803, 804, 805, 1662, 1671, 1694
 Yeomanry, The, 2138

DUNKELLIN, Viscount, Galway

Births, &c., Registration of (Ireland), 1471

DUNLOP, Mr. A. M., Greenock

Representation of the People (Scotland) Leave, 2093

DUNNE, Col. F. P., Queen's Co.

Army Estimates, 891, 1315, 1316
 Balfe, Mr., Case of, Papers moved for, 1094, 1102
 Valuation of Rateable Property (Ireland), Com. 1542

Dwellings for Labouring Classes (Ireland) Bill,

c. 1R.* 1350; 2R.* 1543; 3R.* 1698
 l. 1R.* 1822

East Indian Stock, Investments in

c. Question (Mr. A. Mills), 262

EBURY, Lord

Divine Service, Performance of, 1695, 1698
 Prayer Book, Alterations in, Papers moved for, 915, 916, 1103, 1106, 2134
 St. George's-in-the-East, 907

Ecclesiastical Commission,

c. Question (Mr. Ridley), 2224

Ecclesiastical Vestments Bill,

c. Leave, 2048; 1R.* ib.

Education Commission,

c. Question (Sir J. Pakington), 1472

Education (Scotland),

c. Question (Mr. Black), 538, 541; (Mr. Caird), 561

EDWARDS, Major H., Beverley

Masters and Operatives, 2R. 2023
 Representation of the People, Leave, 2067

EGERTON, Mr. E. C., Macclesfield

Financial Statement—The Budget, Res. 884

ELCHO, Lord, Haddingtonshire

Artillery Rifle Corps, 1233
 Rifle Corps—Lord Melville, 158

Election Petitions Act (1848) Amendment Bill,

c. Leave, 390; 1R.* 391;
 2R. deferred. 1093; 2R. 1552;
 Com. moved for (Mr. E. James), 1558

ELGIN, Earl of (Postmaster General)

China—Explanations, 1461

ELLENBOROUGH, Earl of

India—Distribution of Prize Money, 205, 206, 1320;—Emigration from—The French Colonies, 1924, 1930;—Honours to Native Princes, 2142
 Naval Reserves, 1834
 Rifle Corps, 556
 Savoy, Annexation of, Papers moved for, 1033
 Yeomanry, The, 2138

- ELLICE, Rt. Hon. E., Coventry

Customs Acts, Res. 3 (Silks), 2132; Report, 2194
 Defences of the Country, 1234
 Financial Statement—The Budget, Res. 874

ELPHINSTONE, Sir J. D. H., Portsmouth

Anchors, &c. (Merchant Service), Com. moved for, 497
 Navy Estimates, 994
 Navy, Manning the, Res. 1153
 Savoy, Annexation of, 954

Embroidery, &c.—Customs Acts,

c. Res. 3, 2100

Endowed Schools Bill (Lord Cranworth)

l. 1R.* 205;
 2R. postponed, 501; 2R. 689;
 Com. 1207;
 cl. 2, Amend. (Archbishop of Canterbury), 1210;
 Amend. neg. cl. struck out, 1221;
 cl. 7, 1221; cl. struck out, 1226;
 Rep. 1563; 3R.* 1660

Endowed Schools Bill (Mr. Dillwyn),

c. Leave, 162; 1R.* 163

Endowed Schools (No. 2) Bill (Sir H. Cairns),

c. Leave, 686; 1R.* 687

Endowed Schools (No. 3) Bill,

c. 1R.* 1837

EVANS, Lieut. Gen. Sir De Lacy (Westminster),

Address in Answer to the Speech, Report, 147
 China, Relations with, 949, 2226, 2227;—Expedition to, 1266

[cont.

EVANS, Lt.-Gen. Sir De L.—cont.

Clapton Cemetery at, 1838
National Defences Commission, 506
Portsmouth, Defences of, 2210
Wine Licences, 1839

EWART, Mr. J. C., Liverpool

Address in Answer to the Speech, Report, 147
Financial Statement—The Budget, Res. 884

EWART, Mr. W. Dumfries, &c.

Address in Answer to the Speech, Report, 129, 136
Appeal in Criminal Cases, 2R. 406
Bronze Coinage, The New, 1352
Customs Acts, Res. 3 (Agates, &c.), 1978 ;
(Apples, raw), 1985
Drilling in Schools, 1132
France, Commercial Treaty with, 1037
India—Legislative Council, 536 ;—Finances of,
Com. moved for, 764
Public Improvements, Com. 1548

EXCHEQUER, CHANCELLOR of the, see Chancellor of the Exchequer

Exchequer Bills—Supply,
c. Com. 443

Exchequer Bonds,
c. Question (Mr. Disraeli), 1230

EXETER, Bishop of
St. George's-in-the-East, 910, 915

FARQUHAR, Sir W. M. F., Hertford
Customs Acts—Res. 1 (Duties on Foreign Wines), 1887; Res. 3 (Cotton Manufactures), 2004
India—Medals and Prize Money, 507
London Corporation, Leave, 288

Feathers, &c.—Customs Acts,
c. Res. 3, 2105

FERGUSON, Sir J., Ayrshire
Annuity Tax Abolition (Edinburgh), Leave, 277
Army Estimates, 1300, 1301
Customs Acts, Res. 3 (Corks), 1993
Edinburgh Post Office, 725
Militia, The, 1260
Representation of the People (Scotland),
Leave, 2087

FERMOY, Lord, Marylebone

Address in Answer to the Speech, Report, 125
Adulteration of Food, &c., Com. 2030 ; cl. 3, 2042
Church Rates Abolition, 2R. 677
Public House Licences, 1840
Settled Estates Act Amendment, 2R. 2283

FEVERSHAM, Earl of
Lace Factories, 2217

Financial Statement,

c. Postponement of (Visct. Palmerston), 558 ;
Question (Lord H. Lennox), 726 ; Notice (Visct. Palmerston), 795 ; Res. (Chancellor of the Exchequer), 812 ; Res. (Mr. Du Cane), 1475 ; Adj. Debate, 1573, 1725 [A. 223, N.
339, M. 116], 1818 ;—see Customs Acts

Fire Work Manufactories,

c. Question (Mr. John Locke), 717

FITZGERALD, Rt. Hon. J. D. (Attorney General for Ireland), Ennis

Landlord and Tenant, Law of (Ireland), 221
Lodging House Acts (Ireland), 507
Poor Law Commissioners (Ireland), 720

FITZGERALD, Mr. W. R. S., Horsham

Address in Answer to the Speech, Report,
130, 143
China—Troops for, Return moved for, 716 ;—
Demand of the Allies on, 717
Customs Acts, Com. 1417, 1423 ;—Res. 1
(Duties on Foreign Wines), 1888, 1893,
1894, 1895 ; Res. 3 (Agates, &c.), 1978,
1979, 1980, 1981 ; (Corks), 1998, 2000
France, Commercial Treaty with, 609 ; Notice
of Motion, 2238, 2243
Savoy, Annexation of, 1134, 2225

FITZWILLIAM, Earl

Address in Answer to the Speech, 7

Flogging (Army and Navy),

c. Returns moved for (Mr. W. Williams), 1161 ;
Amend. (Lord C. Paget), [o. q. A. 46, N.
124, M. 78] 1191

FORDE, Col. W. B. Downshire
Poor Law Commissioners (Ireland), 720

Forgery Bill,

l. 1R. 253 ; 2R.* 1560

FORTESCUE, Mr. C. S. (Under Secretary for the Colonies), Louth Co.

"Accrington," The Ship, 718
Cape of Good Hope, Governor of the, 562
Colonial Chaplains, Salaries of, 1702
Hong Kong—Mr. C. Anstey, 445
Tarrant, Mr., Case of, 2161
Tasmania—The Legislative Council, 719.

France,

Armaments of, c. Question (Mr. A. W. King-lake), 517

Commercial Treaty with, l. Question (Earl of Donoughmore), 556 ; Correspondence moved for (Earl of Airlie), 1106 ; Papers moved for (Earl of Derby), 1320 ; Motion withdrawn, 1350 ; Notice (Duke of Newcastle), 2215

c. Question (Mr. Crawford), 268 ; (Mr. T. Duncombe), 331, 1354 ; (Mr. S. FitzGerald), 609 ; (Mr. Liddell), 722 ;—Treaty laid on the Table (Lord J. Russell), 811 ; Question (Mr.
Horsman), 957, 1725 ; (Mr. W. Ewart),
1037 ; (Mr. Bentinck), 1230 ; (Mr. Stirling),
1244 ; (Col. P. Herbert), 1267 ; (Mr. Lyall),

[cont.

France—cont.

1472; (Mr. Ball), ib.; (Mr. Newdegate), 1543; (Sir H. Willoughby), 1719; Notice (Mr. Byng), 2214; Question (Mr. Hankey), 2224; Notice (Visct. Palmerston), 2228; Motion withdrawn, 2264.

Customs Tariff, c. Question (Sir S. Northcote), 918

Differential Duties, c. Question (Lord J. Manners), 1136

Emigration Scheme, c. Question (Mr. Cave), 536, 540—see Budget, The—Savoy

Franklin's, Sir J., Expedition, c. Question (Sir F. Baring), 2147

Free Church, attempted Exclusion in a c. Question (Sir J. Trelawny), 810

FREELAND, Mr. H. W., Chichester

Flogging (Army and Navy), Returns moved for, 1191

Hertfordshire Magistrates, 1135

Highleigh Prebendal School, Returns moved for, 720

FRENCH, Col. F., Roscommon Co.

Murder, Attempted, (Ireland), 219

New Writs, Res. 179

Friday Adjournments,

c. Res. (Mr. E. P. Bouverie) 103, [A. 48, N. 166, M. 118] 179; Notice (Mr. Steuart), 609; Res. (Mr. Steuart), 768; Motion withdrawn, 771

Gas Holders, Models of

c. Question (Mr. H. B. Sheridan), 541, 542

GEORGE, Mr. J., Wexford Co.

Appeal in Criminal Cases, 2R. 430

Balf, Mr., Case of, Paper moved for, 1100

Settled Estates Act Amendment, 2R. 2289

GIBSON, Rt. Hon. T. M., (President of the Board of Trade), Ashton-under-Lyne

Anchors, &c., (Merchant Service), Com. moved for, 500

Budget, The, Res., 1755, 1761

Customs Acts, Res. 3 (Corks), 1991, 1992

France—Commercial Treaty with, 332, 722, 1037;—Differential Duties, 1136

Merchant Shipping, Com. moved for, Amend. 873

Railway Accidents, 220

Russia Company's Dues, 1133

Tariffs, Foreign, 328;—French, 918

GLADSTONE, Rt. Hon. W. E., see CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER

Globe Houses, Dilapidations in

i. Question (Viscount Dungannon), 323

Gloucester City Election,

a. Leave, 771, [A. 118, N. 149, M. 31] 793

Gloucester City Writ,

c. Res. (Sir G. Lewis), 180;—Bribery at, Question (Mr. Hadfield), 260

GLYN, Mr. G. C., Kendal

Financial Statement—The Budget, Res. 880

Gold Plate—Customs Acts

c. Res. 10, 2266

GOLDSMID, Sir F. H., Reading

Attorneys and Solicitors, Com., cl. 5, 1551

Bribery Prevention, Leave, 731

Corrupt Practices Prevention Act Amendment, 2R. 1076, 1085

Election Petitions Act Amendment, 2R. 1555

Masters and Operatives, 2R. 2023

Window Cleaning, 2R. 1549

Goods, Manufactured—Customs Acts,

c. Res. 4, 2132, 2203

GOWER, Hon. E. F. L., Bodmin

Budget, The, Res. 1497

GRAHAM, Lord M. W., Herefordshire

Annuity Tax Abolition (Edinburgh) Leave, 281

Customs Acts, Com., Res. 3 (Gutta Percha), 2106; Res. 7 (Paper Hangings), 2205

Oaths taken by Recruits, 329

Representation of the People (Scotland), Leave, 2095

Serpentine, The, Nomination of Com., 2098

GRAHAM, Rt. Hon. Sir J. R. G., Carlisle

Rules of Procedure—Amendments in Committees of Supply, &c., 1473

GRANVILLE, Earl (President of the Council)

Address in Answer to the Speech, 64, 65, 73

Bleaching and Dyeing Works, Labour in, 1823

Endowed Schools, Postponement of, 2R. 502, 504; 2R. 711; Com., cl. 2, 1213, 1220

France—Commercial Treaty with, 557; Correspondence moved for, 1128, 1336

Italy, Central, Papers moved for, 1011, 1031;—Signor Boncompagni, Explanation, 1450, 1451

St. George's-in-the-East, 257, 570, 571, 915

Savoy, Annexation of, 218; Address moved, 581, 800; Papers moved for, 1011, 1028, 1206

Theatres, Divine Service in, Res. 1688

GREGORY, Mr. W. H., Galway Co.

British Museum, 2158

Foundling Children (Ireland), 1244

Poor Law Commissioners (Ireland), 720

GREGSON, Mr. S., Lancaster

France, Commercial Treaty with, 960

Probate and Administration (India), Leave, 239; Com., cl. 1, 562

Savings Banks, &c.; 2R. 2271

GREVILLE, Col. F. S., Longford Co.
 Lunatic Poor (Ireland), 1037
 Representation of the People (Ireland), Leave, 2080
 Valuation of Rateable Property (Ireland), Com., 1542

GREY, Earl

Address in Answer to the Speech, Amend.,
 1,373
 Cotton and Slavery, Returns moved for, 212
 Criminal Outrages (Ireland), Returns moved
 for, 1916
 Endowed Schools, Com., cl. 2, 1214
 France, Commercial Treaty with, Correspondence moved for, 1116, 1123, 1344, 2216
 India, Emigration from,—The French Colonies, 1926
 Indictable Offences (Metropolitan Districts),
 Com., cl. 2, 1563
 Savoy, Annexation of, Address moved, 585, 801
 Tasmania—The Legislative Council, 1460

GREY, Rt. Hon. Sir G. (Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster), *Morpeth

Adulteration of Food and Drink, 2R. 1094
 Balfe, Mr., Case of, Paper moved for, 1101
 Corrupt Practices Prevention Act Amendment,
 2R. 1084, 1087
 Election Petitions Act Amendment, 2R. deferred, 1093; 2R. 1555
 Public Improvements, Com., 1547
 Representation of the People, Leave, 2068
 St. George's-in-the-East, Correspondence
 moved for, 1102
 Savoy, Annexation of, Papers moved for, 1957
 Window Cleaning, 2R. 1550

GRIFFITH, Mr. C. DARBY, Devizes

Belts and Buckles of Soldiers, 1268
 Beverley Election, Prosecution moved, 495
 Conveyance of Voters, Leave, 796
 Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, Com., moved
 for, 1093
 Customs Acts, Res. 4, (Agates, &c.), 1903
 Italy, French Troops in, 1036
 Leghorn, French Troops in, 222
 Sardinia, Affairs of, 329; "La Nazione Armata," 506
 Small Pox in London, 1240

GROGAN, Sir E., Dublin City

Customs Acts—Res. 1 (Duties on Foreign Wines), 1864, 1887; Res. 3 (Agates, &c.),
 1972; (Corks), 1991; (Silks), 2119; Res.
 8, (Spirit Duties) 2200
 Dublin Corporation Water, 2R. 2048
 India—Prize Money, 1227
 Medical Officers in the Navy, 1700
 Valuation of Rateable Property (Ireland), Com., 1542

Guatemala, Republic of,
c. Question (Mr. Crawford), 261

Gutta Percha—Customs Acts,
c. Res. 3, 2106

HADFIELD, Mr. G., Sheffield,

Address in Answer to the Speech, Report, 124
 Charitable Uses, Leave, 631
 Gloucester City Writ, Res. 180;—Bribery at, 260
 Jersey Commission, 525; Returns moved for,
 632
 Maynooth Grant, Com. moved for, 1055
 Prize Fight, The intended, 1722
 Qualification for Offices Abolition, Leave, 179;
 2R. 441, 443
 St. George's-in-the-East, 267
 Wakefield Writ, Res. 180;—Bribery at, 260
 Warehousing Places (Manchester, &c.), Leave, 391

HALIBURTON, Mr. T., Launceston

Customs Acts, Res. 3 (Agates, &c.), 1983

HAMILTON, Rt. Hon. Lord C., Tyrone

Adulteration of Food, &c., Com. cl. 1, 2040
 Customs Acts, Com., Res. 8 (Spirit Duties),
 2212
 Financial Statement—The Budget, Res. 880
 Friday Adjournments, Res. 172
 Italy, Affairs of, 610
 Navy, Wine and Medicines for the, 1036

HANBURY, Mr. R., Middlesex

Recreation, &c. of the People, Com. moved for, 1203
 Settled Estates Act Amendment, 2R. 2289

HANKEY, Mr. T., Peterborough

Adulteration of Food, &c., Com. cl. 1, 2038, 2039
 Nelson Monument, The, 1837
 Rags, Export of, 2224
 Richard Cœur de Lion, Statue of, 1837
 Savings Banks, &c., Res. 190; 2R. 2284

Harbours of Refuge Commission,
c. Question (Sir J. Pakington), 806

HARDWICKE, Earl of,

France, Commercial Treaty with, Correspondence moved for, 1114, 1336, 1350
 Naval Reserves, 1824

HARDY, Mr. G., Leominster

Adulteration of Food, &c., Com. 2030: cl. 1
 2034, 2039; cl. 3, 2040
 France, Commercial Treaty with, 1256
 Highways, Leave, 248
 Representation of the People, Leave, 2065

HARRIS, Lord,

Emigration from India—The French Colonies,
 1920

HASSARD, Mr. M. D., Waterford City

Customs Acts, Res. 1, (Duties on Foreign Wines), 1900
 Indian Army—Woolwich and Sandhurst, 1233

HENLEY, Lord, Northampton

Address in Answer to the Speech, 83

HENLEY, Rt. Hon. J. W., Oxfordshire
 Adulteration of Food, &c., Com. cl. 1, 2036, 2038
 Appeal in Criminal Cases, 2R. 433
 Customs Acts, Res. 1 (Duties on Foreign Wines), 1881, 1898
 Election Petitions Act Amendment, 2R. 1550
 Masters and Operatives, 2R. 2021
 Navy, Manning the, Res. 1142
 Public Improvements, Com. 1546
 St. George's-in-the-East, 808, 810
 Savings Banks, &c., 2R. 2281

HENNESSY, Mr. J. P., King's Co.
 Budget, The, Res. 1521
 Civil Service Appointments, Com. moved for, 1193, 1202
 Committee of Selection, Explanation, 2218
 Education (Ireland), 327
 Maynooth Grant, Com. moved for, 1050
 Roman Catholic Chaplains in Irish Workhouses, Papers moved for, 550, 551

Hennessy, Mr. J. P., and the Committee of Selection,
 c. Motion (Col. W. Patten), 1930 ; Amend. (Mr. Bouverie), 1932 ; Reply, 2047 ; Explanation, 2213

HERBERT, Rt. Hon. H. A., Kerry Co.
 Packet and Telegraphic Contracts, Com. moved for, 315
 Savings Banks, Res. 197

HERBERT, Rt. Hon. S., (Secretary of State for War,) Wiltshire, S.
 Armstrong and Whitworth Cannon, 2221
 Army Estimates, 687 ; Res. 889, 891, 892, 1275, 1301, 1302, 1315, 1316 ; Report, 1448
 Belts and Buckles of Soldiers, 1275
 Breech-loading Carbines, 2224
 Cavalry Officers, 1571, 2220
 China, Troops for, Return moved for, 716 ;—Arms for, 723 ;—Armstrong Guns sent to, 2223
 Chinese War of 1857, 1470
 Colonies, Troops in the, 2220
 Defences of the Country, 1237
 Flogging (Army and Navy), Returns moved for, 1181
 Guards, Head Quarters for the, 158
 Indian Army—Sandhurst and Woolwich, 1236
 Land Transport Corps, 531
 Major Generals, Allowance to, 807
 Melville, Lord, and the Rifle Corps, 158
 Militia, The, 331, 509, 530, 1229
 Navy Estimates, 1001
 Oaths taken by Recruits, 330
 Plymouth, &c., Fortifications of, 1229
 Rifle Corps, 158, 724, 1228, 1236, 1470, 1699

HERBERT, Hon. Col. P. E., Ludlow
 Army Estimates, 1313
 Coal, Export of, 1267
 France, Commercial Treaty with, 960
 India—Finances of, Com. moved for, 763 ;—Regiments in, 2146

Herrings, Foreign Duty on
 c. Question (Mr. W. Miller), 2049

Hertfordshire Magistrates,
 c. Question (Mr. Freeland), 1135

Highleigh Prebendal School,
 c. Return moved for (Mr. Freeland), 720

Highways Bill,
 c. Leave, 240 ; 1R.* 252

Holyhead, Steamboat Accommodation at,
 c. Question (Lord J. Browne), 725

Hop Duties,
 c. Question (Mr. Mildmay) 1228

HOPE, Mr. G. W., Windsor
 Customs Acts, Res. 3, (Corks) 1998
 Packet and Telegraphic Contracts, Com. moved for, 314, 322
 Packet Service (Transfer of Contracts), Com. 2285
 Representation of the People (Scotland), Leave 2093
 Valuation (Scotland), 2224

HOPWOOD, Mr. J. T., Clitheroe
 Rifle Corps, 723

HORSFALL, Mr. T. B., Liverpool
 Budget, The, Res. 1598, 1761
 Customs Acts, Com. Res. 8 (Spirit Duties), 2207
 Financial Statement—The Budget, Res. 879
 Merchant Shipping, Com. moved for, 347
 School Ships, 560

HORSMAN, Rt. Hon. E., Stroud
 Address in Answer to the Speech, Report, 143
 Army Estimates, 1302
 Customs Acts, Com. 1429, 1442
 Financial Statement—The Budget, Res. 882, 886
 France, Commercial Treaty with, 269, 957, 1249, 1725, 1841 ; Notice of Motion, 2234
 National Defences, 919

HOTHAM, Lord, Yorkshire, E. Riding
 Rifle Corps, 724

HOWARD, Lord E. G. F., Arundel
 Adulteration of Food, &c., Com. cl. 1, 2038

HOWES, Mr. E., Norfolk, E.
 Customs Acts, Res. 3, (Agates, &c.) 1977
 Packet Service (Transfer of Contracts), 2R. 1905

HUBBARD, Mr. J. C., Buckingham
 Budget, The, Res. Adj. moved, 1541, 1574
 Church Rates Abolition, 2R. 679
 Church Rates Law Amendment, Leave, 495
 Russia Company's Dues, 1133

HUMBERSTON, Mr. P. S., Chester City
 Customs Acts—Res. 1 (Duties on Foreign Wines), 1879

Hungary, State of
 c. Question (Mr. Long), 1227

HUNT, Mr. G. W., Northamptonshire, N.
 Corrupt Practices Prevention Act Amendment,
 2R. 1073
 Ecclesiastical Vestments, Leave, 2043
 Election Petitions Act Amendment, 2R. 1557
 Valuation, Uniform System of, 2223

HUTT, Rt. Hon. W. (Paymaster of the Forces and Vice President of the Board of Trade) Gateshead
 France, Commercial Treaty with, 1472

Hyde Park, Shrubs in
 c. Question (Mr. E. James) 510

Income Tax,
 c. Com. moved for (Mr. Pollard Urquhart), 480 ; Motion withdrawn, 483 ; Question (Mr. H. B.
 Sheridan), 1571

India,
Army, The—Woolwich and Sandhurst, c. Question (Mr. Hassard), 1233
Emigration from—The French Colonies, l.
 Question (Lord Harris), 1920
Finances of, c. Com. moved for (Mr. Vansittart),
 737 ; Motion withdrawn, 768
Godavery, Navigation of the, c. Observations
 (Mr. J. B. Smith), 526, 539
Land Tax, c. Question (Mr. Kinnaird), 327
Legislative Council, c. Question (Mr. W. Ewart), 536, 540
Licensing Bill, c. (Mr. Danby Seymour), 331
Lucknow, Defence of, c. Question (Mr. Jones) 1567
Madras Irrigation and Canal Company, c.
 Question (Mr. Smollett), 1038 Mutiny Compensation, c. Question (Mr. Vansittart) 508
Native Princes, Honours to, l. Question (Lord Lyveden), 2142
Office, c. Question (Col. Sykes), 2146 Prize Money, Distribution of, l. Question (Earl of Ellenborough) 205 ; Papers moved for (Lord Berners), 1318
Promissory Notes, c. Question (Mr. Crawford),
 222, 1703
Queen's Officers and Company's Officers, c. Question (Mr. Coningham), 1700
Regiments in, c. Question (Col. Herbert), 2146
Vote of Thanks, Acknowledgment of, l. 153
Vote of Thanks, Acknowledgment of, c. 175 ;
 —see East India Stock—Probate and Administration (India) Bill

India House—Records, &c. at the
 c. Question (Col. Sykes) 1241

Indictable Offences (Metropolitan District)
 Bill,
 l. 1R.* 253 ;
 2R. 892 ;
 Com. cl. 2, 1560 ; 3R.* 1660

INGHAM, Mr. R., South Shields
 Merchant Shipping, Com. moved for, 363

Ionian Islands—Mr. Gladstone's Mission,
 c. Question (Mr. Maguire), 806

VOL. CLVI. [THIRD SERIES.]

Ireland,
Agricultural Distress, c. Question (Mr. Lanigan), 1351
Agricultural Statistics, l. Observations (Earl of Leitrim), 715
Balfe, Mr., Case of, c. Paper moved for (Col.
 Dunne), 1004
Births, &c., Registration of, Question (Lord
 Dunkellin), 1471
Charitable Bequests, c. Question (Sir W. Somerville), 2223
Criminal Outrages (Ireland), l. Returns moved for (Marquess of Clanricarde), 1909 ; Amend.
 (Duke of Somerset), 1916
Ecclesiastical Commission, c. Question (Mr.
 Vance), 562
Education, c. Question (Mr. Hennessy), 327 ;
 (Sir H. Cairns), 505 ; (Lord Naas), 1704
Fairs and Markets, c. Question, (Mr. Dawson), 262
Foundling Children, c. Question (Mr. Gregory), 1244
Holyhead, Steam Boat Accommodation at, c.
 Question (Lord J. Browne), 725
Landlord and Tenant, Law of, c. Question
 (Mr. Maguire), 221
Lodging House Acts, c. Question (Mr. Maguire), 507
Lunatic Poor, c. Question (Col. Greville) 1037, Maynooth Grant, c. Com. moved for (Mr.
 Spooner), 1038, [A. 128, N. 186, M. 58]
 1056
Medical Relief Expenditure, c. Observations
 (Mr. Dawson), 533
Murder, Attempted, c. Question (Col. French), 219
Perrin, Mr. Justice, Retirement of, c. Question
 (Mr. Long), 917
Poor Law Commissioners, c. Questions (Mr.
 Gregory), (Col. Fordo), (Mr. O'Brien), 720
Post Office, c. Question (Mr. Vance), 1702
Roman Catholic Chaplains in Workhouses, c.
 Correspondence moved for (Mr. Hennessy),
 550 ; Motion neg., 551
Roscommon Election, c. Report, 2219
Volunteer Corps, c. Question (Mr. M'Evoy)
 811

See

County Prisons (Ireland) Bill
*Dwellings for Labouring Classes (Ireland)
 Bill*
Marriages (England and Ireland) Bill
Representation of the People (Ireland) Bill
Spirits (Ireland) Act Amendment Bill
Tramways (Ireland) Bill
Valuation of Rateable Property (Ireland) Bill

Italy, State of

l. Question (Marquess of Normanby), 153 ;— Central, Papers moved for (Marquess of Normanby), 1001 ; Motion withdrawn, 1035 ;— Signor Boncompagni, Explanation (Earl Granville), 1450
 c. Question (Lord C. Hamilton), 610 ;—*French
 Army in*, Question (Mr. Griffith), 1036 ;—
Address of the Irish Catholics, Question
 (The O'Donoghue), 2147

JAMES, Mr. E., Marylebone

Address in Answer to the Speech, Report, 150
 Adulteration of Food, &c., 2R. 1094 ; Com. cl.
 1, 2033, 2037 ; cl. 2, 2040 ; cl. 3, 2041
 Appeal in Criminal Cases, 2R. 428

JAMES, Mr. E.—cont.

Berkeley House, 2226
 Bribery Prevention, Leave, 733
 Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, Com. moved for, 1080
 Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Court, Leave, Previous Question moved, 618
 Election Petitions Act Amendment, 2R. 1552 ; Com. moved for, 1558
 Flogging (Army and Navy), Returns moved for, 1188
 Friday Adjournments, Res. 170
 Gloucester City Writ, 181
 Hong Kong—Mr. C. Anstey, 445
 Hyde Park, Shrubs in, 510
 London Corporation, Leave, 200
 Masters and Operatives, 2R. 2020
 Norwich Election, 1471
 Reform Bill, The, 1036
 Rifle Corps, 1699
 Savings Banks, &c., 2R. 2272
 Serpentine, The, Nomination of Com. 2099
 Settled Estates Act Amendment, 2R. 2287
 Smethurst, Thos., Case of, 227
 Tarrent, Mr., Case of, 2160
 Wakefield Writ, Res. 181
 Window Cleaning, 2R. 1549
 Wine and Beer Licences, 1352, 2146
 Works, First Commissioner of, 263

Japan, Trade with,
c. Question (Mr. Clifford), 1352

Jersey Commission

c. Observations (Mr. Hadfield), 525 ; Returns moved for, 632 ; Motion withdrawn, ib.

JERVIS, Capt. H. J. W., Harwich
 Navy Estimates, 964

Jewish Religion
c. Res. 74

JOHNSTONE, Hon. H. B., Canterbury
 Army Estimates, 1315

JOLLIFFE, Rt. Hon. Sir W. G. H., Petersfield
 Customs Acts, Res. 3 (Cotton Manufactures), 2090 ; (Feathers, &c.), 2105
 Representation of the People, Leave, 2066

JONES, Mr. D., Carmarthenshire
 Lucknow, Defence of, 1567

KEKEWICH, Mr. S. T., Devonshire, S.
 Settlement and Removal, Law of, 505

KELLY, Sir F., Suffolk, E.
 Bribery Prevention, Leave, 726
 Corrupt Practices Prevention Act Amendment, Leave, 885
 Customs Acts, 1399 ; Res. 1 (Duties on Foreign Wines), 1883, 1899 ; Res. 7 (Paper Hangings), 2204, 2205
 Election Petitions Act Amendment, 2R. 1554
 France, Commercial Treaty with, 1721
 Gloucester City Writ, Res. 182 ;—Bribery at, 261
 Wakefield Writ, Res. 182 ;—Bribery at, 261
 Wine and Spirit Duties, 1706

KENDALL, Mr. N., Cornwall, E.
 Financial Statement—The Budget, Res. 883

KING, Hon. P. G. L., Surrey, E.
 Religious Worship, Leave, 1204

KINGLAKE, Mr. A. W., Bridgwater
 France, Armaments of, 517 ;—Commercial Treaty with, Notice of Motion, 2229
 Savoy, Annexation of, 953, 1569, 1935 ; Papers moved for, 1936
 Treaties of Guarantee, Address moved, 1204

KINGLAKE, Mr. Serjt., J. A., Rochester
 Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, Com. moved for, 1090

KINNAIRD, Hon. A. F., Perth
 Admiralty, The, 613
 India—Land Tax, 327 ;—Finances of, Com. moved for, 764
 Medical Acts Amendment, 2R. 1907
 Packet Service (Transfer of Contracts), 2R. 1904, 1905
 Recreation, &c., of the People, Com. moved for, 1203
 Representation of the People (Scotland), Leave, 2094
 Savoy, Annexation of, Papers moved for, 1965
 Treaties of Guarantee, Address moved, 1205

KNIGHTLEY, Mr. R., Northamptonshire, S.
 Representation of the People, Leave, 2072
 Serpentine, The, Nomination of Com., Amend. 2096

KNOX, Major, Hon. W. S., Dungannon
 Wines, Foreign, Bonding of, 1568

KNOX, Lt.-Col., B. W., Marlow (Great)
 Army Estimates, 1314, 1316
 France, Armaments of, 520

Lace Factories,
l. Petition (Earl of Shaftesbury), 2216

LAING, Mr. S., (Joint-Secretary to the Treasury), Wick, &c.
 Australian Mails, 220
 Civil Service Appointments, Com. moved for, 1194
 Customs Acts, Res. 1 (Duties on Foreign Wines), 1887 ; Res. 9 (Ammunition), 2264 ; (Butter), 2265 ; Res. 10 (Gold Plate), 2266 ; Res. 11 (Wood, &c.), 2267
 Edinburgh Post Office, 725
 Exchequer Bonds, 1230
 France, Commercial Treaty with, 1253
 Gas Holders, Models of, 542
 Hop Duties, 1228
 Miscellaneous Civil Service Expenditure, Com. moved for, 459
 Newspapers for Australia, Postage on, 723
 Packet and Telegraphic Contracts, Nomination of Com. 632, 633
 Packet Service (Transfer of Contracts), 2R. 1904 ; Com. 2285
 Post Office (Ireland), 1702
 Salmon Fishing (Scotland), 1570
 Time Bargains, 1229

[cont.]

LAINO, Mr. S.—cont.

Valuation of Rateable Property (Ireland), 2R. 1317; Com. 1541, 1542
Warehousing Places (Manchester, &c.), Leave, 392

Land Transport Corps,

c. Question (Mr. P. Urquhart), 500; Reply (Mr. S. Herbert), 531

LANIGAN, Mr. J., Cashel

Agricultural Distress (Ireland), 1351

Larceny, &c., Bill,

l. 1R. 253; 2R.* 1560

Law and Equity Bill,

l. 1R. 1449

LEFROY, Mr. A., Dublin University

Dublin Corporation Water, 2R. 2049

Medical Acts Amendment, 2R. 1907

Leghorn, French Troops in

c. Question (Mr. D. Griffith), 222

LEIGHTON, Sir B., Salop, S.

Adulteration of Food, &c., Com. cl. 3, Amend. 2040, 2041

Highways, Leave, 249

LEITRIM, Earl of

Agricultural Statistics (Ireland), 715

LENNOX, Lord H. G. C. G., Chichester

Budget, The, 726

St. George's-in-the-East, 807

LEWIS, Rt. Hon. Sir G. C., (Secretary of State for the Home Department), Radnor

American Ships, Outrages in, 235

Appeal in Criminal Cases, Leave, 118; 2R. Amend. 407, 410

Attorneys and Solicitors, Com. add. cl., 1552

Beverley Election, Prosecution moved, 493

Bibles, Patent for Printing, 610

Bleaching and Dyeing Works, Leave, 629

Church of England Services, 157

Church Rates, Returns moved for, 117

Church Rates Abolition, 2R. 660

Clapton, Cemetery at, 1838

Coroners' Fees, 561

Divorce and Common Law Courts, 234

Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Court, Leave, 623

Ecclesiastical Commission, 2224

Election Petitions Act Amendment, 2R. 1553; Com. moved for, 1558

Fire Work Manufactories, 717

Friday Adjournments, Res. 174, 770

Gloucester City and Wakefield Election, Leave, 777

Gloucester City Writ, Res. 180, 181, 189;—Bribery at, 260, 261

Hertfordshire Magistrates, 1136

Highways, Leave, 240, 250

LEWIS, Rt. Hon. Sir G. C.—cont.

Jersey Commission, 525; Returns moved for, 632

London Corporation, Leave, 262, 280

Marriage with the Brother of a Deceased Husband, 1724, 2221

Masters and Operatives, 2R., Amend. 2014; Com. moved for, 2095

Municipal Corporation Mortgages, Leave, 252

Newspapers, Com. 548

Oxford University, Leave, 323

Packet and Telegraph Contracts, Nomination of Com. 633

Petitions of Right, Leave, 162; 2R. 545, 547

Prize Fight, The intended, 1724

Qualification for Offices Abolition, 2R. 441

Representation of the People, Leave, 2066

Representation of the People (Ireland), Leave, 2081

Representation of the People (Scotland), Leave, 2088

Roman Catholic Chaplains in Irish Workhouses, Papers moved for, 550, 551

Roman Catholic Charities, 117

St. George's-in-the-East, 264, 559, 2165

Smethurst, Thomas, Case of, 235

Stock in Trade—Exemption from Rating, 1700

Valuation, Uniform System of, 2223

Wakefield Writ, Res. 180, 181, 189;—Bribery at, 260, 261

Window Cleaning, 2R. Amend. 1550

Licences, see Public Houses—Wine

LIDDELL, Hon. H. G., Northumberland, S.

American Coasting Trade, 1131

Budget, The, Res. 1509

Conveyance of Voters, Leave, 797

Customs Acts, Com. Res. 7 (Paper Hangings), 2205

France, Commercial Treaty with, 722, 1508; Notice of Motion, 2244

Merchant Shipping, Com. moved for, 366

Navy, Manning the, Res. 1145

Spain and Morocco, 516

Light Weight Racing Bill,

l. 1R. 1102

LINCOLN, Bishop of

Endowed Schools, Com. cl. 2, 1221

LINDSAY, Mr. W. S., Sunderland

France, Commercial Treaty with, Notice of Motion, 2229

*Merchant Shipping, Com. moved for, 332

Navy Estimates, 963; Adj. moved, 1000

Navy, Manning the, Res. 1147

Linen, &c.—Customs Acts,

c. Res. 3, 2107

LLANDAFF, Bishop of

Theatres, Divine Service in, Res. 1690

LOCKE, Mr. JOHN, Southwark

Adulteration of Food, &c., Com. 2029; cl. 1, 2036; Amend. 2039; cl. 3, 2041

Attorneys and Solicitors, 2R. 686; Com. cl. 5, 1551

LOCKE, Mr. JOHN—cont.

Conveyance of Voters, Leave, 798
Fire Work Manufactories, 717
London Corporation, Leave, 287
Poor Rates (St. Pancras), 1572

LOCKE, Mr. JOSEPH, Honiton

Address in Answer to the Speech, Report, 150
British Museum, 2154

LONDON, Bishop of

Divine Service, Performance of, 1095, 1098
Endowed Schools, 2R. 706, 707; Com. cl. 2, 1213, 1220
St. George's-in-the-East, 255, 572, 918
Theatres, Divine Service in, Res. 805, 1691

London Corporation Bill,

c. Leave, 282; 1R.* 290

LONDONDERRY, Marquess of

Criminal Outrages (Ireland), Returns moved for, 1916

LONG, Mr. R. P., Chippenham

Church Rates Abolition, 2R. 857
Hungary, State of, 1227
Maynooth Grant, Com. moved for, 1047
Perrin, Mr. Justice, Retirement of, 917

LONGFIELD, Mr. R., Mallow

Appeal in Criminal Cases, 2R. 439
Balfe, Mr., Case of, Paper moved for, 1009
Representation of the People (Ireland), Leave, 2080
Savings Banks, &c., 2R. 2272

LOVAIN, Lord, Northumberland, N.

Merchant Shipping, Com. moved for, 363
Qualification for Offices Abolition, 2R. 441

LOWE, Rt. Hon. R. (Vice-President of the Committee of Privy Council for Education), Calne

Drilling in Schools, 1132
Education Commission, 1472
Education (Scotland), 541

LYALL, Mr. G., Whitehaven

France, Commercial Treaty with, 1472

LYGON, Hon. F., Tewkesbury

Packet Service (Transfer of Contracts), 3R.; Adj. moved, 1904, 1905
Religious Worship, Leave, 1204
St. George's-in-the-East, 2165

LYNDHURST, Lord

Criminal Law Consolidation, 564, 565

LYTTELTON, Lord

Endowed Schools, Com. cl. 2, 1215

MACAULAY, Mr. K., Cambridge

Corrupt Practices Prevention Act Amendment, 2R. 1035
Customs Acts, Res. 3 (Cotton Manufactures), 2005
Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Court, Leave, 626

M'CANN, Mr. J., Drogheda

Dublin Corporation Water, 2R. 2048

M'EVOY, Mr. E., Meath Co.

Pope, Revolted Provinces of the, 1711
Representation of the People (Ireland), Leave, 2079
Volunteer Corps (Ireland), 811

MACKINNON, Mr. W. A., Rye

Masters and Operatives, 2R. 2010, 2025;
Com. moved for, 2095

M'MAHON, Mr. P., Wexford Co.

Appeal in Criminal Cases, Leave, 118; 2R. 392, 410, 440

MAGUIRE, Mr. J. F., Dungarvan

Civil Service Appointments, Com. moved for, 1196
Customs Establishments, 2179
Dublin Corporation Water, 2R. 2048, 2049
Ionian Islands—Mr. Gladstone's Mission, 806
Landlord and Tenant, Law of (Ireland), 221
Lodging House Acts (Ireland), 507
Representation of the People (Ireland), Leave, 2081
Spain and Morocco, 513

Malicious Injury to Property Bill,

1. 1R. 253; 2R.* 1560

MALINS, Mr. R., Wallingford

Bribery Prevention, Leave, 735
Customs Acts, Com. 1411
Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Court, Leave, 625
France—Commercial Tariff, 918
Gloucester City Writ, Res. 186
Probate and Administration (India), Leave, 239
Trade-marks, Forgery of, 1244
Wakefield Writ, Res. 186

MALMESBURY, Earl of

Italy, Central, Papers moved for, 1017, 1033
New Forest, The, 1550
Savoy, Annexation of, Papers moved for, 1017
Yeomanry, The, 2137

Malt—Customs Acts,

c. Res. 13, 2268

Malt for Cattle Feeding,

c. Question (Lord H. Thynne), 1701

MANNERS, Rt. Hon. Lord J. J. R., Leicestershire, N.

c. 630
117

[cont.

MANNERS, Rt. Hon. Lord J. J. R.—cont.

Customs Acts, Res. 3 (Agates, &c.), 1983 ;
(Corks), 1989 ; (Cotton Manufactures), 2004,
2005 ; (Feathers, &c.), 2105, 2106

Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Court, Leave,
614, 628

Financial Statement—The Budget, Res. 885

France--Differential Duties, 1136;—Commercial Treaty with, 1254 ; Notice of Motion, 2256

Masters and Operatives, Com. moved for, 2095
Packet and Telegraphic Contracts, Com. moved
for, 306

Packet Service (Transfer of Contracts), 2R.
1905

St. George's-in-the-East, 810

Savoy, Annexation of, 2171

MARLBOROUGH, Duke of Church Rates, Com. moved for, 259

Endowed Schools, Rep. Amend., 1564

Theatres, Divine Service in, Res. 1689

Marriage Law,

l. Petition (Viscount Dungannon), 1823

Marriage with the Brother of a deceased Husband,

c. Question (Mr. Collins), 1723, 2221

Marriages (England and Ireland) Bill,

c. Leave, 631 ; 1R.* ib. ; 2R.* 1131

MARSH, Mr. M. H., Salisbury

Budget, The, Res. 1596

MARTIN, Mr. P. W., Rochester

Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, Com. moved
for, 1092

Martin Escalante—Bible in Spain,

c. Question (Sir A. Agnew), 330

MASSEY, Mr. W. N., (Chairman of Committees,) Salford

Customs Acts, Res. 1 (Duties on Foreign Wines), 1900 ; Res. 3 (Agates, &c.), 1972 ;
(Corks), 1995 ; (Silks, &c.), 2111

Dublin Corporation Water, 2R. 2048

Masters and Operatives Bill,

c. 1R.* 634 ;

2R. 2010 ; Amend. (Sir G. Lewis), 2016 ;

Amend. and Motion withdrawn, 2025 ;

Com. moved for (Mr. Mackinnon), 2095

Maynooth Grant,

c. Com. moved for (Mr. Spooner), 1038, [A. 128,
N. 186, M. 58] 1056

Medical Acts Amendment Bill,

c. 1R.* 1350 ;

2R. 1906 ; Amend. (Mr. Craufurd) ib., Amend. neg., 1907

MELLOR, Mr. J., Nottingham

Appeal in Criminal Cases, 2R. 432

Corrupt Practices Prevention Act Amendment,
Leave, 378 ; 2R. 1069, 1080

MELLOR, Mr. J.—cont.

Election Petitions Act Amendment, Leave, 390 ;
2R. 1552, 1554

Gloucester City Writ, Res. 186

Marriages (England and Ireland), Leave, 631

Wakefield Writ, Res. 186

Melville, Lord, and the Rifle Corps,

c. Question (Lord Elcho), 158

Merchant Shipping,

c. Com. moved for (Mr. Lindsay), 332 ; Amend.
(Mr. Digby Seymour) 355 ; Amend. withdrawn, 378 ; Amend. (Mr. M. Gibson), ib.

MILDMAY, Mr. H. F., Herefordshire

Hop Duties, 1228

MILES, Sir W., Somersetshire, E.

Customs Acts, Res. 4 (Agates, &c.), 1901 ;
(Corks), 1999 ; Res. 7 (Paper Hangings),
2206

Militia, Disembodiment of the

c. Question (Col. Dickson), 331 ; Observations, 524 ; (Mr. Palk), 508, 1258 ;—Training of the, Question (Major Parker), 1223

MILLER, Mr. W., Leith, &c.

Annuity Tax Abolition (Edinburgh), Leave, 281
Herrings, Foreign Duty on, 2049

MILLS, Mr. A., Taunton

Cape of Good Hope, Governor of the, 562

East India Stock, Investments in, 262

Ecclesiastical Vestments, Leave, 2043

Gloucester City and Wakefield Elections, Leave, 780

Probate and Administration (India), Leave, 240

MILNES, Mr. R. M., Pontefract

American Ships, Outrages in, 229

Corrupt Practices Prevention Act Amendment,
2R. 1088

Customs Acts, Res. 1 (Duties on Foreign Wines), Amend. 1866, 1874, 1882, 1886

Friday Adjournments, Res. 168

Savoy, Annexation of, 1933 ; Papers moved for,
1960, 2173

Mines Regulation and Inspection Bill,

c. 1R.* 1035

Miscellaneous Civil Service Expenditure,

c. Com. moved for, (Mr. Wise) 440, [A. 121,
N. 93, M. 28] 478

MONCREIFF, Rt. Hon. J., see Advocate, the Lord

MONSELL, Rt. Hon. W., Limerick Co.

Adulteration of Food, &c., Com. cl. 1, 2039 ;
cl. 3, 2041, 2042

Representation of the People (Ireland), Leave, 2080

MONTAGU, Lord R., Huntingdonshire

Budget, The, Res. 1501

Church Rates Abolition, 2R. Amend. 647

Masters and Operatives, 2R. 2016

Sardinia and Naples, 1135

MONTAGLE, Lord

France, Commercial Treaty with, 558

MOWBRAY, Rt. Hon. J. R., Durham City

Attorneys and Solicitors, Com. add. cl. 1551

Municipal Corporation Mortgages Bill,

c. Leave, 252; 1R.* ib.; 2R.* 1226

MURE, Rt. Hon. D., Buteshire

Representation of the People (Scotland), Leave, 2002

MURRAY, Mr. W., Newcastle-under-Lyme

Attorneys and Solicitors, Com. add. cl. 1552

NAAS, Rt. Hon. Lord, Cockermouth

National Education (Ireland), 1704

NAPIER, Vice-Adm. Sir C., Southwark

Channel Fleet, Accident to the, 2164

China, Relations with, 951

Flogging (Army and Navy), Returns moved for, 1189

Merchant Shipping, Com. moved for, 373

Navy Estimates, 978, 988

Navy, Manning the, Returns moved for, 159, 160; Res. 1137, 1150, 1151, 1160

Packet Service (Transfer of Contracts), Com. 2285

Sailors, Passes to, 1350

Naples and Sardinia,

c. Question (Lord R. Montagu), 1135

National Defences Commission,

c. Question (Sir De L. Evans), 506; (Mr. Horsman), 919;—see Defences

Naval Reserves,

l. Observations (Earl of Hardwicke), 1824

Naval School, Royal, Bill,

l. 1R.* 551

Navy,

Admiralty, The, Question (Mr. Kinnaird), 613

Channel Fleet, Accident to the, c. Question (Sir J. Pakington), 2159

Estimates, c. Observations (Mr. W. Williams), 962;—Supply, 965

Flogging, c. Returns moved for, (Mr. W. Williams), 1161; Amend. (Lord C. Paget), [o. q. A. 46, N. 124, M. 78] 1191

Lieutenants, c. Question (Lord J. Browne), 917

Manning the, c. Returns moved for (Sir C. Napier), 159; Motion neg., 160; Res. (Sir C. Napier), 1137

Medical Officers, c. Question (Sir E. Grogan), 1700

Navy—cont.

Sailors, Passes to, c. Question (Sir C. Napier), 1350

School Ships, c. Question (Mr. Horsfall), 560

Wine and Medicines for the, c. Question (Lord C. Hamilton), 1036

Nelson Monument, The

c. Question (Mr. Hankey), 1837

NEWCASTLE, Duke of, (Secretary of State for the Colonies)

Address in Answer to the Speech, 27, 33, 73

Cotton and Slavery, Returns moved for, 208

Criminal Outrages (Ireland), Returns moved for, 1918

Endowed Schools, Com. cl. 7, 1223

France, Commercial Treaty with, 2215, 2216

India, Emigration from—The French Colonies, 1927

Lace Factories, 2217

Red River Settlement, 905

Savoy, Annexation of, Address moved, 505

Tasmania—The Legislative Council, 1453, 1455, 1457

Yeomanry, The, 2140, 2141

NEWDEGATE, Mr. C. N., Warwickshire, N.

Address in Answer to the Speech, Report, 142

Customs Acts, Com. 1403;—Res. 1 (Duties on Foreign Wines), 1901; Res. 4 (Agates, &c.), 1904; Res. 3, 1972, 1974, 1978; (Corks), 1999; (Cotton Manufactures), 2004, 2099; (Embroidery), 2104; (Silks), 2111, 2112, 2132; Report, Amend. 2180, 2181, 2201

Financial Statement—The Budget, Res. 876, 884; Adj. moved, 1660, 1725, 1733

France—Customs Tariff, 918;—Commercial Treaty with, 1252, 1543; Notice of Motion, 2258

Masters and Operatives, 2R. 2023

Maynooth Grant, Com. moved for, 1052

Qualification for Offices Abolition, 2R. Adj. moved, 442, 2009

Representation of the People, Leave, 2008

Roman Catholic Charities, 117

Tariffs, Foreign, 327

Trinity and St. John's Colleges, Cambridge, Address moved, 1069

New Forest, The

l. Question (Earl of Malmesbury), 1559

Newfoundland Fisheries,

c. Question (Sir J. Pakington), 917

Newspapers, &c. Bill,

c. 1R.* 219; 2R.* 445;

Com. 547; 3R.* 558

l. 1R.* 564

New Writs,

c. Res. (Mr. Collins), 179

Nice—see Savoy, Annexation of

[cont.]

NOEL, Hon. G. J., Rutlandshire
Cavalry Officers Horses, 1571

NORMANBY, Marquess of
Address in Answer to the Speech, 32, 33, 44
Italy, State of, 153, 154 ;—Central, Papers
moved for, 1001, 1017, 1025, 1034, 1035 ;—
Signor Boncompagni, 1451
Savoy, Annexation of, 214 ; Address moved,
574, 608, 797, 800, 801 ; Papers moved for,
1001, 1206, 1207, 2045

NORTH, Col. J. S., Oxfordshire
Army Estimates, 1315
Flogging (Army and Navy), Returns moved
for, 1166
Volunteers—Officers' Fees, 1470

NORTHCOTE, Sir S. H., Stamford
Civil Service Appointments, Com. moved for,
1195
Customs Acts, Res. 1. (Duties on Foreign Wines), 1860, 1883, 1896
Financial Statement—The Budget ; Res. 870,
1525, 1530, 1650
France—Customs Tariff, 918
Packet and Telegraphic Contracts, Com. moved
for, 313
Savings Banks, Res. 200
Wines, Foreign, Drawback on, 1566

Norwich Election,
c. Question (Mr. E. James), 1471

O'BRIEN, Mr. P., King's Co.
Chinese Expedition—Arms for the Troops, 723
Civil Service Appointments, Com. moved for, 1194
Maynooth Grant, Com. moved for, 1050, 1056
Poor Law Commissioners (Ireland), 720
Valuation of Rateable Property (Ireland), Com.
1542

O'DONOGHUE, The, Tipperary Co.
Italy—Address of the Irish Catholics, 2147

Offences against the Person Bill,
l. 1R. 253 ; 2R. 1559

Offices, Public
c. Question (Mr. H. Baillie), 2147

OGILVY, Sir J., Dundee
Representation of the People, Leave, 2068

Ordnance Maps—New Railways,
l. Question (Earl of Powis), 1837

OSBORNE, Mr. R. B., Liskeard
Balfie, Mr., Case of, Paper moved for, 1098
Budget, The, Res. 1733
China—Lord Elgin's Mission, 1136
France, Commercial Treaty with, Notice of
Motion, 2246
Packet and Telegraphic Contracts, Com. moved
for, 308

Outlawries Bill,
c. 1R.* 74

OVERSTONE, Lord
Cotton and Slavery, Returns moved for, 210
Indictable Offences (Metropolitan District),
Com. cl. 2, 1563

OXFORD, Bishop of
Cotton and Slavery, Returns moved for, 209
Endowed Schools, 2R. 712 ; Com. cl. 2, 1217
Glebe Houses, Dilapidations in, 324

Oxford University Bill,
c. Leave, 322 ; 1R.* 323 ; 2R.* 1131

PACKE, Mr. C. W., Leicestershire, S.
Church Rates, Returns moved for, 116, 117
Church Rates Abolition, 2R. 678
Window Cleaning, 2R. 1549

Packet and Telegraph Contracts,
c. Com. moved for (Chancellor of the Exchequer), 290 ; Nomination of Com. 632

Packet Service (Transfer of Contracts) Bill,
c. 1R.* 805 ;
2R. 1904 ; Adj. moved (Mr. Lygon), ib. ;
Motion withdrawn, 1906 ;
Com. 2285

PAGET, Lord C. E. (Secretary of the Admiralty), Sandwich
Admiralty, The, 613, 614
Channel Fleet, Accident to the, 2162, 2164
Flogging (Army and Navy), Returns moved
for, 1168 ; Amend. 1191
Navy Estimates, 965, 970, 987, 988, 991, 1001
Navy, Manning the, Returns moved for, 159 ;
Res. 1149, 1151 ;—Lieutenants of the, 917 ;—
Wine and Medicines for the, 1036 ;—Medical Officers, 1700
Packet Service (Transfer of Contracts), 2R.
1905
Sailors, Passes to, 1350
Savoy, Annexation of, 956
School Ships, 560

PAKINGTON, Rt. Hon. Sir J. S., Droitwich
Address in Answer to the Speech, Report, 123
Admiralty, The, 614
Channel Fleet, Accident to the, 2159, 2163
China, Relations with, 947, 1840 ;—Lord Elgin and Sir M. Seymour, 1716
Colonial Chaplains, Salaries of, 1702
Customs Acts, Com. 1842 ; Res. 3 (Corks),
2003 ; (Cotton Manufactures), 2005, 2006 ;
(Embroidery), 2100, 2104 ; (Silks), 2130
Education Commission, 1472
Financial Statement—The Budget, Res. 832,
881, 889
France, Commercial Treaty with, Notice of
Motion, 2235
Franklin's, Sir J., Expedition, 2157
Harbours of Refuge Commission, 806
Navy Estimates, 970, 974, 978, 984, 997
Newfoundland Fisheries, 917

[cont.]

PAKINGTON, Rt. Hon. Sir J. S.—cont.

Packet and Telegraphic Contracts, Com. moved for, 202

Representation of the People (Scotland), Leave, 2087, 2089

PALK, Mr. L., Devonshire, S.

Financial Statement—The Budget, Res. 880

Militia, The, 508, 1258

Plymouth and Devonport Fortifications, 1229

Savoy, Annexation of, 1470

PALMERSTON, Rt. Hon. Viscount (First Lord of the Treasury), Tiverton

Address in Answer to the Speech, 107; Report, 151

Adjournment of the House, 811

Army Estimates, 1316

British Museum, 2154

Business of the House, 1704

China, Relations with, 950

Civil Service Appointments, Com. moved for, 1197, 1202

Corrupt Practices Prevention Act Amendment, Leave, 387

Customs Acts, Com. 1439, 1447; Res. 4 (Agates, &c.), 1903; Res. 3 (Corks), 2000; (Silks), 2131

Financial Statement, Postponement of, 558, 559, 726, 795;—The Budget, Res. 881, 885, 889, 1541, 1815

France, Commercial Treaty with, 961, 1232, 1256, 1472, 1722, 2214; Notice of Motion, 2228, 2232, 2234, 2264

Franklin's, Sir J., Expedition, 2155

Friday Adjournments, Res. 177

Gloucester City and Wakefield Elections, Leave, 785

Hyde Park, Shrubs in, 511

Ionian Islands—Mr. Gladstone's Mission, 806

Italy—Address of Irish Catholics, 2155

National Defences Commission, 506, 910

Navy Estimates, 998

Offices, Public, 2154

Packet Service (Transfer of Contracts), 2R. 1905

Rules of Procedure—Amendments in Committee of Supply, &c., 1474

Savoy, Annexation of, 952

Serpentine, The, Nomination of Com., 2098

Works, First Commissioner of, 263

Paper, Drawback on

c. Question (Baron L. de Rothschild), 1701

Paper Hangings—Customs Acts,

c. Res. 7, 2204

PARKER, Major W., Suffolk, W.

Militia, Training of the, 1228

Parliament, Meeting of

l. The Queen's Speech, 1; Address in Answer (Earl Fitzwilliam), 7; Amend. (Earl Grey), 27; Amend. neg. 73; Her Majesty's Answer, 155

c. The Queen's Speech, Address in Answer (Mr. St. Aubyn), 75; Report, 118; Her Majesty's Answer, 162

PATTEN, Col. J. W., Lancashire, N.

Hennessy, Mr. J. P., and the Committee of Selection, 1930, 1932, 2213

PAXTON, Sir J., Coventry

Customs Acts, Res. 3 (Silks, &c.), Amend.

2108, 2111; Report, 2203

Silks, Duties on, 1567

PEACOCKE, Mr. G. M. W., Maldon

Adulteration of Food, &c., Com. 2030; cl. 1,

Amend. 2035, 2037, 2038; cl. 3, 2042

PEASE, Mr. H., Durham, S.

Conveyance of Voters, Leave, 796

PECHILL, Rear Adm. Sir G. R. B., Brighton

Window Cleaning, 2R. 1550

PEEL, Rt. Hon. Major Gen. J., Huntingdon

Army Estimates, 890

China, Expedition to, 1266, 1707, 1710

PEEL, Sir R., Tamworth

Army Estimates, 1303, 1313

Rifle Corps, 1690

Savoy, Annexation of, 954, 1133, 1933, 1934; Papers moved for, 1947, 2166, 2177

Persian Army—Extra Batta to the

c. Question (Mr. Adam), 1469

Petition of Right Bill,

c. Leave, 160; 1R.* 162;

2R. 545

PETO, Sir S. M., Finsbury

Customs Acts, Report, (Corks), 2188; Res. 8, (Spirit Duties), 2208

Masters and Operatives, 2R. 2024

PHILIPPS, Mr. J. H., Haverford West

Appeal in Criminal Cases, 2R. 427

Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, Com. moved for, 1091

Piedmont—see Sardinia

Piers and Harbours Bill,

c. 1R.* 1226

Plea of "Not Guilty,"

l. Explanation (Lord Brougham), 1907

Plea on Indictments Bill,

l. 1R. 1449

Plymouth and Devonport Fortifications,

c. Question (Mr. Palk), 1229

Poison, Administering of, Bill,

c. 1R.* 1469; 2R.* 1837; 3R.* 2008

l. 1R.* 2044;

2R. 2218

Police, Superintendents of,
c. Question (Mr. Bowyer), 1565

POLLARD-URQUHART, Mr. W. Westmeath Co.
Customs Acts, Res. 1, (Duties on Foreign Wines), 1880
Income Tax, Com. moved for, 480
Land Transport Corps, 509
Masters and Operatives, 2R. 2023
Trinity and St. John's Colleges, Cambridge, Address moved, 1056, 1069

Porpa, Giovanni, Case of
c. Question (Mr. T. Duncombe), 1351

PORTMAN, Lord
Theatres, Divine Service in, Res. 804

Portsmouth, Defences at
c. Question (Lord Ashley), 2219

Poor Rates, St. Pancras,
c. Question (Mr. John Locke), 1572

Postal Rates,
c. Question (Mr. Dawson), 1933

POTTS, Mr. G., Barnstaple
Customs Acts, Report (Corks), 2193

POWIS, Earl of
Ordnance Maps—New Railways, 1837
Yeomanry, The, 2134

Prayer Book, Alterations in the
l. Papers moved for (Lord Ebury), 915, 1103;
Petition (Viscount Dungannon), 2133

Prisons (Scotland) Act Continuance Bill,
c. 1R.* 392 ;
2R. 563 ;
Question (Mr. E. Craufurd), 1702

Private Bills,
l. Res. (Lord Redesdale), 444

Prize Fight, The intended
c. Question (Mr. Hadfield), 1722

Probate and Administration (India) Bill,
c. Leave, 238 ; 1R.* 240 ;
2R. 544 ;
Com. cl. 1, 562 ; 3R.* 916
l. 1R.* 1001 ; 2R.* 1907 ; 3R.* 2133

PROBY, Lord, (Comptroller of the Household,) Wicklow Co.
Address in Answer to the Speech—Her Majesty's Answer, 162

Property, Law of, Bill,
l. 1R.* 205 ; 2R.* 253 ;
Com. 444 ; 3R.* 501
c. 1R.* 634 ; 2R.* 916

Property, Transfer of—see Transfer of Real Estate Bill,

Public Houses and Beer Houses,
c. Question (Mr. Crossley), 810 ; — Licences,
Question (Lord Fermoy), 1840

Public Improvements Bill,
c. 1R.* 327 ; 2R.* 634 ;
Com. 1544 ; Amend. (Mr. Walter), 1545 ;
Amend. and Motion withdrawn, 1548

PULLER, Mr. C. W. G., Hertfordshire
Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, Com. moved for, 1092
Customs Acts, Res. 3 (Corks), 2001

Qualification for Offices Abolition Bill,
c. Leave, 179 ; 1R.* 180 ;
2R. 441 ; Adj. moved (Mr. Newdegate), 443 ;
Adj. Debate, 2008 ; 3R.* 2143
l. 1R.* 2215

QUEEN'S SPEECH—HER MAJESTY'S MOST GRACIOUS SPEECH FROM THE THRONE, 1

Queen's Speech, The
l. 1 ; Address in Answer (Earl Fitzwilliam), 7 ;
Amend. (Earl Grey), 27 ; Amend. neg. 73 ;
Her Majesty's Answer, 155
c. Address in Answer (Mr. St. Aubyn), 75 ; Report, 118 ; Her Majesty's Answer, 162

Rags, Export of—The Treaty with France,
c. Question (Mr. Hankey), 2224

Railway Accidents,
c. Question (Mr. Bentinck), 220

Recreation and Improvement of the People,
c. Com. moved for (Sir J. Trelawny), 1203

REDESDALE, Lord (Chairman of Committees)
Divine Service, Performance of, 1697
Light Weight Racing, 1R. 1102
Private Bills, Res. 444

Red River Settlement,
l. Question (Earl of Carnarvon), 902

Reform Bills, The
c. Question (Mr. Baxter), 1507 ; (Mr. E. James), 1036 ; (Mr. Steuart), 1717 ; —see Representation of the People Bills

Registration of Births, &c. (Scotland), Bill,
c. Leave, 563 ; 1R. 564

Registration of Voters Bill,
c. 1R.* 805

Religious Worship Bill,
c. Leave, 1204 ; 1R.* ib.

Representation of the People Bill,
c. Leave, 2050 ; 1R.* 2073

Representation of the People (Ireland) Bill,
c. Leave, 2073 ; 1R.* 2085

Representation of the People (Scotland) Bill,
c. Leave, 2085 ; 1R.* 2005

RICARDO, Mr. J. L., Stoke-upon-Trent
Customs Acts, Res. 3 (Agates, &c.), 1976, 1978 ; (China, &c.), 1985
France, Commercial Treaty with, 901
Savings Banks, &c. Res. 191, 202 ; 2R. 2271
Stade Dues, 560

Richard Cœur de Lion, Statue of
c. Question (Mr. Hankey), 1837

RIDLEY, Mr. G., Newcastle-on-Tyne
Civil Service Appointments, Com. moved for, 1202
Customs Acts, Res. 3 (Apples, raw), 1984
Ecclesiastical Commission, 2224
Financial Statement—The Budget, Res. 883
Hennessy, Mr. J. P., and the Committee of Selection, 1931

Rifle Volunteer Corps,
l. Question (Lord Vivian), 553, 1317
c. Question (Lord Elcho), 158 ; (Mr. Hopwood), 723 ; (Mr. Way), 1227 ; Artillery, Question (Lord Elcho), 1233 ;—Practice Ground for, Question (Mr. Wyld), 1235 ;—Officers' Fees, Question (Col. North), 1470 ; (Mr. E. James), 1699

ROBERTSON, Mr. D., Berwickshire
Representation of the People (Scotland), Leave, 2093

RODEN, Earl of
Theatres, Divine Service in, Res. 804

ROEBUCK, Mr. J. A., Sheffield
Adulteration of Food, &c., Com. cl. 1, 2032, 2035, 2039 ; cl. 3, 2042
Civil Service Appointments, Com. moved for, 1200
Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Court, Leave, 620, 622
Flogging (Army and Navy), Returns moved for, 1109
France, Commercial Treaty with, Notice of Motion, 2233, 2248
Representation of the People, Leave, 2073
Trade Marks, Forgery of, 1244

ROLT, Mr. J., Gloucestershire, W.
Customs Acts, Report (Silks), 2196

Roman Catholic Charities,
c. Question (Mr. Newdegate), 117 ; (Sir A. Agnew), 2224

Roman Catholic Charities Bill,
c. 1R.* 219 ; 2R. 1317

Rome—Revolted Provinces,
c. Question (Mr. M'Evoy), 1711

Roscommon Election,
c. Report, 2219

ROTHSCHILD, Baron L. de, London
Paper, Drawback on, 1701

ROUFELL, Mr. W., Lambeth
Gloucester City and Wakefield Elections, Leave, 781

Rules of Procedure—Amendments in Committees of Supply, &c.
c. Observations (Sir J. Graham), 1473

RUSSELL, Right Hon. Lord J. (Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs), London
American Ships, Outrages in, 231 ;—Coasting Trade, 1131

Austro-Russian Treaty, 2050
Bible in Spain—Martin Escalante, 330
China, Troops for, Return moved for, 716 ;—Demands of the Allies on, 718 ;—Relations with, 930, 950, 1840, 2227 ; Mission of Lord Elgin, 1136, 1717

Coal, Export of, 1268, 1274, 1842
Customs Acts, Com. 1422, 1842 ; Res. 1 (Duties on Foreign Wines), 1882 ; Res. 3 (Agates, &c.), 1903 ; (Corks), 2003 ; (Cotton Manufactures), 2004, 2006

Financial Statement—The Budget, Res. 886, 887
Franco, Armaments of, 520 ;—Commercial Treaty with, 610, 811, 1247, 1255, 2225 ; Notices of Motion, 2251, 2261, 2263

Guatemala, Republics of, 261
Herrings, Foreign Duty on, 2040
Hungary, State of, 1227

Italy, Affairs of, 611 ;—French Army in, 1037
Japan, Trade with, 1352

Leghorn, French Troops in, 231
Naples and Sardinia, 1135
Newfoundland Fisheries, 917
Pope, Revolted Provinces of the, 1718
Porpa, Giovanni, Case of, 1352
Reform Bills, 507, 1036

Representation of the People, Leave, 2050, 2064, 2070, 2072

Sardinia, Affairs of, 328, 329 ;—"La Nazione Armata," 506

Savoy, Annexation of, 263, 446, 1133, 1135, 1471, 1569, 1934 ; Papers, moved for, 1066 ; Papers by Command, 2143, 2174, 2177, 2225

Spain and Morocco—Dukedom of Tetuan, 1698
Spanish Debt, The, 1035

Stade Dues, 560
Suez Canal, 1354

Trade Marks, Forgery of, 1247
Wines, French and Spanish, Duties on, 1838

Russia Company's Dues,
c. Question (Mr. Hubbard), 1133

ST. AUBYN, Mr. J., Cornwall, W.
Address in Answer to the Speech, 75 ; Report, 118

ST. DAVID's, Bishop of
Endowed Schools, Com. cl. 2, 1219

St. George's in the East,
l. Question (Bishop of London), 255 ; (Earl of Derby), 565 ; Petition (Lord Brougham), 802 ; (Lord Ebury), 907
c. Question (Mr. Butler), 263 ; (Mr. Byng), 559 ; (Lord H. Lennox), 807 ; Correspondence moved for (Mr. Butler), 1102 ; Question (Mr. Lygon), 2165

ST. GERMANS, Earl of (Lord Steward of the Household)

Address in Answer to the Speech, Her Majesty's Answer, 155

Endowed Schools, Rep. 1564

ST. LEONARDS, Lord

Endowed Schools, Com. 1207

Property, Law of, Com. 444

St. Mary in Rydal Marriages Validity Bill,

c. 1R.* 219; 2R.* 259; 3R.* 392

l. 1R.* 443; 2 R.* 1205; 3R.* 1559

SALOMONS, Mr. Alderman D., Greenwich

"Accrington," The Ship, 718

Customs Acts, Res. 4 (Agates, &c.), 1902

Flogging (Army and Navy), Returns moved for, 1168

Time Bargains, 1229

Sardinia, Affairs of

c. Question (Mr. Stansfeld), 328 :—" La Nazione Armata," Question (Mr. Griffith), 506; (Lord R. Montagu), 1135

Savings Banks and Friendly Societies,

c. Res. (Chancellor of the Exchequer), 190

Savings Banks and Friendly Societies Investments Bill,

c. 1R.* 392;

2R. Adj. moved (Sir H. Willoughby), 2270; Motion neg. 2273

Savoy and Nice, Annexation of, to France

l. Question (Marquess of Normanby), 214, 797, 1206; Address moved (Marquess of Normanby), 574; Motion withdrawn, 609; Papers moved for (Marquess of Normanby), 1001, 2045

c. Question (Mr. Disraeli), 202, 445; Observations (Visct. Palmerston), 952; Question (Sir R. Peel), 1183, 2166; (Mr. Palk), 1470; (Mr. Kinglake), 1569; (Mr. M. Milnes), 1933; Papers moved for (Mr. Kinglake), 1936; Papers by Command (Lord J. Russell), 2143; Question (Mr. S. FitzGerald), 2225; Notice (Visct. Palmerston), 2228

SCHOLEFIELD, Mr. W., Birmingham

Adulteration of Food or Drink, 2R. 1094; Com. cl. 1, 2037; Amend. 2038, 2040; cl. 3, 2040, 2041, 2042

Schools, Endowed, Bill (Lord Cranworth)

l. 1R.* 205;

2R. postponed, 501; 2R. 680;

Com. 1207;

cl. 2, Amend. (Archbishop of Canterbury), 1210; Amend. neg.; cl. struck out, 1221

cl. 7, 1221; cl. struck out, 1226;

Rep. 1563; 3R.* 1660

Schools, Endowed Bill (Mr. Dillwyn)

c. Leave, 162; 1R.* 163

Schools, Endowed (No. 2), Bill (Sir H. Cairns)

c. Leave, 686; 1R.* 687

Schools, Endowed (No. 3), Bill,

c. 1R.* 1837

SCLATER-BOOTH, Mr. G., Hampshire

Conveyance of Voters, Leave, 797

Customs Acts, Res. 3 (Silk, &c.), 2111

Scotland,

Education, c. Question (Mr. Black), 538, 541; (Mr. Caird), 561

Heritable Bonds, c. Question (Mr. E. Craufurd), 2226

Post Office, Edinburgh, c. Question (Sir J. Fergusson), 725

Prisons, c. Question (Mr. E. Craufurd), 1702

Reform Bill, c. Question (Mr. Baxter), 507

Salmon Fishings, Question (Mr. Steuart), 1570

Valuations, c. Question (Mr. Hope), 2224;—

See Annuity Tax Abolition Edinburgh Bill

Prisons (Scotland) Act Continuance Bill

Registration of Births, &c. (Scotland), Bill

SCULLY, Mr. V., Cork Co.

Adulteration of Food, &c., Com. 2028; cl. 1, Amend. 2039; cl. 3, 2042

Representation of the People (Ireland), Leave, 2078

Select Vestries Bill,

l. 1R.* 1.

SELKIRK, Earl of

China—Lord Elgin's Mission, Papers moved for, 1461

SELWYN, Mr. C. J., Cambridge University

Beverley Election, Prosecution moved, 489

Customs Acts, Res. 3 (Agates, &c.), 1976

Serpentine, The

c. Nomination of Com. 2005; Amend. (Mr. Knightley), 2097, [o. q. A. 122, N. 36, M. 86] 2099

Settled Estates Act (1856) Amendment Bill,

c. 1R.* 1226

2R. 2286; Amend. (Mr. Byng), 2287, [o. q. A. 43, N. 86, M. 43] 2290

Settlement and Removal, Law of,

c. Question (Mr. Kekewich), 505

SEYMER, Mr. H. K., Dorsetshire

Church Rates Abolition, 2R. 665

SKYMOUR, Rear-Adm., Sir M., Devonport

Address in Answer to the Speech, Report, 124

Anchors, &c., (Merchant Service), Com. moved for, 500

China, Relations with, 931; Explanation, 1708

Navy, Manning the, Res. 1142, 1155

SEYMOUR, Mr. H. Danby, Poole

British Museum, 2177
 Church of England Services, 156, 157
 Ecclesiastical Vestments, Leave, 2043
 India—Licensing Bill, 331 ;—Finances of, Com.
 moved for, 766
 Merchant Shipping, Com. moved for, 364
 St. George's-in-the-East, 266

SEYMOUR, Mr. W. Digby, Southampton

American Ships, Outrages in, 237
 Appeal in Criminal Cases, 2R. 438
 Beverley Election, Prosecution moved, Amend.
 486
 Merchant Shipping, Com. moved for, Amend.
 849, 359
 Navy, Manning the, Res. 1158

SHAFTESBURY, Earl of

Lace Factories, 2216, 2217
 Savoy, Annexation of, Address moved, 591, 605
 Theatros, Divine Service in, Res. 1669, 1671

SHELLEY, Sir J. V., Westminster

Gloucester City and Wakefield Elections, Leave, 793
 Hyde Park, Shrubs in, 513
 Representation of the People (Ireland), Leave, 2083

SHERIDAN, Mr. H. B., Dudley

Gas Holders, Models of, 541
 Income Tax, 1571

SIBTHORP, Major G. T. W., Lincoln

Rifle Corps, 724

Silk, &c.—Customs Acts,

c. Res. 3, 2108 ; Amend. (Sir J. Paxton), 2111 ;
 Adj. moved (Mr. Ball), 2130, [A. 28, N. 233,
 M. 205] 2131 ; [A. 68, N. 190, M. 122],
 2132 ; Amend. (Mr. Newdegate), 2194, [A.
 51, N. 179, M. 128] 2203

Silks, Duties on,

c. Question (Sir J. Paxton), 1567

SLANEY, Mr. R. A., Shrewsbury

Address in Answer to the Speech, Report, 125
 Financial Statement—The Budget, Res. 882
 Highways, Leave, 247
 Masters and Operatives, 2R. 2011
 Public Improvements, Com. 1548
 Representation of the People, Leave, 2071

Small Pox in London,

c. Question (Mr. Griffith), 1240

Smethurst, Thomas, Case of,

c. Question (Mr. E. James), 227

SMITH, Mr. A., Truro

France, Commercial Treaty with, 960
 Merchant Shipping, Com. moved for, 364
 Miscellaneous Civil Service Expenditure, Com.
 moved for, 457

SMITH, Mr. J. B., Stockport

Customs Acts, Res. 1 (Duties on Foreign Wines), 1899
 *Godavery, Navigation of the, 526

SMITH, Mr. Montague, E., Truro

Petitions of Right, 2R. 546

SMOLLETT, Mr. P. B., Dumbartonshire

Madras Irrigation and Canal Company, 1038

SOLICITOR GENERAL, THE, (Sir W. Atherton,) Durham City

 Appeal in Criminal Cases, 2R. 436
 Cornwall, Duchy of (Limitation of Actions),
 Leave, 549
 Masters and Operatives, 2R. 2023
 Petitions of Right, 2R. 546

SOMERSET, DUKE OF (First Lord of the Admiralty)

 Criminal Outrages (Ireland), Returns moved
 for, Amend. 1914
 France, Commercial Treaty with, Correspon-
 moved for, 1115
 Naval Reserves, 1829
 New Forest, The, 1559

SOMERVILLE, Rt. Hon., Sir W. M., Canterbury

 Charitable Bequests (Ireland), 2223
 Representation of the People (Ireland), Leave, 2083

SOMES, Mr. J., Kingston-upon-Hull

Merchant Shipping, Com. moved for, 355

Spain and Morocco,

i. Question (Earl of Carnarvon), 1660
 c. Question (Mr. Maguire), 513 ;—The Dukedom of Tetuan, Question (Mr. Wyld), 1698

Spanish Debt, The

c. Question (Lord Burghley), 1035

SPEAKER, THE, (Rt. Hon. J. E. Denison)

Nottinghamshire, N.
 China, Relations with, 949
 Corrupt Practices Prevention Act Amendment,
 Leave, 389 ; 2R. 1089
 Customs Acts, Report, 2181, 2185, 2186, 2187,
 2202
 Ecclesiastical Vestments, Leave, 2043
 France, Commercial Treaty with, 1720
 Hennessy, Mr. J. P., and the Committee of Selection, 2047
 India, Operations in, Acknowledgment of Vote of Thanks, 75
 Queen's Speech, The, 75
 Religious Worship, Leave, 1204
 Rules of Procedure—Amendments in Committees of Supply, &c., 1474, 1475
 Savoy, Annexation of, 1934

Spirit Duties—Customs Acts,

c. Res. 8, 2206 ; Amend. (Mr. T. Duncombe)
 2207, [o. q. A. 191, N. 48, M. 143] 2212,

Spirits (Ireland) Act Amendment Bill,
c. 1R.* 445;
2R. House counted out, 797; 3R.* 2008

SPOONER, Mr. R., Warwickshire, N.
Maynooth Grant, Com. moved for, 1038, 1055
Newspapers, Com. 548, 549
Packet and Telegraph Contracts, Nomination of
Com. 633
Savings Banks, Res. 192

Stade Dues,
c. Question (Mr. J. L. Ricardo), 560

STANLEY, Rt. Hon. Lord, King's Lynn
Trinity and St. John's Colleges, Cambridge, Address moved, 1061

STANLEY OF ALDERLEY, Lord
Endowed Schools, Com. cl. 2, 1218; cl. 7, 1224
France, Commercial Treaty with, Correspondence moved for, 1126

STANSFELD, Mr. J., Halifax
Attorneys and Solicitors, Com. cl. 5, Amend.
1551
Sardinia, Affairs of, 328

Statutes, Consolidation of the
c. Question (Mr. Collier), 1238

STEUART, Mr. A., Cambridge
Adulteration of Food, &c., Com. cl. 3, 2042
Austro-Russian Treaty, 2049
Civil Service Appointments, Com. moved for, 1194
Corrupt Practices Prevention Act Amendment,
Leave, 389; 2R. 1080
Customs Acts, Res. 3 (Feathers, &c.) 2105
Election Petitions Act Amendment, 2R. 1557
Friday Adjournments, 609; Res. 768, 771
Reform Bill, The, 1717
Salmon Fishings (Scotland), 1570

STIRLING, Mr. W., Perthshire
France, Commercial Treaty with, 1244; Notice
of Motion, 2261
Representation of the People (Scotland), Leave, 2091

Stock-in-Trade—Exemption from Rating,
c. Question (Mr. Whalley), 1700

STRACEY, Sir H. J., Great Yarmouth
Cavalry Commissions, 1570, 2219
Major Generals, Allowance to, 806

STRATFORD DE REDCLIFFE, Viscount
Endowed Schools, Com. cl. 2, 1220
Savoy, Annexation of, Address moved, 605

Suez Canal,
c. Question (Mr. G. Duff), 1354

Supply,
c. 237; Report, 270
Army Estimates, 889, 1275; Report, 1448
Exchequer Bills, 443
Navy Estimates, 965

SYKES, Col. W. H., Aberdeen City
Civil Service Appointments, Com. moved for, 1202
Customs Acts, Res. 1 (Duties on Foreign Wines), 1879; Res. 3 (Corks), 1993; Report,
2193; Res. 9 (Ammunition), 2264; Res. 10
(Gold Plate), 2266; Res. 11 (Wood, &c.), 2267
India—Navigation of the Godavery, 532;—
Finances of, Com. moved for, 760;—Office, 2146
India House, Records, &c. at the, 1241
Navy Estimates, 963
Probate and Administration (India), 2R. 544
Representation of the People (Scotland), Leave, 2093
Savings Banks, &c., Res. 192, 203; 2R. 2271
Supply, Report, 271
Tasmania—The Legislative Council, 719

Tariffs, Foreign
c. Question (Mr. Newdegate), 327;—French, Question (Sir S. Northcote), 918

Tarrant, Case of Mr.
c. Question (Mr. E. James), 2160

Tasmania—The Legislative Council
l. Petitions (Earl of Carnarvon), 1451
c. Question (Col. Sykes), 719

Taxes, Collection of
c. Question (Mr. T. Duncombe), 1932

TAYLOR, Mr. H., Tynemouth
Merchant Shipping, Com. moved for, 364
Navy, Manning the, Res. 1152

Tea, Sugar, &c.—Customs Acts,
c. Res. 14, 2268

Teak Wood—Customs Acts,
c. Res. 12, 2268

TEYNHAM, Lord
Berwick-upon-Tweed Election, 687

Theatres, Divine Service in
l. Res. (Visct. Dungannon), 803; Motion postponed, 805; Res. 1662; Motion withdrawn, 1695

THOMPSON, Mr. H. S., Whitby
Church Rates Abolition, 2R. 682

THYNNE, Lord H. F., Wiltshire, S.
Malt for Cattle Feeding, 1701
Wine Licences, 1839

Time Bargains,
c. Question (Mr. Ald. Salomons), 1229

TORRENS, Mr. R., Carrickfergus
Customs Acts, Res. 3 (Embroidery, &c.), 2104;
(Linen, &c.), 2107
India—Finances of, Com. moved for, 768

Trade Marks, Forgery of
c. Question (Mr. Roebuck), 1244

Tramways (Ireland) Bill,
c. 1R.* 327; 2R.* 609

Transfer of Real Estate Bill,
l. 1R. 325;
Explanation (Lord Brougham), 443

Treaties of Guarantee,
c. Address moved (Mr. Kinglake), 1204

TRELAWNY, Sir J., Tavistock
Church Rates Abolition, Leave, 118; 2R. 634,
639, 640, 682
Free Church, Attempted Exclusion in a, 810
Recreation, &c., of the People, Com. moved for, 1203

Trinity and St. John's Colleges, Cambridge,
c. Address moved (Mr. Pollard-Urquhart), 1056;
Motion withdrawn, 1069

TRURO, Lord
Address in Answer to the Speech, 11

TURNER, Mr. J. A., Manchester
Bleaching and Dyeing Works, Leave, 630
Customs Acts, Res. 3 (Agates, &c.), 1982
(Silks), 2118
India—Distribution of Prize Money, 221

United States' Ships, Outrages in
c. Question (Mr. M. Milnes), 220; — Coasting
Trade, Question (Mr. Liddell), 1131

UPTON, Hon. Major-Gen., F. G., Antrim Co.
Belts and Buckles of Soldiers, 1265
Customs Acts, Res. 9 (Butter), 2265
Navy Estimates, 1000

Valuation of Rateable Property (Ireland)
Bill
c. 1R.* 1069;
2R. 1317;
Com. Amend. (Mr. Blackburn), 1541; Amend.
withdrawn, 1542

Valuation, Uniform System of
c. Question (Mr. Hunt), 2223

VANCE, Mr. J., Dublin City
Customs Acts, Res. 1 (Duties on Foreign Wines), 1878; Res. 3 (Silks), Adj. moved,
2131, 2132; Report (Corks), 2185
Ecclesiastical Commission, Irish, 562
Election Petitions Act Amendment, Com.
moved for, 1558
Medical Acts Amendment, 2R. 1906
Post Office (Ireland), 1702
Representation of the People (Ireland), Leave, 2078

VANE, Lord H. G., Hastings
France, Commercial Treaty with, 1253; Notice
of Motion, 2258

VANSITTART, Mr. W., Windsor
Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, Com. moved
for, 1093
Customs Acts, Res. 3 (Feathers, &c.), 2106;
(Opera Glasses), 2107
Election Petitions Act Amendment, 2R. 1555
India—Mutiny Compensation, 508;—Finances of, Com. moved for, 737, 767
Representation of the People, Leave, 2066

VERNEY, Sir H., Buckingham
Army Estimates, 1315
Savoy, Annexation of, Papers by Command,
2143

VERNON, Capt. L. V., Berkshire
China, Armstrong Guns sent to, 2222
Customs Acts, Res. 4 (Agates, &c.), 1903
Flogging (Army and Navy), Returns moved
for, 1189
Packets and Telegraphic Contracts, Com. moved
for, 316

VILLIERS, Rt. Hon. C. P. (Chief Commissioner of the Poor Law Board), Wol- verhampton
Poor Rates, St. Pancras, 1572
Representation of the People, Leave, 2065
Settlement and Removal, Law of, 505

VIVIAN, Lord
Rifle Corps, 553, 1317

Volunteers—see Rifle Corps

Wakefield Election,
c. Leave, 771, [A. 118, N. 149, M. 31] 793

Wakefield Writ,
c. Res. (Sir G. Lewis), 180; — Bribery at, (question (Mr. Hadfield), 260

WALCOTT, Rear Adm. J. E., Christchurch
Address in Answer to the Speech, Report, 121
China—Adm. Hope's Services, 955
Navy Estimates, 998
Navy, Manning the, Res. 1157

WALPOLE, Rt. Hon. S. H., Cambridge University
Budget, The, Res. 1767
Church Rates Abolition, 2R. 639
Representation of the People, Leave, 2066
Trinity and St. John's Colleges, Cambridge,
Address moved, 1065

WALSH, Sir J. B., Radnorshire
Savoy, Annexation of, Papers by command,
2143

WALTER, Mr. J., Berkshire
Adulteration of Food, &c., Com. 2030
Friday Adjournments, Res. 173
Masters and Operatives, 2R. 2013
Public Improvements, Com. 1544, 1548

Warehousing Places (Manchester, &c.) Bill,
c. Leave, 391; 1R.* 392

WARRE, Mr. J. A., Ripon
Savoy, Annexation of, Papers moved for, 1965

WARWICK, Earl of
Yeomanry, The, 2138

WAY, Mr. A. E., Bath
Volunteers, Ammunition for the, 1227

Ways and Means,
c. Com. Res. 2008; Res. (Spirit Duties), 2268

WENSLEYDALE, Lord
Companies (1860), 3R. 2218
Indictable Offences (Metropolitan District), 2R.
901
Rifle Corps, 556

WESTMEATH, Marquess of Accidents in the Streets, Return moved for,
2046
Criminal Outrages (Ireland), Returns moved
for, 1917, 1919
Offences against the Person, 2R. 1500
Theatres, Divine Service in, Res. 804

WHALLEY, Mr. G. H., Peterborough
Stock in Trade, Exemption from Rating of, 1700

WHITBREAD, Mr. S., (Lord of the Admiralty), Bedford
Navy Estimates, 996

WHITESIDE, Rt. Hn. J., Dublin University
Balfé, Mr., Case of, Paper moved for, 1097
Budget, The, Res. 1637, 1642
Customs Acts, Res. 1 (Duties on Foreign Wines), 1879, 1893; Res. 3. (Cotton Manufactures), 2005, 2007; Res. 8 (Spirit Duties), 2208
Dublin Corporation Water, 2R. 2048
France, Commercial Treaty with, Notice of
Motion, 2245
Franklin's, Sir J., Expedition, 2151
Medical Acts Amendment, 2R. 1906
Packet Service (Transfer of Contracts), 2R.
1905
Representation of the People (Ireland), Leave,
2077
Settled Estates Act Amendment, 2R. 2286, 2287
Statutes, Consolidation of the, 1239

WILLIAMS, Mr. W., Lambeth
Address in Answer to the Speech, Report, 150
Army Estimates, 1300, 1316
Coals, Export of, 1274
Flogging (Army and Navy), Returns moved for,
1161, 1166, 1168, 1191
Friday Adjournments, 543
Gloucester City Writ, Res. 188
Jersey Commission, Returns moved for, 632
London Corporation, Leave, 286
Navy Estimates, 962; Adj. moved, 998

WILLIAMS, Mr. W.—cont.

Representation of the People, Leave, 2067
Savings Banks, &c., Res. 191; 2R. 2272
Wakefield Writ, Res. 188
Ways and Means, Res. (Spirit Duties), 2260

WILLOUGHBY, Sir H. P., Eresham
Address in Answer to the Speech, Report, 119
Army Estimates, 687, 890, 891, 1276; Report, 1448
Berkeley House, 2226
China, Expedition to, 1266
Customs Acts, Report, 2227
Financial Statement—The Budget, Res. 885
France, Commercial Treaty with, 961, 1253,
1719; Notice of Motion, 2263
Miscellaneous Civil Service Expenditure, Com.
moved for, 477
Packet and Telegraphic Contracts, Com. moved
for, 321
Representation of the People, Leave, 2064
Savings Banks, Res. 190, 200; 2R. Adj. moved, 2270
Supply, Report, 270
Valuation of Rateable Property (Ireland), Com.
1541
Ways and Means, Res. (Spirit Duties), 2260
Wines, Foreign, Drawback on, 1566

Window Cleaning Bill,
c. 1R.* 609;
2R. 1548; Amend. (Sir G. Lewis) 1551

Wine and Beer Licences,
c. Question (Mr. E. James), 1352, 2146; (Lord
E. Thynne), 1839

Wine and Spirit Duties,
c. Question (Mr. T. Duncombe), 1705

Wines, British, Drawback on
c. Question (Mr. T. Duncombe), 1571

Wines, Foreign, Drawback on
c. Question (Mr. Woodd), 1566;—Bonding of,
Question (Major Stuart Knox), 1568

Wines, Foreign, Duties on—Customs Acts,
c. Res. 1, 1842; Amend. (Mr. M. Milnes), 1867,
Amend. withdrawn, 1882; 2nd Amend. ib.;
[A. 72, N. 183, M. 111] 1888

Wines, French and Spanish, Duties on
c. Question (Mr. Bentinck), 1838; see Customs Acts

WISK, Mr. J. A., Stafford
Adulteration of Food, &c., Com. 2025; cl. 1,
2037
Miscellaneous Civil Service Expenditure, Com.
moved for, 446

WODEHOUSE, LORD (Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs)
Cotton and Slavery, Returns moved for, 210, 213
France, Commercial Treaty with, Correspondence moved for, 1113

[cont.

[cont.

WOODHOUSE, Lord—cont.

India, Emigration from—The French Colonies, 1920, 1924
 Italy, Central, Papers moved for, 1032
 Marriago Law, 1823
 Savoy, Annexation of, 800, 801, 2046
 Spain and Morocco, 1662

Wood, Rt. Hon. Sir C. (Secretary of State for India), Halifax

China, Expedition to, 1709
 India—Distribution of Prize Money, 221, 507, 1227;—Promissory Notes, 222, 1703—Land Tax, 327;—Licensing Bill, 331;—Mutiny Compensation, 508;—Navigation of the Godavary, 539;—Finances of, Com. moved for, 744, 768;—Lucknow, Defence of, 1568;—Regiments in, 2146
 India House, Records, &c. at the, 1243
 Persian Army, Batta to the, 1469
 Probate and Administration (India), Leave, 238, 240; 2R. 544; Com. cl. 1, 562
 Queen's Officers and Company's Officers, 1711

Wood, &c.—Customs Acts

c. Res. 11, 2267

WOODD, Mr. B. T., Knarborough

Customs Acts, Res. 1 (Duties on Foreign Wines), 1865, 1885, 1887
 Wines, Foreign, Drawback on, 1566

Works, First Commissioner of

c. Question (Mr. E. James), 263

WYLD, Mr. J., Bodmin

Billeting—Wine and Beer Licences, 1569
 Flogging (Army and Navy), Returns made for, 1190
 Spain and Morocco, Dukedom of Tetuan, 1
 Volunteers, Practice Grounds for, 1235

Yarmouth, Great, Election

c. Report, 2047

Yeomanry, The

l. Question (Earl of Powis), 2134

END OF VOLUME CLVI. AND FIRST OF SESSION, 1860.

Erratum in Vol. CLV.

An error of some importance was committed in the Report of the Debate on CHURCH RATES ABOLITION BILL, Commons, July 27 (Vol. 155, p. 476). A speech of Lord HENLEY is there attributed to the Right Hon. J. W. HENLEY.

As Mr. Henley has heretofore held Cabinet Offices, the mistake is one of much consequence, and the reader is requested to refer immediately to Vol. 155, p. 476, and to make the required alteration. It is also desirable that the Index should be altered in conformity, by striking out from Mr. Henley's speeches the first line:—

Church Rates Abolition, Comm. [155] 476,

and inserting—

HENLEY, Lord, Northampton.

Church Rates Abolition, Comm. [155] 476.

YB0

leta

Waresbury (Duties on he 87 on, 1566

er of 263 licences, 1566

, Returns 3

n of Tetun:
for, 1235

Rates puted nce ired

om

